Spirit of mercy, truth, and love. By H. A. Chambers. (Novello's Short Anthems, No. 220.)

Six Benediction Hymns. Music by H. Elliot Button. (Parish Choir Book, No. 915.)

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Mr. West's anthem is a devotional setting of Thomas Kelly's well-known evening hymn. The music is designed for unaccompanied singing, though an organ-part is provided for use where necessary. The work is well within the powers of an average choir. Mr. Chambers also has gone to a familiar hymn for the words of his anthem, which is suitable for Whitsuntide or general use. It is quite short, and easy to sing.

The revival of the liturgical observance of Good Friday has led to various re-issues of the music of the 'Improperia,' or Reproaches. The setting for double choir by Palestrina has been arranged for English use by Mr. Walter S. Vale, and should be an impressive feature where the vocal resources are sufficient for a worthy performance. The music, on the surface, is exceedingly simple, but these old strains usually make more demands than one would expect from a series of common chords.

The 'Six Benediction Hymns' will be very serviceable in churches where it is customary to conclude the evening service with a short unaccompanied hymn.

The Competition Festival Record

No. 70.

The entries for the Midland Competitive Festival, to be held at Birmingham on May 19 to 23, are remarkable. They number no less than 1,100 against 950 of last year. As a large number of these entries consist of choirs, of which there will be 169, it is estimated that the total number of competitors will be over 8,000. The honorary secretaries are Mr. G. J. Bowker and Mr. F. W. Stevens; address, Queen's College, Birmingham.

Festival secretaries on the look out for novel classes should note that at a Carnarvon competition for the best performance of a comic song the prize was a live pig, which the competitors had to hold under their arm while singing.

In our account of the Londonderry Feis it should have been stated that Miss Whale's Choir was first in the Juvenile Choral Class, and the Irish Society's School (Coleraine) was second.

SOUTH AND WEST LONDON MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—March 21 to 28.

We gave in our last number many of the chief results of this Festival. We now give the remainder.

The London Shield Competition for Choirs from Girls' Clubs.—'Sweet and low,' by B. Luard-Selby, and 'Orpheus with his lute,' by Edward German. St. Paul's, Herne Hill, Girls' Club (Mr. F. Buckle).

The South of the Thames Competition for Choral Societies.—Glee, 'When Allen-a-Dale,' by R. L. de Pearsall, and Part-song, 'Blow, blow, thou winter wind,' by Charles Wood. Brixton and District Musical Society (Mr. F. Williams).

Composition.—Pianoforte Solo, Scherzo, and Trio. Mr. John R. A. Crouch, Charlton.

Composition.—Part-song. Mr. Sidney H. Bressey, Thornton Heath.

Pianoforte Solo (ages 16 and 17 years).—'Pastorale' in E minor, by Scarlatti, and 'Romance,' by J. Sibelius. Miss Adela F. Herring, Wandsworth.

Pianoforte Solo (Seniors).—'Toccata,' by Sterndale Bennett, and 'Intermezzo,' by Brahms. Miss Augusta Chilton-Griffin, Anerley.

Violin (Intermediate).—'Pièce Romantique,' by Harold Henry. Miss Doris Thatcher, Purley.

Pianoforte Transposition.—Mr. Ernest S. Treasure, Battersea.

Choirs of Equal Voices.—'Bird rapture,' by G. F. Huntley, and 'Evening song,' by John Ireland. Rothschild Girls' School, Brentford (Mrs. Thompson).

Church Choirs (Mixed Voices).—Anthem, 'O Saviour of the world,' by J. Goss, and 'Happy and blest,' by Mendelssohn. Vineyard Congregational Church Choir, Richmond (Mrs. Lyne).

Pianoforte Duet (over 15 years of age).—'Slavische Tanze,' by A. Dvorák. Miss Minnie Jeffrey, Brockley, and Miss May Dean, New Cross.

Pianoforte Sight-playing (Seniors).—Miss Elsie Smalls, Dulwich.

Mezzo-Soprano Solo.—'The willow,' by Goring Thomas. Miss Margaret Ward, Streatham.

Ear-tests.—Miss Violet Brown, Fulham.

Musical Appreciation.—Mr. Leslie Regan, Bayswater.

Bass Solo.—'Rolling down to Rio,' by German. Mr. Albert Mould, Forest Hill.

Tenor Solo.—'Love and Spring,' by J. Brahms. Mr. Sidney Pointer, Kensington.

The Daily Telegraph Choral Championship.—'All creatures now are merry-minded,' by John Benet, and 'My delight and thy delight,' by C. H. H. Parry. Portsmouth Temperance Choral Union (Mr. W. B. Green).

Ladies' Choirs.—'The pixies,' by S. Coleridge-Taylor, and 'Dream, baby, dream,' by Percy E. Fletcher. St. Gabriel's College, Camberwell (Miss Bertha Dunn).

Trinity College Exhibition (nine guineas). Miss Melvina Blackford, Kensington.

On April 4 there were two concerts given at the Crystal Palace, and the prizes were distributed. A feature of the Junior Concert was the combined performance by school orchestras of the test-piece, 'Gems from the Opera,' under the conductorship of Dr. Abernethy. The prizes were distributed by Sir John and Lady Kirk and by Alderman Sir Edward and Lady Cooper. Votes of thanks proposed by Dr. Abernethy (chairman) and seconded by Mr. J. Percy Baker (vice-chairman) were unanimously passed, as also was one to Mr. and Mrs. Lester Jones for carrying out the secretarial duties. Mr. Herbert Hodge, official accompanist of the Festival, gave a recital on the grand organ.

STRATFORD.—March 21 to 28.

This Festival was held with even more than its customary success. Last year the choral entries were not very good, but this year there was a gratifying 'spurt.' In the open class some excellent provincial entries were captured. But the main strength of the event is the numerous entries in the school choir classes, the pianoforte classes, and those for solo singing. We can give space only for a list of the chief prize-winners.

The adjudicators were Mr. Oscar Beringer, Mr. Frederick Corder, Dr. H. Coward, Mr. Ernest Fowles, Mr. Alfred Gibson, Mr. Hermann Klein, Mr. George Oakley, Mr. Daniel Price, Dr. Richard R. Terry, and Mr. L. C. Venables.

BRISTOL.—March 23 to 28.

This was the twelfth annual Festival that has been run under the energetic promotion of Mr. W. E. Fowler and his committee. Solo-singing and pianoforte-playing are strong points, but some excellent choral organizations are also drawn into the scheme. The following were the chief results in the adult classes.

Soprano.—Classical airs, 'Ye verdant plains' and 'Hush, ye pretty warbling choir' (Handel). Miss May Venn.

Soprano.—Ballad, 'Sea wrack' (Hamilton Harty). Miss Olive Clark.

Soprano (Novice).—'Damon' (Max Stange). Miss Adeline M. Ray.

FIFE FESTIVAL (CUPAR).—March 27, 28.

The fourth Festival held under the auspices of the existing committee took place this year at Cupar. The children's singing was especially good, and earned the commendation of Dr. H. P. Allen. English and Scots folk-songs were features of the tests. In the adult sections the choral tests included choruses from 'Elijah' and Brahms's 'How lovely are Thy dwellings.' St. Andrews, Cupar, and Newport were amongst the winning choirs. A concert given by the combined choirs, under the direction of Dr. Allen, was a welcome event. Mr. Frederick Keel sang solos.

DOUGLAS (THE MANX COMPETITIONS).

March 31, April 1 and 2.

In every respect this year's Festival was the most successful that has been held under these auspices. There were 61 classes and 419 entries, representing, it was estimated, 3,000 competitors. In the musical competitions the adjudicators were Sir Edward Elgar and Prof. Granville Bantock. Below we summarise the chief results.

SOLO-SINGING.

Soprano.—Miss May Kelly.

Special Soprano.—Miss A. Kee.

Mezzo-soprano.—Miss D. Kelly.

Special Mezzo-soprano.—Miss Anna Casement.

Contralto.—Miss Margaret Acheson.

1st. Douglas Orpheus Choral Society (Mr. J. E. Kelly).
Ramsey Choral Society (Miss Beatrice Mills).

BELFAST.—April 3, 4.

It is gratifying to note that notwithstanding the high state of political feeling in the centre of Ulster this Festival was remarkably well supported.

Commercial choirs are a feature of the Belfast competitions. The principal contest was for Mixed-Voice Commercial Choirs. Seven were entered to sing Bach's beautiful sacred part-song, 'Christ, our Helper,' and Lee Williams's 'Song of the pedlar,' two absolute contrasts, as Mr. Harry Evans said, the first being as sacred as sacred could be, and the second as secular as secular could be. The winners, Messrs. Baird's Jubilee Choral Society (Mr. James Woods) won not only on good voices generally, but on interpretative vitality and variety. The results were as follows: 1st, Messrs. Baird's Choral Society; 2nd, York Street Spinning Co. (Mr. George C. Ferguson); 3rd, Tower Buildings (Mr. J. R. Middlemore). Messrs. Thomas Somerset & Co.'s Choir, Inglis's Choir, and the choir of Messrs. Robinson & Cleaver and Messrs. Thomas Ireland Bros. were the remaining competitors.

Commercial Female Choirs.—Seven entered, and the test-pieces were 'Farewell, but whenever' (arr. by Dr. Smith), and 'Mistress Mary' (Macirone). Mr. Evans awarded first place to Messrs. Lowry's Choir (Mr. W. Layton), who scored 77, 77—total 154 marks out of 160. Messrs. Allen & Turtle's Choir (Mr. George C. Ferguson) were second. Messrs. Thomas M'Cann & Co. and Messrs. Baird's Choirs were equal third. Three other choirs sang.

Male-Voice Commercial Choirs (not exceeding twenty voices).—'Lovely night' (Chwatal) and 'Hymn before action' (H. Walford Davies): 1st, Queen's Island (Shipyard) (Mr. J. H. MacBratney), 135; 2nd, Baird's Jubilee Choral Society (Mr. James Woods), 130.

Male-Voice Choirs (not exceeding forty voices).—'A spell is on the woods' (H. Goring) and 'The Beleaguered' (Sullivan). Two choirs competed—the Queen's Island (Engine Department) conducted by Mr. James Woods, and the Queen's Island (Shipyard) conducted by Mr. J. H. MacBratney.

Special Section, open to commercial female choirs who had not previously won a prize.—'Slumber Song' (Mendelssohn), unison; 'Violets' (Cowen), two-part. The Albion Choir (Mr. James Woods) had the competition to themselves, and were awarded 150 marks.

Girls' Friendly Society Choirs (Senior).—'Sunset lullaby' (Cliffe Forrester), unison, and 'Spring is come' (Ethel Boyce), two-part. 1st, Whitehouse (Rev. J. A. Carey), 144; 2nd, St. Patrick's (Miss Stephenson), 141. (Junior).—

'Wynken, Blynken, and Nod' (Macdonald), and 'Come o'er the woodland' (A. W. Ketelbey). 1st, St. Luke's (Miss H. R. Stewart), 140; 2nd, St. Paul's (Miss Ethel Law), 128.

Mixed-Voice Choirs (Open).—'Come, gentle death' (Bach), and 'Music's sweet voice' (Bruch). The Albertbridge Vocal Society (Mr. John H. Gleave) were awarded 151 marks.

Girls' Club Choirs (Senior).—'Come to me, gentle sleep' (Schartau), two-part; and 'The young May moon' (Irish air), two-part. 1st, Elmwood (Miss M. C. Roddie), 144; 2nd, Time and Talents (Miss Lyttle), 134.

Belfast Ladies' Choir (Mr. Woods) were first with 149 marks in the female-voice choirs (open); Messrs. Brand & Co. (Mr. H. F. Scott) scored 143; the Queen's Island (Engine Department) (Mr. James Woods) large male choir (open competition) scored 70 out of 80.

Female-Voice Choirs.—'Far away' (arr. by W. B. Reynolds) and 'The merry beggars' (Woods). 1st, Belfast Ladies' Choir (Mr. James Woods), 149; 2nd, Messrs. Brand & Co.'s Choir (Mr. H. F. Scott), 143.

Male-Voice Choirs (Open) (not exceeding forty voices).—'Eventide' (Shepard) and 'Boot, saddle, and horse' (Bantock). The Queen's Island (Engine Department) choir had a 'walk-over,' and were awarded 70 marks.

The whole Festival was considered a great success. The secretaries were Miss L. Murphy and Mr. T. S. Kerr. One of the most potent forces in the business of the Festival is Prof. Morton, who acts as the treasurer. Mr. Harry Evans adjudicated.

The hon. accompanists were Miss M. G. Brett, Miss Munster, Miss Josephine Orr, Mr. Wilfred Layton, Mr. J. M'Keown, and Mr. E. Godfrey Brown. A very high compliment was paid by Mr. Evans to all the accompanists; he said he had never attended a Festival where the official accompanists were of so uniformly high a standard.

WANSBECK (MORPETH).—April 3, 4.

This event continues its useful career under the fostering care of Mrs. Orde and her committee. The junior competitions created lively interest. Netherwiton, Pegswood, and Hartburn Girls were amongst the winners. In the adult section Longframlington won the Lady Milburn Challenge Cup, Ashington sang very efficiently as the only competitor in one Male-Voice Choir section, and Netherwiton was first in another section. Dr. Brewer adjudicated.

BIRKENHEAD.—March 21.

The third annual Eisteddfod attracted a large number of competitors. The Whitchurch Road Birkenhead Male Choir, conducted by Mr. D. R. Jones, proved the best in the Male-Voice Choir Competition. In the Chief Choral Competition (mixed voices) the prize was awarded to the Liverpool Gwalia Choir, conducted by Mr. J. O. Williams. The adjudicator was Dr. Caradog Roberts.

CLARION VOCAL UNION.—April 4.

The Clarion Vocal Union—founded in 1896 by the late Montague J. Blatchford—has for its twofold object the cultivation of musical taste and the development of unaccompanied choral singing, as an asset in the propagandist work of Socialism.

Once yearly a meeting is held of all Clarion choirs who can manage to assemble in one particular town. The spot chosen for the fifteenth annual gathering was Manchester, the programme taking the form of a choral contest and a concert by the combined choirs under the baton of Mr. Rutland Boughton, the present 'National' conductor of the Union.

The number of choirs being too large to permit of all taking part in the annual competition, preliminary Festivals were arranged for the Lancashire and Yorkshire choirs—held this year at Oldham and Hanley—the choirs gaining the highest number of marks in these sections being invited to compete in the final. This contest is carried out more in a spirit of friendly emulation than keen competition. All the choirs have to rehearse some ten or twelve pieces to be sung at the Festival, and one of these is chosen at the last moment by the judge as the test-piece. This year his choice fell on Elgar's 'Weary Wind of the West.'

The following seven choirs entered the lists, and gained the number of marks indicated: Oldham, 82; Bradford, 70; Sheffield, 76; Newcastle-on-Tyne, 95; Manchester, 91; Halifax, 87; and Rochdale, 80.

The Clarion Challenge Baton (the only prize offered) was thus carried off by the Newcastle Choir, conducted by Mr. Norman Veitch, followed closely by Manchester (Mr. Thos. Corlett). Mr. H. Orsmond Anderton (of Birmingham), in announcing his awards, said the singing that evening showed a great advance on that of the earlier years of the movement.

In the concert which followed the choir of 500 voices was heard to advantage in Wilbye's 'Sweet honey-sucking bees,' Macfarren's 'The Sands of Dee,' Stanford's 'The Witch,' 'The Blue Bird,' and 'The Train' (recalled), Elgar's 'Owls,' and Bantock's 'Awake, awake.' The feature of the evening, however, was the production of a new work by Mr. Boughton, entitled 'The City,' described as a Motet, and embodying the composer's vision of an ideal city. It is written in a vigorous style, use being freely made of a folk-song; at times an exultant strain is struck. This initial performance, though suffering from lack of united rehearsal, created a favourable impression. Another work intended for propagandist effect (in this case, of women's suffrage) was the choral song '1910,' from the pen of Dr. Ethel Smyth, with which the programme closed.

WEST HARTLEPOOL.—April 13, 14.

This is a comparatively new Festival. It draws upon a musical neighbourhood, and attracts some first-rate organizations. A Church Choir section brought forward six entries. The tests were 'The Silent Land' (Gaul), and the chorus 'O Father whose almighty power.' An exceptionally fine interpretation of the first piece and a very good performance of the second, placed the Darlington Victoria Road U. N. Choir (Miss Whitfield) first, Prudhoe Wesleyan (Mr. J. D. Coulson) following very close. In the Female-voice Choir Class Miss Whitfield again scored a victory. Some beautiful songs had been chosen as tests in the solo-singing classes. Contraltos sang the 'Sapphic Ode' (Brahms), Miss Amy Jowett, of Halifax, gaining the prize. Sopranos sang 'Solveig's song' (Grieg); tenors, 'Come, Margarita, come' (Sullivan); basses, 'The Erl King' (Schubert). The winners were respectively Miss Carrie Spelding (Middlesbrough), Mr. Lambert Harvey (Felling-on-Tyne), and Mr. Ralph Foster (West Hartlepool). The open choral competitions occasioned great interest, five male-voice choirs (Cleveland Harmonic, Wallsend, Stockton Lyric, Hartlepool Excelsior, and a more elementary choir, the West Hartlepool Orpheus, competed. The tests were Oliver King's fine setting of 'Soldier, rest,' and an arrangement of the Scotch air 'Bonnie wee thing,' by Granville Bantock. Cleveland gave superb performances which revealed much of the potentialities of the two pieces, but Wallsend sang with somewhat greater refinement and deep feeling, and gained the first place. The Choral Societies, of which there were four, sang 'How lovely are Thy dwellings' (from the 'Requiem,' by Brahms) and Mendelssohn's brilliant 'Hunting song.' St. George's Choral Society, West Hartlepool (Mr. A. J. Smith), was first, and Nairsforth (Sunderland) Society second. The performances generally in this class were of a high grade. In a Pianoforte Trio Class the Stockton party was first, but three young lads who constituted the Povolski party were so good that they were awarded a special prize. The audiences were numerous. That so many working-folk chose to spend their Easter Monday and Tuesday holidays at this Festival is a tribute to the zeal with which music is cultivated in the district. Mr. Arthur Warr, who has succeeded Mr. Bryant as secretary, proved to be an energetic and capable manager.

TO MISS FRANCES SMART, MALVERN.

The Organ Loft. Books ciii. and civ.

[G. Schirmer, Ltd.]

These two latest numbers of 'The Organ Loft' contain pieces of various schools. In Book ciii. we have the English, German, and Swiss represented by an Andantino by Frank Bridge, a Berceuse by A. W. Leupold, and a Choral by Gustave Ferrari. Book civ. contains a Pastorale by Pietro a Yon (an Italian), 'Ecce Homo' by A. W. Leupold, and a Scherzo-Caprice by Alec Rowley. All have their points of interest, but special mention may be made of the pieces by Bridge and Ferrari.

Festal Prelude. By Thomas F. Dunhill. (Original compositions for the organ (New Series), No. 31.)

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

This is an excellent piece of organ music, robust and well suited to the instrument. The broad opening theme has an effective foil in the suave middle section in the subdominant, and there are some well-built climaxes. Altogether a tuneful and effective piece, suitable for either voluntary or recital purposes. It is moderately difficult, and makes few demands in the matter of registration.

PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

Pantomime. Mazurka. By H. Scott-Baker.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Mr. Scott-Baker's pianoforte pieces show a lively rhythmic faculty, and the capacity to 'keep the game alive' with his harmonies as well as his rhythms. He does not strive to be impressive or grope for abstruse meanings, but frankly aims to please the ear, and sets about it with some decision of style. The 'Pantomime' is a lively conversational piece, full of gay repartee. The 'Mazurka' is well-rounded, and consistently graceful and suggestive of dance-movement. Neither piece is difficult, but there is sufficient in them to keep the attention busy.

Deux Préludes. Impression languide. Sonata. By L. Collingwood.

[Moscow : P. Jurgenson.]

The Two Preludes are vigorously-conceived pieces, modern in feeling, but free from eccentricity. 'Impression Languide' is appropriately vague, though there are some strenuous passages wherein the languor seems to be in abeyance. Like the Preludes, it is rather difficult. The Sonata is a big work filling fifty pages. There are four movements. It is impossible in the space at our disposal to deal with a work of such calibre, and we must content ourselves with the remark that like the other pieces from the same pen mentioned above, it is clearly the work of a writer who has something to say and the ability to say it well.

MODERN HARMONY AND THE HARMONIC SERIES.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—Your current issue contains four most interesting articles dealing with the practice of harmony by present-day composers. Scriabin's scale, derived from the natural harmonic series, has the advantage of a physical and logical basis. The harmonic series provides a most useful melodic scale; it includes the characteristic features of the minor mode (harmonics 6 to 12), whole-tone scale (7 to 11), and major scale (8 to 16), including the leading note to define the key, the augmented fourth for modulation to the dominant and the minor seventh for modulation to the subdominant. [See the diagram of harmonic series, Musical Times, April, page 229.] Every fundamental sound generates this series of sixteen or more overtones, also a second series of resultant tones of lower pitch, and the result when all are sounding together is a full, rich concord, although Nos. 7, 9, 11, 14 and 15 taken separately against the fundamental sound are discordant. But it should be noted—(1) that the harmonic series extends over four octaves, or more, of sounds; (2) that under normal conditions the lower harmonics are of greater intensity than the higher ones; (3) that the first five harmonics are perfectly concordant with the fundamental sound and produce, with it, the common chord or triad in its most satisfactory position. Therefore Nos. 1 to 6 of the series form the most perfect concord, No. 7 sometimes causes trouble by introducing discord, No. 8 is again concordant, and Nos. 9 to 15 are usually, for practical purposes, negligible. It would therefore appear that nature exhibits a certain procedure, viz., a strong foundation chord of pure concord, and above that a scale or series of smaller intervals, some of them discordant with the lower sounds. But the modern harmonist takes his fundamental sound, drops Nos. 11 and 14 two octaves, Nos. 10 and 13 one octave, and places No. 9 at the top of the column; he then proceeds to sound these all together, not with the greatly diminished intensity of harmonics, but all with equal force, as fundamental sounds, and each of these fundamentals must necessarily generate its own harmonic series. We thus get a chord containing C, F♯, B♭, E, A, D, each with its sixteen overtones and resultants, forming, obviously, a most complicated and excruciating discord.

Of course it may be argued that it is impossible to produce any sound without generating all other sounds. Sound No. 1 gives rise to sixteen or more new sounds, each of these generates sixteen more, and so on; the world is therefore full of every possible degree of sound vibration, and our musical instruments are merely traps to catch and reinforce certain selected vibrations, or, as Browning so concisely puts it, 'soft, loud, and all is said.' But nature regulates the 'soft, loud,' to perfection, so that the result is perfectly harmonious, whereas these crude chords of six or seven closely-packed discordant sounds are a direct interference with the natural process. A pianist having the misfortune to lose his hand by amputation, might still contrive to pick out the notes of a melody with his elbow, and fill in chords by passing his forearm across the keys six or seven at a time, and the effect might closely resemble some of the examples of modern harmony. Nor is there any gain in expression or power by such a riot of extreme dissonance. The strongest effects in harmony are obtained by contrast between concord and discord. To quote Browning again, 'Why rushed the discords in, but that harmony should be prized.' But when every chord is extremely dissonant, it is impossible to obtain much variety or contrast. The whole effect becomes heavy, obscure, turbid, and turgid. Or, if the system be pushed to its limit, and the ear becomes so accustomed to dissonance as to accept it as common concord, then in order to obtain contrast and relief it becomes necessary to go back to the simple concords and use them as the discords have hitherto been used; so nothing is gained except the blackening of paper by a fearsome array of accidentals. On the other hand, the perpetual dissonance system largely destroys the effects of tonality, modulation, and key-colour (if such a thing there be).

Whilst, therefore, the ultra-modern system of harmony does not appear to offer much advantage, there is no doubt that the scales upon which it is based, used in melody or arpeggio, afford many useful and pleasing effects. With regard to the chords, if it is found that they produce desirable effects which cannot be obtained by simpler and more natural means, they will no doubt find acceptance, if used with moderation; but it is impossible to avoid the suspicion that there is more novelty than originality about them.

Yours faithfully,

CLARENCE S. HILL.

[We are glad to insert our correspondent's letter because it deals ably with the views of persons who strive to find in the harmonic series a clue to the mysteries of chordal formation and progression. For ourselves we confess we are unbelievers, and that we put our faith in psychological evolution, the laws of which—or, at least, so far as they apply to music—cannot it seems be formulated definitely: hence our existing embarrassment. Scriabin simply plays with the tonal material he arbitrarily selects. Is the result an artistic creation? is the only question.—ED., M.T.]

'DICTION' OR 'ELOCUTION.'

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—With the objections to the use of 'Diction' as applied to singers and the propriety of 'Elocution' as set forth in the letter of Mr. Wallis A. Wallis in the March number of the Musical Times I am in full accord.

As a matter of fact, I have always, in teaching and lecturing, objected to the current use of 'diction,' and pointed out the advantages of 'elocution.'

Students of singing rarely realise how complicated is the task they undertake. If they did they would not attempt to reach the goal by so many short cuts. One of the commonest of these is studying words and music together, when it is clear that each should at first be taken separately. Indeed, those of most experience will agree that the more the work of learning a song is divided into parts the better the result and the sooner in reality is the real end—a significant interpretation of the composition—attained.

It follows that one should begin with the words, and not only learn to utter them with perfect ease and distinctness, but with all that is implied in 'elocution': hence the great advantage of using this term instead of 'diction,' which in itself conveys no correct impression. 'Elocution' connotes a certain practice or procedure. It does not, of course, follow that the music of the song shall not in any way be dealt with till the elocution is complete, but the treatment of the words as words should be a separate first study, because it greatly lessens the difficulties of uniting words and music, the part in which most singers fail. By all means let us drop the term 'diction,' retain 'enunciation,' and introduce 'elocution.' Past usage is no serious hindrance in this case.—Truly yours,

WESLEY MILLS.

THE SCOTTISH ORGANISTS' NATIONAL PSALTER AND SERVICE BOOK.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—May I be allowed to appeal through the medium of your columns to the organists of churches in Scotland, and to all interested, and ask if they have any traditional forms of old Scottish Psalter tunes, or rare collections of the same, in their possession; and if so, if they would kindly communicate with me? This is the first time that a comprehensive national collection is being got together. These beautiful old Scottish melodies are of priceless value, and I trust I shall have help from some of your Scottish readers.

COUNTERPOINT.

Mr. Herbert Sanders, of Ottawa, Ontario, says he has read with interest the report of Mr. Frederick Corder's lecture on 'Counterpoint,' which appeared in our December, 1913, issue. He draws attention to Dr. C. H. Kitson's 'Art of Counterpoint,' and says that he considers this work revolutionises the study.

A CORRECTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—May I correct an error in your notice of the Edward Mason Choir's concert at Queen's Hall on March 18? In writing of the first performance of my work for choir and orchestra, 'That Land,' you add that 'Dream Tryst' was sung before it at these concerts. Both these works were given at the concert mentioned, but the first performance of 'Dream Tryst' belongs to the London Choral Society. It is gratifying to be assured that "That Land" marks considerable advance in every way on . . . "Dream Tryst." This is as it should be. This latter work was written six years ago, and was my initial attempt at either choral writing or scoring for orchestra. Although the work has been in print five years, the London Choral Society first gave me—and I think others also—the pleasure of hearing it in London last December; now half-a-dozen Societies have it in rehearsal. 'That Land' was written two years ago.—Yours faithfully, H. V. JERVIS-READ.

Obituary.

We regret to record the following deaths:

TITO MATTEI, the celebrated composer of pianoforte pieces and popular songs, at Maida Vale, on March 30. He was born at Campobasso on May 24, 1839, and displayed precocious talent as a pianist and composer. At a concert that took place at Naples in his tenth year he played a valse that afterwards became one of his most popular pieces. He made a concert-tour of Europe, returned to study under Thalberg, was appointed Maestro di Cappella at Naples, and composed Masses and other Church music. In 1863 he took up residence in London, and was much in demand as a concert-pianist and teacher. His settings of English lyrics now proved much to the taste of the public and achieved immense popularity. 'Dear heart' is perhaps the most famous example. He also composed two operas—'Maria di Gand' and 'The prima donna.' He was recently appointed one of 'Ye Knyttes of ye Rounde Table,' for whom he wrote a 'Chaunt' that was much admired.

LADY GROVE, at Sydenham, on March 31. She was a sister of the late Dean Bradley, of Westminster, whose school-friend, George Grove, she married in 1851. After the death of her husband in 1900, Lady Grove continued to occupy the house in which she had lived for forty years. To the end she retained all her faculties and her familiar alertness of mind.

ALFRED HANSON, senior partner of the firm of A. and F. E. Hanson, Coventry. He had been organist and choir-master of St. John's Church, Bablake, and Holy Trinity Church, Coventry. His death occurred in Egypt, on March 26.

HENRI PETRI, the Dutch violinist, born in April, 1856. From 1889 until his death he had been first concert-master to the Royal Chapel at Dresden.

THE TORQUAY MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

The second musical Festival of the Torquay Municipal Orchestra was held in the Pavilion on April 15 and 16, and consisted of three concerts devoted almost exclusively to works of modern composers. One item by Bach was performed, but Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, and Brahms gave place to Elgar, Delius, Strauss, and Stravinsky. British composers were well represented, more than a third of the works performed being of native origin. The policy of including so much modern music was a sound one both from an educational and a business point of view, as it is possible that a large number of Devonians were thus enabled to make a first acquaintance with up-to-date compositions, and the novelty of the scheme drew very large audiences to this music temple on the sunny shore.

Three of Strauss's Symphonic-poems were performed—'Don Juan,' 'Till Eulenspiegel,' and 'Tod und Verklärung,' and also the closing Scene from 'Salome,' this last being sung by Miss Carrie Tubb with intense dramatic power and a keen perception of its extraordinary possibilities in regard to vocal colour. Notable performances were given of the 'Dance Rhapsody' of Delius, and of his Pianoforte concerto, the solo part of which was played by Mr. Percy Grainger with immense enthusiasm. Elgar was represented by his ever-welcome 'Cockaigne' Overture, Debussy by the elusive Prelude, 'L'Après-midi d'un Faune,' Josef Holbrooke by his highly emotional Scena for tenor from 'The Children of Don' (sung by Mr. Frank Mullings), and also by the early symphonic Variations on 'The girl I left behind me.' Tchaikovsky's fourth Symphony also found a place in the scheme, and two Wagner excerpts, whilst a leavening of vocal interest was supplied by the 'Willow' Song from Verdi's 'Otello,' and the Mad Scene from the Opera 'Hamlet' by Ambroise Thomas, these serving to show the purity and beauty of tone and the artistic vocal technique of Miss Carrie Tubb, who has seldom been heard at greater advantage.

Several novelties were produced, the first of these being a new orchestral piece by G. H. Clutsam. This work is based upon a mimodrame entitled 'The Pool,' which was brought out at the Alhambra, London, on May 12, 1912. The composer has taken themes and passages from the original work, and rearranged and orchestrated them for concert purposes. The music is essentially ballet music of the light French type, and was perhaps a little out of place in a Festival so largely devoted to more serious work, but it evidently pleased many in the audience who were possibly less able to understand the more indirect methods of Delius or Debussy. It consists of six numbers—Overturette, Spinning-wheel Dance, Dance of Milisande, Nocturne, Stately Court Dance, and Grotesque. The thematic material is often slight in texture, but the rhythms and harmonies are piquant, and the orchestration fanciful and characteristic.

Another novelty was the first performance in England of a Symphony in E flat, by Stravinsky. Anyone imagining he was listening to a typical example of this composer's recent work must have been the victim of a cruel illusion, as the Symphony turned out to be a very early effort, and nowhere suggested the Stravinsky of 'Petrouchka' or 'Le Sacre du Printemps.' Being possibly written whilst the composer was studying with Rimsky-Korsakov, it was only to be expected that the influence of that master would be somewhat in evidence; but one was hardly prepared for such direct and unabashed imitations of Glazounov and Tchaikovsky as were apparent on almost every page. The inclusion of this work was an undoubted mistake, and although it exhibited some melodic charm and much effective orchestration, its educational value was infinitesimal.

Much interest was shown in the production of a new work by Percy Pitt, although a disappointment was forthcoming in the announcement that the composer was unable to conduct owing to pressure of duties at Covent Garden, and also that only a portion of the work could be given owing to the non-arrival of some of the orchestral parts. It proved to be a Suite, entitled 'Sakura,' formed from a Japanese ballet of the same name which has not yet been staged. Only three of its five movements were played, but a complete performance of the Suite, and in fact of the whole ballet, would be welcomed, as the music heard on this occasion was decidedly attractive, being picturesque and suggestive of movement and colour. The Prelude illustrates the awakening of nature with the advent of dawn, whilst the Allegretto Scherzando and the 'Pas d'action' which follow are two capitally contrasted pieces, the former suggesting the nimble evolutions of the première danseuse, and the latter expressing pantomimic action of an emotional character.

The expectations of a popular success in Percy Grainger's newly scored version of 'Molly on the Shore' were fully realised. Many preliminary announcements have heralded the introduction into this score of a new instrument—the resonophone, but this proved to be only a sort of xylophone, constructed of metal, and the part allotted to it might easily be omitted without much loss of effect. The new arrangement roused the audience to a high pitch of excitement, and an encore was inevitable; yet one could not help thinking that the original version for String quartet is more in keeping with the old fiddle-tune upon which the piece is founded.

The twenty-five members of the permanent Torquay Orchestra were augmented by forty-five players from the principal London Orchestras, and the conductors were Mr. Basil Hindenberg, the Torquay musical director, and Mr. Thomas Beecham.

The success of the Festival was due in no small measure to the highly artistic nature of Mr. Hindenberg's endeavours, which were alike noticeable in the selection of the programme items and in the ability he displayed in directing so many varied and exacting examples of modern orchestral composition. His interpretations were always sensitive and often individual, and the future work of this young English conductor will be watched with interest.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Two movements from Scriabin's Pianoforte concerto, Op. 20, were played by Miss Lilian Gaskell at Queen's Hall on April 3, when the students of the Royal Academy of Music gave an orchestral concert. The only student-composition provided was Miss Elsie Nye's 'Rhyme of the four birds,' sung by Miss Eleanor Evans. Other artists who appeared were Miss Ethel Bilsland and Miss Ida Kiddier (vocalists), Miss Evangeline Livens and Mr. Bernard Jellen (pianoforte), and Miss Muriel M. Wannell (violin). Miss Muriel Crowdy (reciter) and Mr. Gerald Harris (vocalist) took part in a performance of 'Dagobert the Jester,' with anonymous accompanying music. Sir Alexander Mackenzie conducted.

The Goldberg Prize for singing has been awarded to Raymond Ellis, of Minsk, Russia; the Charles Mortimer Prize for composition has been awarded to Alec Rowley, London; the Sterndale Bennett Prize for pianoforte has been awarded to Elsie Gregory, London; the Edward W. Nicholls Prize for pianoforte has been awarded to Florence Marr, Wimbledon.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

A performance of Berlioz's Symphony, 'Harold in Italy,' was the feature of an orchestral concert given at the College on March 24. Under Sir Charles Stanford's guidance the students played with admirable tone and execution that left nothing to be desired. The soloists of the concert were Miss Lilian Burgess, Miss Gwladys Williams (vocalists), Miss Norah M. Cordwell (pianoforte), and Miss Thelma Bentwick (violinello).

At the conclusion of the Easter Term of this College the following awards were made:

Council Exhibitions (£50) to Etty Ferguson, Eileen Fuller, Lily M. Mines, Henry E. Wilson, K. Olga Hart, Margaret H. Littlewood; the Charlotte Holmes Exhibition to Charlotte Cunningham; the Clementi Exhibition for pianoforte-playing to Mildred M. Marriott; the Organ Extemporising Prize to Sydney G. Shimmmin; the Henry Leslie (Herefordshire Philharmonic) Prize for singers to Marjory V. Lockey; the Arthur Sullivan Prize for composition to Herbert N. Howells; the Scholefield Prize for string players to Maud Gold (violin); the Dannreuther Prize for the best performance of a pianoforte concerto with orchestra to Norah M. Cordwell; the Challen & Son Gold Medal for pianoforte playing to George T. Ball; the John Hopkinson Medals for pianoforte playing to George T. Ball and Kathleen I. Long; the Gold Medal presented by the late Raja Sir S. M. Tagore, of Calcutta, for the most generally deserving pupil, to Elsie M. Dudding; the History Essay Prizes to Herbert N. Howells and Lily M. Mines; the George Carter Scholarship for students who combine organ and composition as studies to John S. Robson; the Pauer Memorial Exhibition for a pianoforte student named as Proxime in the Open Scholarship competition to Marjorie B. Wills; Prizes for elocution to T. Glyn Walters, Alice Gear, and Walter J. Saul; Prizes in the operatic class to Etty Ferguson, Charlotte Cunningham, and Stanley Vilven (for diction).

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The fruits of the capable teaching at this institution were displayed at Queen's Hall on April 8, when an orchestral concert was given under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Sachse. A number of pupils successfully underwent the trial of public performance before a large audience. Conspicuous among them was Master Richard Ball Johnson, who played with excellent feeling and freedom the first movement of Grieg's Pianoforte concerto. Another pianist who earned favour was Mr. Harold A. Wood, who revealed a useful technique in the first movement of Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Concerto. The violinists heard were Miss Evelyn Moore, who played Saint-Saëns's 'Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso,' and Miss Phyllis V. Nash, who gave a movement from Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole.' Both showed evident capacity, as did Mr. Sydney Laubach, the violoncello soloist in Volkmann's Serenade for strings, No. 3, Op. 69. The vocalists were Miss Eva S. Pocock, Miss Clarice Mills, and Mr. Frederick E. Woodhouse. Under Mr. Wilhelm Sachse's direction the capabilities of the orchestra were clearly shown in Gluck's Overture to 'Iphigenia in Aulis,' Mackenzie's 'Benedictus,' and in accompaniments to the solo music. The programme concluded with a Fantasia, Op. 42, for organ and orchestra, by Dr. C. W. Pearce, in which the themes of 'Rule, Britannia!' and 'God save the King' are ingeniously combined. The organist was Mr. William H. Bowyer.

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

An admirable performance of the first two movements from Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony formed the leading feature in the orchestral concert given by the Guildhall School of Music at Queen's Hall, on April 6, under Mr. Landon Ronald's direction. Miss Mona Cockerill played Debussy's 'Danse sacrée et danse profane' for harp, Miss Chilton-Griffin gave the first movement from Tchaikovsky's Pianoforte concerto, Mr. Carl True sang, and Master Louis Godowsky played the violin.

The School is greatly to be congratulated on the late Mr. Samuel Heilbut's bequest of £15,000 'for the advancement of musical education in connection with the Guildhall School of Music.'

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, DUBLIN.

It was stated by inadvertence in our last issue that the Rev. H. Beverunge, Professor of Sacred Chant at Maynooth College, had been appointed to the 'Chair of Music in the National University of Ireland.' The fact is that as yet there is no Chair of Music in the new Irish University, but there is a Professor of Music in University College, Cork, and now there have been added two Chairs in University College, Dublin—one of Music and the other of Irish Music. The three names submitted to the Senate for the former post were the Rev. Heinrich Beverunge, Dr. C. H. Kitson, and Mr. Robert Dwyer, while for the latter Chair the three selected names were Dr. W. H. Grattan-Flood, Mr. Carl Hardebeck, and Mr. Robert Dwyer. The voting resulted in the appointments of the Rev. H. Beverunge (Music) and Mr. Robert Dwyer (Irish Music). It may be added that Dr. Kitson and Dr. Flood were the only candidates holding musical degrees.

On April 14 Sir Frederick Bridge and Miss Marjorie Wedgwood Wood, youngest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Reginald N. Wood, of Bignall End, Staffordshire, were married at Westminster Abbey. The service music, which was sung by the Abbey choir, was arranged by Mr. E. Stanley Roper. Dr. Alcock was at the organ, and among the works he played was his 'Marche Triomphale.' The wedding ceremony was performed by the Dean of Westminster, Canon Wood, uncle of the bride, and the Rev. R. Nixon.

Mr. Thomas F. Dunhill and Miss Molly Arnold were married on April 4 at St. Luke's Church, Chelsea. The bride is a grand-daughter of Arnold of Rugby, a great-niece of Matthew Arnold, and a niece of Miss Wakefield, the founder of the Kendal Festival. The service music included Mr. Dunhill's new 'Festal Prelude.'

London Concerts.

LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY.

CONCERT-PERFORMANCE OF 'PARSIFAL.'

With characteristic boldness this resolutely managed Society gave at Queen's Hall on April 1 the first concert-performance of Wagner's music-drama that has been presented in this country since the expiration of the copyright on December 31, 1913. Many years ago the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society gave a remarkable performance of the work, but since then we believe London has only heard selections on the concert-platform. The London Choral Society's performance was given in English by English singers, the version translated by Mr. Ernest Newman being used—except by Mr. Coates, who had memorised another version. As the drama takes over four hours to perform without intervals, omissions were made in order to bring the time of performance down to about three hours and a-half. But even so we believe that the work will bear still more compression with advantage to the appreciation of the composer and in view of the receptive capacity of concert audiences.

The performance was an extraordinarily painstaking one that bore evidence of patient and skilful rehearsal. The choral parts were sung with fine sonority and fluency, and with conspicuous certainty of attack. The soloists were amongst the most capable artists to be found in this country. Miss Carrie Tubb (Kundry) was in her best form; Mr. Thorpe Bates (Amfortas) and Mr. Dawson Freer (Titurel and Klingsor) were fully efficient; and Mr. Robert Radford (Gurnemanz) sang his difficult part with fine style and impressive dignity. But the outstanding member of the cast was Mr. John Coates (Parsifal), who, singing entirely from memory, held the audience by the intimacy and intensity of his interpretation. The Flower Maidens were attractively represented by six ladies, and the 'Voices from above' were supplied by Miss Margaret Nicholls's beautifully trained children's choir, who, by the way, were too remotely placed for the voices to carry well.

The London Symphony Orchestra, led by Mr. Reed, were fine exponents of the orchestral parts, and Mr. Arthur Fagge conducted with his usual alertness. The whole performance was smooth, except perhaps for the 'bells,' which were rather a nuisance than a pleasure. Judging from the close attention of the large audience assembled, it would seem that notwithstanding its longueurs, Wagner's much-debated work has considerable attractions for a concert audience. But we adhere to our belief that for concert purposes more compression is necessary.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

This choir gave their best performance of Coleridge-Taylor's Trilogy, 'Scenes from the song of Hiawatha,' at the Royal Albert Hall on March 25. Sir Frederick Bridge conducted an interpretation that abounded in good tone and attractive expression. The solo parts were taken by Madame Gleeson-White, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Frederick Ranalow.

THE BACH CHOIR.

A Bach programme was chosen by the Bach Choir for their concert at Queen's Hall on March 24. The works included were the Overture in D, the Chromatic Fantasia for pianoforte, the Magnificat in D, the Triple concerto in A minor for pianoforte, violin, and flute, and the Violin concerto in E major. The interpretation of the Magnificat was notable for its balance and appropriateness, qualities which it owed to Dr. H. P. Allen's insight and able guidance and to the artistic work of Miss Rhoda von Glehn, Miss Dilys Jones, Mr. John Adams, and Mr. Robert Radford. Mr. Fonteyne played the oboe d'amore obbligato, and Mr. Harold Darke was at the pianoforte. The solo artists in the instrumental works were Miss Fanny Davies (pianoforte), Miss May Harrison (violin), and Mr. D. S. Wood (flute).

OXFORD HOUSE MUSICAL SOCIETY.

For the second time this organization, which draws its resources almost entirely from the East-End, chose Elgar's 'The dream of Gerontius' for the annual concert at Queen's Hall on March 23. The performance was again a remarkable tribute to the choral potentialities of London voices when guided by expert knowledge and insight. Mr. Cuthbert Kelly, the conductor, reaffirmed his great ability as a choral trainer and interpreter. The vocal tone was astonishingly good, and the interpretation was marked by many uplifting moments and a high level of appealing expressiveness. The instrumental part was executed with satisfying effect by the amateur orchestra of the Society, professionally assisted. Solo-singing of the first order was ensured by the engagement of Miss Muriel Foster, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. Frederick Ranalow.

ROYAL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

Although only familiar music was chosen for the last concert of the season on March 31, the evening was not without its sensations. One of these was Miss Muriel Foster's singing of Max Bruch's Scena, 'Aus der Tiefe des Grames,' from 'Achilleus.' It was enthralling in its dramatic power. Under Herr Mengelberg an eloquent and individual reading of Beethoven's 'Eroica' Symphony was given, interesting in detail and in breadth, if not always traditional. Mr. Frederic Lamond played Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Pianoforte concerto with great virility, but his powers were somewhat wasted on the music. Liszt's 'Les Préludes' brought the concert to an end.

QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA.

At the concert given on March 28 the programme was largely choral, the Sheffield Choral Union, trained by Dr. Coward, having been engaged. It was unfortunate that owing to a railway delay the concert began nearly half-an-hour late. This circumstance might have upset the equanimity of a less imperturbable set of singers; as it was they sang with rare spirit and high finish. The 'Song of Destiny' (Brahms) was really superbly sung, and in Beethoven's Choral Symphony they again displayed their virtuosity. A performance of Bach's Cantata, 'Weinen, Klagen,' was an interesting feature of the programme. It was given from the new edition recently prepared by Sir Henry Wood. It is true Bach, and being so, made an appeal to the lovers of that composer. The solo parts in the Choral Symphony were sung by Miss Esta D'Argo, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Herbert Heyner, and Mr. Gwynne Davies. Sir Henry Wood conducted as usual, and the Orchestra was splendid.

THE BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL.

We are able to report the first two concerts of this important series, and are glad to record their success. With the London Symphony Orchestra, well schooled in the Richter tradition, as executants, and the experienced M. Henri Verbruggen as conductor, the Symphony performances reached a high level. On April 20 the first two Symphonies were given, and on April 21 the 'Eroica.' The Pianoforte concertos were represented by the 'Emperor,' with Mr. Frederic Lamond as soloist, and the first and second, played by Herr von Dohnányi. In each case the interpretation was superb. The singers were Miss Elena Gerhardt and Miss Tilly Koenen. Large audiences attended, especially at the opening concert. The concerts took place at Queen's Hall.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

At the concert on March 30 M. Safonov was the conductor and, appropriately, Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony the centre of interest. It need hardly be said that it was an interpretation of exceptional brilliance. No soloist appeared, but a crowded audience showed full appreciation of a programme that included Mozart's Adagio and Fugue in C minor for strings, the Good Friday music from 'Parsifal,' and the Overture to 'Die Meistersinger.'

NEW SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A crowded audience attended at Queen's Hall on April 18, when the recent Tchaikovsky concert of the New Symphony Orchestra was repeated, under Mr. Landon Ronald's direction. The fifth Symphony, the 'Casse Noisette' Suite, and the B flat minor Pianoforte concerto, with Mr. Mark Hambourg as soloist, combined to form an irresistible attraction to the public, and admirable performances were the reward of those who came. A further concert was announced for May 2.

THE SHAPIRO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

This organization, which includes many lady players, gave a concert at Queen's Hall on April 4. The chief feature of the programme was Liszt's 'Eine Faust Symphony,' a representative composition that has not been performed in London for many years. Even if the work does not move one greatly, it is so full of point and interest that it was fully worthy of revival. M. Anton Maaskov is a capable violinist, and he revealed his powers in an excellent performance of Tchaikovsky's Concerto. The other items were the 'Lohengrin' Vorspiel and 'Aufforderung zum Tanz' by Weber-Weingartner. The orchestral playing was unquestionably very good, displaying at times a curious vigour that suggested an intention on the part of the ladies not to be regarded as weakly femina. Mr. George H. Shapiro conducted capably.

MR. ELLIS'S CONCERTS.

The second of Mr. F. B. Ellis's concerts of modern music took place at Æolian Hall on March 23, and was devoted to chamber works. The London String Quartet, assisted by Mr. James Lockyer as second viola, gave the first performance of a Phantasy Quintet for strings, by Dr. R. Vaughan Williams, a work that fully represents the composer's imaginative and fanciful invention and his power of sustaining and varying the interest. M. Ricardo Viñes played Ravel's 'Gaspard de la nuit' and Dukas's 'Variations, Interlude, and Finale on a theme by Rameau,' with that peculiar sensitiveness to the ways and moods of the modern French style that he has always displayed. Other works in the programme were by Hugo Wolf, Percy Grainger, and Balakirev.

The orchestral concert at Queen's Hall on March 27 was one of extreme interest. It introduced a new work of first importance—Dr. Vaughan Williams's 'London' Symphony, which is specially considered in an article on p. 310 of this issue—and it confirmed the success of Mr. Geoffrey Toye, the rising young English conductor. He directed with confidence and ability not only the Symphony, but Balakirev's 'Thamar' and Delius's 'In a summer garden,' as revised by the composer since its first performance. Mr. Ellis was the conductor in Ravel's 'Valse nobles et sentimentales,' his own orchestral version of César Franck's 'Pièce Héroïque,' and in three new songs by Arnold Bax, sung by Miss Dilys Jones.

GOOD FRIDAY CONCERTS.

At Queen's Hall on Good Friday afternoon the Queen's Hall Orchestra gave a Wagner concert under Sir Henry Wood. With the exception of three songs sung by Madame Kirkby Lunn, all the music was chosen from 'Parsifal.' In the evening a concert of sacred music took place at the same Hall, many well-known artists taking part.

At the Crystal Palace in the afternoon the Crystal Palace Choral Society and the London Symphony Orchestra under Mr. W. W. Hedgcock gave a performance of Rossini's 'Stabat Mater,' with Miss Agnes Nicholls, Madame Ada Crossley, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Robert Radford. Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Phyllis Lett, and Mr. Julien Henry also contributed to the programme. In the evening a concert was given by the band of H.M. Coldstream Guards under Lieut. Dr. J. Mackenzie Rogan.

'Messiah' was given by the Royal Choral Society at the Albert Hall in the evening, with Miss Ruth Vincent, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. John Coates, and Mr. Robert Radford as soloists, and Sir Frederick Bridge conducting.

Under Mr. Allen Gill the Oratorio was also performed by the Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society, the soloists being Miss Laura Evans-Williams, Miss Maud Wright, Mr. Frank Webster, and Mr. Herbert Brown.

National Sunday League Concerts took place at the Palladium (two), the London Opera House, and the Alhambra.

Rossini's 'Stabat Mater' and excerpts from 'Parsifal' were given at the Royal Victoria Hall.

The Classical Concerts Society brought its season to an end at Bechstein Hall on March 25 with a programme that included Brahms's String sextet, the English String Quartet, Mr. Ernest Tomlinson, and Mr. Felix Salmond being the executants. Haydn's Quartet in D minor, Op. 42, and Percy Grainger's 'Molly on the shore' were also played, and Schumann's song-cycle 'Frauenliebe und Leben' was sung by Miss Muriel Foster.

The artists brought forward by the Professional Musicians' Début Society at Æolian Hall on March 25 were Miss Lily Fairney, Mr. Emerson Abernethy, Mr. Robert Anthony (vocalists), Miss Stella Ambrose and Miss Alice Lees (violin), and Miss Irene Ward-Meyer (pianoforte). Miss Ada Forrest also contributed to the programme.

A successful concert was given at Caxton Hall, on March 25, by Barclay's Bank Musical Society, under the direction of Mr. J. W. Lewis. Conspicuous in the work of the male-voice choir was the interpretation of Elgar's songs 'From the Greek anthology,' and Félicien David's 'The desert.' The orchestra played Weber's 'Oberon' Overture and German's 'Henry the Eighth' dances, and songs were given by Miss Florence Holderness and Mr. Gwynne Davies.

Mr. Josef Holbrooke's second concert took place at the Arts Centre on March 27 with considerable success. His own works were represented by a Sextet (Op. 46) for strings and pianoforte, and a Nocturne (Op. 57, No. 1) for violin, viola, and pianoforte. Pianoforte pieces were played by Mr. Edward Mitchell, who included his own Tone-poem, 'Sunrise.' Mr. Frank Mullings gave songs, and Mr. Richard Walthew's Pianoforte trio in C minor was played. Mr. Holbrooke, who was pianist in the concerted works, was assisted by Mr. John Saunders, Mr. Charles Woodhouse (violin), Mr. Lionel Tertis (viola), Mr. Herbert Withers (violinello), and Mr. Claude Hobday (double-bass).

On April 1 the Civil Service Orchestra gave a concert at the Duke's Hall, Royal Academy of Music, in aid of the Civil Service Benevolent Fund. Haydn's second Symphony (in D), Grieg's Two melodies for string orchestra, and Max Bruch's G minor Violin concerto (with Miss Ivy Angove as soloist), were the chief features. Songs were given by Mr. Alfred Heather. Mr. Frye-Parker conducted.

The Great Eastern Railway Musical Society gave the last concert of their season at Hamilton Hall on April 1. Mr. Hubert Bath's choral work, 'Men on the line,' and various familiar orchestral works were given under Mr. W. Johnson Galloway. The soloists were Miss Lily Fairney (vocalist) and Miss Marie Novello (pianist).

Among the artists who appeared at Steinway Hall on April 1, under the auspices of the Society of Women Musicians, were Miss Helen Rootham, Mr. Falkner Lee (vocalists), Miss Edith Heymann (pianoforte), and the Lucas String Quartet. A Serenade for pianoforte and strings, by Miss Ethel Bilsland, was performed.

Gounod's second 'Messe des Orphéonistes' was given by the Stock Exchange Choral and Orchestral Society at Queen's Hall on April 2, with an orchestral score provided by Mr. Hamish MacCunn in the place of the lost version made by the composer. Mr. Frank Idle conducted the performance of this and other numbers in which the choralists were heard. Orchestral works, including Beethoven's 'Egmont' Overture, were conducted by Mr. MacCunn. The soloists of the concert were Madame Ada Crossley and Mr. Carl Goldschmidt.

M. LEO ORNSTEIN: A FUTURIST RECITAL.

It is not easy to know whether this eccentric player is to be taken seriously. At the recital he gave at Steinway Hall on April 7 he played thirty-two pieces of his own composition. As an executant he displayed some extraordinary special technique, and used it so often as to suggest that his compositions are inspired more by his peculiar command of the keyboard than by any other source. Yet here and there the small portion of the audience that listened gravely with a view to finding out whether there was any valuable imaginativeness in the music were occasionally rewarded. As for the rest of the audience, we can only enter a protest against their behaviour. If they did not want to hear M. Ornstein they could easily have stayed away. Two very shamefaced young men slunk in for a few minutes and stupidly threw something in the direction of the player, and then slunk out as though they were afraid, or, as we may hope, ashamed of their inane rudeness.

RECITALS.

Miss Mary Tomlinson sang Cornelius's 'Brautlieder' and English songs at Bechstein Hall on March 23, and violin solos were given by Miss Grace Thynne. Miss Vera Brock had the assistance of the London Symphony Orchestra under M. Safonov at Queen's Hall on March 25, when she played Concertos by Henselt (in F minor), Schumann, and Rubinstein (in G). At Steinway Hall on the same day Mr. Henry Etlin gave a recital of works transcribed for the pianoforte. Mr. F. S. Kelly gave a recital of his own compositions at Bechstein Hall on March 26. He was associated with Miss Johanne Stockmarr in the performance of his Theme, Variations, and Fugue, for two pianofortes, and songs were sung by Miss Rhoda von Glehn.

M. Scriabin's second pianoforte recital, at Bechstein Hall on March 26, strengthened the impression of the first. In a number of early 'Occasional pieces' there was the same Chopinesque manner and sentiment, spiced and often super-sweetened with more modern harmonies. Individuality and strength of appeal came in the later works, among which was the ninth Sonata (Op. 68).

At Bechstein Hall on March 28, Mr. Frederic Lamond played a Sonata by Glazounov in B flat minor, Op. 74, and a group of pieces by Vladimir Metze. Mr. Howard-Jones gave a Bach-Beethoven-Brahms programme at Bechstein Hall on March 31. A Violin sonata by Nicholas Medtner was played by Mr. Montagu Nathan and Mr. E. Parlovitz at Steinway Hall on March 31. The programme, which was devoted to Russian music, contained a number of interesting songs interpreted by Miss Alys Bateman. A similar concert is announced for May 13. Mr. Theodore Byard's singing exercised its usual attraction at Bechstein Hall on April 3. Miss Grace Lambert gave a recital of her own compositions at Queen's Hall on April 16.

Other recitals worthy of record are those of Miss Blanche Newcombe (vocalist) at Æolian Hall, on March 24; Miss Dorothea Webb (vocalist) and Miss Helen Mott (violinello) at Bechstein Hall, and Madame St. Willfort (vocalist) at Steinway Hall, on March 25; Mr. Sascha Culbertson (violin) at Bechstein Hall, and Miss Tora Hwass (pianoforte) at Æolian Hall, on March 26; Madame Anckier (harp) at Morley Hall, on March 27; Miss Johanna Heymann (pianoforte) and Mr. Edward Lamb (vocalist) at Bechstein Hall, Miss Nicola Thomas (violin) at Æolian Hall, and Mr. Henry Perry (an American bass vocalist) at Steinway Hall, on March 30; Miss Gabrielle Vallings and Mr. Frank Gleeson (vocalists) at Bechstein Hall, on March 31; Mr. Victor Benham (pianoforte) at Æolian Hall, on April 1; Miss Susanne Morvay (pianoforte) at Æolian Hall, and Miss Amy Neill (an American violinist) at Steinway Hall, on April 2; Mr. Jak van Domselaar (pianoforte) at Bechstein Hall, on April 4; Miss Vida d'Oro (vocalist) at Æolian Hall, on April 7; Miss Evelyn Starr (a Canadian violinist) at Bechstein Hall, and Herr Willy von Sadler and his pupil Herr Berthold Pusch (vocalists) at Æolian Hall, on April 8. At the recital given at Steinway Hall by Madame Lilian Ginnett (reciter) on April 4, contributions were made by Miss Joyce Urwick (violin) and Mr. Evan Morgan (vocalist).

Suburban Concerts.

The Chiswick and Gunnersbury Philharmonic Society gave an admirable performance of 'Messiah' at Chiswick Town Hall on March 25. The choir and orchestra of over two hundred performers worked together with the utmost precision both of time and expression. The choir, which was well balanced, sang with remarkable vitality and tone-colour, and their clear enunciation must also be commended. A very efficient body of soloists was found in Miss Bessie Jones, Miss Lillie Chipp, Mr. Arthur Kellet, and Mr. Walter Kingsley. Mr. David M. Davis conducted.

Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' was performed by the Teddington Philharmonic Society on April 2, under the direction of Mr. William Ratcliffe. The choir displayed good training and expressive power, and the solos were artistically interpreted by Miss Winifred Marwood, Miss Grace Hayward, Mr. Alfred Steed, and Mr. Montague Borwell.

The choir of Crouch End Congregational Church, under the direction of Mr. Josiah Booth, gave a performance of Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' and Gade's 'Spring's message,' on April 3, in the Corbyn Hall. A string orchestra led by Miss Amy Parker, with Miss Bessie Jones at the pianoforte, supplied the accompaniments in a most efficient manner. The programme also included part-songs, a violin solo ably performed by Miss Amy Parker, songs by Miss Eunice Hocking, Miss Gladys Grierson, and Mr. Fred Hard, and recitations by Miss May Scarborough.

The Balham Orchestral Society gave their third concert on April 15, at the Parochial Hall, Balham. The orchestra of forty performers played Godfrey's Prize Coronation March, Haydn's second Symphony, German's 'Nell Gwyn' Dances, and other works. Miss Marguerite Loriot contributed violin solos. The vocalists were Miss Lillie Hughes, Miss Wilhelmine Fink, and Mr. Reginald Ponson. Mr. Harry Constable was the accompanist, and Mr. Allen Brown conducted.

Sir Frederic Cowen's Cantata 'The Rose Maiden' was given by the Sydenham Choral Society at the Crystal Palace on April 18. Mr. Alfred C. Barnett conducted a creditable performance, in which Miss Maud Clough and others joined as soloists.

The Sutton Musical Society, numbering fifty-eight members, gave the Cantata 'Darkness and dawn' at the Sutton Adult School on Sunday, April 19, and sang in a most capable manner, the intonation and enunciation being very good. The soloists were Miss F. G. Nunn, Miss M. Peters, Miss W. Gale, Mr. E. Money, Mr. G. Dawson, and Messrs. G. E. and A. E. Wood. Mr. P. W. H. Carpenter conducted. There was a very large audience.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BELFAST.

The season of the Philharmonic Society concluded with a concert on March 27, at which the principal work was Elgar's 'King Olaf.' The difficulties of this fine composition are well recognised. Its preparation required long and careful training, especially by the band, which is composed largely of local musicians, many of whom are amateurs. The conductor, Mr. E. Godfrey Brown, spared neither himself nor his forces, and the result was a really admirable performance.

The soloists were Madame Ada Forrest, Mr. John Booth, and Mr. Stewart Gardner, all of whom gave complete satisfaction.

The fourth and last of Dr. Laurence Walker's chamber concerts provided performances of Dvorák's Quartet in F, Op. 96, and Schumann's Pianoforte quintet, by local artists.

On April 17 the Cathedral Evening Choir gave excellent performances of Berthold Tours's 'A Festival ode,' Bridge's 'The Inchcape rock,' and Coleridge-Taylor's

'Viking song.' Much of the singing was highly creditable in its efficiency and expression. An orchestra assisted, and solos were given by Miss Grierson, Mrs. Clarendon, Mr. R. M. Kent, and Mr. Walter A. Scott.

BIRMINGHAM.

The Birmingham Symphony Orchestra's last concert of the season was given in the Town Hall on March 21, under Mr. Julian Clifford's able conductorship. The programme was varied and representative in character, including as it did Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony, the Klingsor and Magic Garden music from 'Parsifal,' the conductor's own Intermezzo entitled 'Fairy fancies'—a pretty and dainty orchestral trifle—German's 'Coronation march,' and Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite No. 1. Mr. Arthur Cooke, the well-known pianist, played Scharwenka's Pianoforte concerto in B flat minor with remarkable brilliance, and Miss Bergitte Blakstad gave Elgar's 'Like to the damask rose' and other songs with much charm and feeling.

The last concert promoted for this season by the Birmingham Chamber Concerts Society was held as usual at Queen's College, on March 18. The Arthur Catterall Quartet played Brahms's String quartet No. 2, Op. 51, in A minor, and Novacek's String quartet No. 2 in E flat. Miss Marjorie Sotham, an excellent pianist trained in London and at Berlin, introduced Maurice Ravel's picturesque and descriptive 'Ondine,' a piece dedicated to Harold Bauer.

The customary terminal concert provided by the orchestra of the Midland Institute School of Music was given in the large lecture theatre on March 22, under Prof. Granville Bantock's direction. Mr. Herbert Simmonds sang Bach's Cantata for baritone, 'Ich will den Kreuzstab gerne Tragen,' and the chorale was sung by a double quartet, all pupils of the School. The orchestra fully realised the beauties of the orchestral score, and further did artistic work in Mozart's Symphony in D, known as the 'Parisian.' Mr. Simmonds also introduced two songs composed by students of the School of Music.

The Birmingham Festival Choral Society concluded their season's concerts with a magnificent performance of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion, given in the Town Hall on April 2. The version used was that of Sir Edward Elgar and Mr. Ivor Atkins, first introduced at the Worcester Festival. Dr. Sinclair had admirably schooled the choristers in their work, aided by Mr. Allen K. Blackall, the assistant chorus-master of the Society, in the preparation of the Passion. Many cuts were made, chorales and solos being omitted. The choir was in superb form, quite up to a festival standard, their singing being poignant, rich-toned, and clearly outlined. The principals were Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Alfred Heather, Mr. Campbell McInnes, and Mr. Robert Radford. The organist was Mr. C. W. Perkins, and the conductor Dr. Sinclair.

The Birmingham Choral and Orchestral Association provided an excellent entertainment for the masses, by giving a concert-recital of Sir Julius Benedict's romantic opera, 'The Lily of Killarney,' in the Town Hall on March 28. Mr. Joseph H. Adams conducted a really fine and impressive performance, in which the singing of the choir proved quite a feature. The cast of principals was an admirable one, and comprised Miss M. Phyllis Bradley, Madame Eunice Fowles, Miss Clarice Wheatley, Mr. Ernest Ludlow, Mr. Walter Ottey, Mr. Walter Morgan, and Mr. Herbert Simmonds. The orchestra was better and more complete than is usual at these concerts.

The Midland Musical Society once more chose Gounod's sacred Trilogy, 'The Redemption,' for performance on Good Friday evening, and attracted a crowded audience to the Town Hall. Mr. A. J. Cotton conducted, and Mr. C. W. Perkins officiated at the organ. The principals were Madame Laura Taylor, Miss Annie Watson, Miss Edith Hill, Mr. Furness Williams, Mr. Frank Macnamara, and Mr. Harry Bannister.

The Turner Opera Company gave a week's operatic season at the Prince of Wales Theatre, from April 6 to April 11. The operas staged were 'Maritana,' 'Faust,' 'Don Giovanni,' 'Cavalleria Rusticana,' 'The Daughter of the Regiment,' 'Ernani,' and 'The Lily of Killarney.'

BOURNEMOUTH.

British music has been particularly prominent at the recent Symphony Concerts. It has been represented by Dr. Ethel Smyth's Prelude, 'On the cliffs,' a Phantasy-overture (first performance) by Reginald Steggall, the 'Troubadour' Suite and the 'Pibroch' Suite for violin and orchestra, by Sir Alexander Mackenzie, and a Violin concerto (also the first performance) by G. O'Connor-Morris, which was well played by Mr. Bertram Lewis. These last four works were conducted by their composers, and the able soloist in the 'Pibroch' music was Mr. Rowsby Woof. The programmes have also included Dukas's 'L'Apprenti Sorcier,' Beethoven's fourth Symphony, Borodin's B minor Symphony, the C minor Symphony of Brahms, Debussy's 'L'Après-midi d'un Faune,' and the 'Eroica' Symphony of Beethoven. At the twenty-fourth concert, Dvorák's beautiful Violoncello concerto lost none of its human appeal in the clever hands of Mr. Arnold Trowell, and on April 9 Mrs. Farnell-Watson gave an excellent interpretation of Schumann's Pianoforte concerto.

The element of variety has been well maintained at the Monday 'Pops.' On March 16 we were shown the 'evolution of the Ballet,' on March 23 there was a Mozart-Weber programme, that given on March 30 illustrated the 'evolution of the Concert-overture,' and on April 6 the programme was chosen from Wagner.

The above concerts, however, have not monopolised musical interest altogether. Enthusiasm was aroused, for instance, by the presence at the Municipal Orchestra's Benefit Concert with Sir Henry Wood, who gave us some beautiful interpretations during the course of a fine Wagner programme; Miss Ada Forrest and Mr. Thorpe Bates sang. The first concert by students of the Bournemouth School of Music, the flourishing institution founded and directed by Mrs. Farnell-Watson and Mr. Hamilton Law, attracted a large audience; both the latter and the critics were apparently surprised at the prowess shown by the pupils in a first-class and exacting programme. Some seventeen students out of the seventy now studying at the School appeared, and all won credit for the unusual ability they displayed. Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto was admirably played by Isolde Menges on her return visit here, Miss Eileen Boyd giving pleasure by her singing at the same concert. Other events have comprised an orchestral concert given by W. H. Squire, a 'ballad concert' given by Mr. Peter Dawson and party, and an attractive pianoforte recital by Susanne Morvay—who for the major part justified the eulogiums that have been passed upon her. Lastly, we would record the artistic results obtained at the recital by Mr. Sydney Rosenbloom, pianist, and Miss Bettina Freeman, soprano, on April 8.

BRISTOL.

The Bristol Dolphin Male-Voice Choir gave their annual concert on March 25 at the Hall of the Young Men's Christian Association, and under the direction of Mr. F. H. Simpson performed several part-songs creditably. Solos were given, and Mr. W. C. Allen was accompanist.

On March 31 a miscellaneous concert was given in the lesser Colston Hall, where a large audience appreciated songs by Miss Pauline Allen, Miss Dora Bubbear, Miss Lionel Venn, and Mr. Lionel Doré, and solos by Mr. Russell Justham (pianoforte) and Mr. Spencer Parker (violin).

The Bristol Choral Society gave their last concert of the season on April 4, and Colston Hall was crowded for the occasion. Wagner's 'Parsifal' was performed in its entirety, Mr. George Risely conducting. The band and choir numbered 600. The soloists were Mr. Frederic Austin (Amfortas), Mr. Robert Radford (Titirel and Gurnemanz), Mr. Charles Knowles (Klingsor), and Madame Kirkby Lunn (Kundry). A fine performance of the work was listened to with the utmost attention by the audience.

At the last Clifton Chamber Concert of the season, on April 6, there was a large attendance in the Victoria Rooms. The players were Messrs. Herbert Parsons (pianoforte), Maurice Alexander and Edgar Hawke (violins), Alfred Best (viola), and Percy Lewis (violoncello). Excellent interpretations were given of the Quartet in B flat major (Op. 67) by Brahms, Dvorák's Trio in C major (Op. 74) for two violins and viola, and Novak's Quintet in A minor (Op. 12).

The concert in aid of the Orphan and Benevolent Fund of the National Union of Railwaymen, given at Colston Hall on Good Friday, was very largely attended, and the arrangements under the direction of Mr. H. Mayo afforded satisfaction. Miss Doris Carter, Miss Lucy Nuttall, and Mr. Anderson Nicol were the vocalists, and at intervals the Bristol and Clifton Orchestral Society, with Mr. Edward Pavey as conductor, played favourite works.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

A number of small events, many of them connected with Good Friday and the Easter Festival, have made up a fair quantity of music performed in the South West during the past month. But with one exception there has been no enterprise towards progress, and those who are interested in the practice and performance of music—whether of necessity or in choice of a hobby—seem content that each year shall be more or less a repetition of the last. The one exception is notable, and is, of course, the Torquay Festival, of which a report appears elsewhere in these columns. The direct and indirect success of the Festival arouses the question, Why in other seaside places with like natural advantages, is there not found energy for similar enterprise?

THE THREE TOWNS.

Morley Congregational Choir made an unusual effort with the performance of a Cantata, 'Nicodemus,' on March 18, with outside help in the solo work. Their singing was very creditable. Mr. Reginald Waddy conducted, and Mr. R. F. Legg, organist of the church, assisted. The Plymouth Male-Voice Choir, conducted by Mr. David Parker, supplied the weekly Corporation Concerts on March 28, their most important selections being Hegar's 'The phantom host,' Elgar's 'The Reveille,' and Grieg's 'Landerkennung.' The annual Lenten musical service at Mutley Wesleyan Church, on Palm Sunday, consisted of a performance of 'The Redemption.' The home choir was joined by that of Saltash Wesleyan Church, and Mr. W. J. Wibberley, organist at Mutley, conducted a performance which had many good features. Mr. David Parkes was at the organ. The performance was repeated at Saltash on Good Friday. Some good choral singing was heard in Ebenezer Wesleyan Church on April 8, when the choir, conducted by Mr. David Parkes, gave 'Elijah,' the voices numbering 130. Mr. Arthur Coombe led the band, and Mr. Stanley Parsonson was at the organ.

On Good Friday 'The Crucifixion' was sung severally by the choirs of St. Simon's (Mr. W. G. Nelder), Charles Church (Mr. Dyer Smith), St. Martin's (Mr. W. P. Toby), St. Nicholas (Mr. C. Jeffery), St. George's (the Vicar), and the Dockyard Church (Mr. G. Hele). 'Olivet to Calvary' was given at Emmanuel Church (Mr. Manley Martin), 'Gethsemane to Golgotha' at St. Matthias (Mr. E. L. Goodall), 'Penitence, Pardon, and Peace' at St. Catharine's (Mr. E. W. Baker).

A sacred concert in King Street Wesleyan Church (Mr. H. Woodward) included 'Hear my prayer' and choruses from 'The Redemption' and 'Messiah.' Mount Gold Wesleyan Choir were conducted by Mr. N. H. R. Normington in a performance of 'The Holy City,' and Embankment Road United gave 'St. Paul,' under the direction of Mr. E. E. Nicholls. A special service of music arranged by Mr. H. Moreton, in St. Andrew's Church, consisted of numbers from 'Messiah' and 'The Redemption,' and anthems by Goss and Mozart.

The Great Western Male Choir were the chief performers at a concert at Stonehouse on April 15, and anthems were sung on that occasion by the choir of the United Methodist Church. The reopening of St. Peter's organ after extensive treatment by the cleaners and builders, Messrs. Hele & Sons, took place on April 15, a recital being given by Mr. John Hele.

The Extempore Chamber Music Club, evolved last October from an informal private party, have more than justified their formation. Meetings have been held at frequent irregular intervals, and works by Ravel, Debussy, César Franck, Strauss, Smetana, Glazounov, and Taneiev have been added to the library and repertoire. The playing members,—Messrs. Reginald Ball, Arthur Coombe, Leighton Fouracre, Charles Pike, and Dr. Harold Lake,—have greatly advanced in the matter of ensemble.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

The south-west section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians heard a lecture on 'Debussy,' given by Dr. E. Markham Lee, at Exmouth, on April 4.

The latest development of the Torquay Municipal Music Department has been the formation of a Municipal Choir, who made a first appearance and a good impression in a concert-performance of 'Merrie England,' on March 25. Mr. E. W. Goss was chorus-master, and the choir of 130 voices did credit to his training. The Municipal Band assisted, and Mr. Basil Hindenberg conducted. The speculation as to the ultimate use of this Choir, should it prove efficient, in connection with the Festival scheme suggests interesting possibilities.

On Good Friday 'The Crucifixion' was sung at St. Leonard's Church, Newton Abbot, and 'Olivet to Calvary' at Totnes Parish Church (Mr. H. Worth).

On April 15th Ottery St. Mary Choral Society gave a concert-performance of 'The Princess of Kensington,' conducted by Mr. Stanley Chipperfield. A collection of 16th-century madrigals comprised an interesting second part. 'Walpurgis Night' was very creditably sung by Chagford Choral Society on April 15. Mr. R. Percy Collings unfortunately had a smaller choir than usual under his baton, and it is much to be hoped that this interesting Society will revive in numbers. A number of children sang 'The festival of the flowers' in Totnes Baptist Church on March 26; 'Olivet to Calvary' was given by the choir of St. Paul's Church, Honiton, on April 8 (Mr. H. E. Carnell); 'The Crucifixion' was sung on the same evening in All Saints' Church, Torre (Mr. Winship). A choir and orchestra of sixty-six performed Jamouneau's Cantata 'The Saviour of men' at Heavitree on April 10, Mr. Charles Stait conducting.

Torquay has been favoured with two chamber music events during the month. On April 2 the persevering Haydn String Quartet, now in their eighth season, played Glazounov's Op. 26 and Beethoven's Op. 18 (C minor). Mr. J. P. Curran sang a cycle of French songs and a set of old English Airs. On April 18, the day following the Festival, the London String Quartet at two concerts played Dohnányi's Op. 15 (D flat), Beethoven's Op. 18, Tchaikovsky's Op. 11 (in D), and the Schönberg String sextet in D minor, Op. 4 (assisted by Messrs. James Lockyer and Cedric Sharpe).

CORNWALL.

Performances of the Cantata 'Meadowfield,' by Treligge United Methodist Church; of 'The Captive Maid' by a choir at Claremont, Newquay; and of two operettas by children at Looe, severally took place on March 18. The United Wesleyan choirs of St. Just circuit sang anthems and choruses on March 24. Anthems and part-songs by Mr. Hawke's Male Choir made an interesting event at Delabole on March 25, and when the United Methodist choirs of Hayle, Highlanes, and Ventonleague combined in anthems and choral singing at Hayle on March 26, the result was inspiring. Camborne Adult Choir gave a good account of themselves on April 2, and on the same date Penmarth Wesleyan choir sang a Cantata 'Rhoda.' Cawsand Male Choir sang on April 3, conducted by Mr. S. J. Langdon, and Delabole Male Choir on April 13, conducted by Mr. Hawk. A new Male Choir have made a welcome appearance at Mabe, and their singing of part-songs, on April 14, showed that they had made a good start under Mr. E. Spargo. The usual occurrence of the performance of Bach Church cantatas deserves a special word of commendation of Newquay Wesleyan choir, for on April 15 they sang 'God's time is the best,' and others, under the direction of Mr. Tonking, who also played organ solos. Miss Maria Yelland was the principal vocalist.

At Penzance on March 20 a chamber concert was given by Miss Ethel Tonking (pianoforte), Miss Ethel Grevelink (pianoforte), and Miss F. Treloar (vocalist). The works for two pianofortes were by Grieg, Saint-Saëns, Sinding, and Liszt; and Miss Tonking played solos by Cyril Scott, Scarlatti, and MacDowell. Looe Orchestral Society performed a varied selection of pieces on April 16, and three items were contributed to the programme by Looe Male Vocal Quartet.

EDINBURGH.

On March 19 Mr. Little's Select Choir gave an enjoyable part-song concert, the outstanding items of which were Elgar's 'O happy eyes,' and C. Macpherson's arrangement of 'There's nae luck about the hoose.'

Broughton Place Choral Society, under the baton of Dr. Ross, gave an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' on March 26. The soloists were Miss Chrissie Stephen, Mrs. Macfarlane, Mr. Andrew Hastie, and Mr. J. Burnett.

On March 25 Mr. Moonie's Choir submitted, as usual, a programme of 'first performances' at Edinburgh: Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' Hamilton Harty's 'The Mystic Trumpeter,' and a setting of Highland songs by the conductor. All three works met with universal approval, and the singing of the choir reached a very high level. The soloists were Miss Jean Gibson, Mr. George Campbell, Mr. Wilson Thornton, and Mr. Lewys James. All assisted materially in making this concert one of the most successful of the season. Special mention must be made of 'The Highland Gems' of Mr. Moonie. He has done much in this style of work, and always with a fine sense of choral effect. The fact that 'The Gems' did not suffer when sung between two such works as mentioned above is the greatest compliment that can be paid to the arranger. The soloists were Miss Cleugh, Miss Gentle, Mr. Oldham, and Mr. Campbell.

On April 1 the Western Choral Society submitted another interesting programme: Jensen's 'Feast of Adonis,' Cowen's 'John Gilpin,' and W. B. Moonie's 'Glenara.' The soloists were Miss Alice Cleugh, Miss N. Ritchie, and Mr. Wilson Thornton. Mr. W. B. Moonie, the conductor, is rapidly developing as a composer. 'Glenara' is a work of very considerable dramatic power with a delightful orchestral score—a score which reveals in many places a fine sense of artistic restraint.

On April 4, the Y.M.C.A. Choral Society, which was referred to last year as promising well, gave a performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'The death of Minnehaha.' The choir was well balanced and sang with evidence of careful preparation. Mr. Winning is to be congratulated on his second session's work as conductor. Miss Kate Wallace and Mr. Philip Malcolm gave artistic interpretations of the solo parts.

The third concert of the Amateur Orchestral Society was given on April 6. Miss Effie Cotton, a light soprano, gave a charming interpretation of Landon Ronald's Scena 'Adonais,' with orchestral accompaniment. The chief orchestral features of the programme were Saint-Saëns's Symphony No. 2, Elgar's 'Dream Children,' and Dvorák's 'Notturmo,' Op. 40. Mr. Collinson conducted.

GLASGOW.

On March 24, Mrs. Kennedy-Fraser, assisted by her daughter, Miss Eilidh Kennedy-Fraser, and her sister, Miss Margaret Kennedy, gave a most delightful lecture-recital of 'Songs of the Hebrides,' which she has collected in the Western Isles of Scotland. Of the eighteen songs comprising the programme, seven are still in manuscript, and were given for the first time. Apart from the quaintness of these old melodies, they gain in interest by the singularly apt pianoforte accompaniments to which Mrs. Kennedy-Fraser has wedded them, and what are really folk-songs become art-songs. All were sung with the proper note of sympathy.

The Glasgow Amateur Orchestral Society's concert took place on April 2. The programme contained two novelties, viz., the Overture to Count Alfieri's Tragedy 'Saul,' by Antonio Bazzini, and a 'Suite de Ballet' drawn from Messager's 'Les deux Pigeons.' In these and also in some familiar numbers, the playing of the band was marked by considerable intelligence, although at times betraying weaknesses common to amateur players. Mr. H. W. Cole was conductor, and Mr. William Hayle gave some vocal solos with good effect.

The Easter concert of the Bach Choir was given in the Cathedral on April 7, when one of the Choir's most successful performances has to be recorded. The works presented were the Cantatas 'God's time is the best' and 'O Light Everlasting,' the Magnificat in D, and 'An Easter Dialogue' by Heinrich Schütz (1585-1672). The fine balance of parts and the excellent tone and choral technique were notable features, especially in 'O Light Everlasting.' Mr. J. M. Diack conducted, and Mr. Herbert Walton played the organ accompaniments with perfect taste.

An event of considerable importance was the performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius' by the Hamilton Choral Society on April 8. This Society, under the enlightened guidance of Mr. T. S. Drummond, the conductor, endeavours to soar beyond the flights of ordinary provincial Societies, and the selection of Elgar's fine work, which appeals to contemplative as well as to musical minds, was fully justified by the enthusiastic appreciation with which the performance was received. The soloists were Miss Catherine Mentiplay and Messrs. Henry Brearley and Philip Malcolm. A very efficient orchestra led by Mr. Richard Daeblitz gave the instrumental part.

With the advent of Easter the musical season practically ends, the only remaining event of importance being the fourth annual Choral (Competitive) Festival, which takes place on May 1 and 2, and for which the number of entries shows a gratifying increase over former years.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

At the twelfth and closing concert of the Philharmonic Society's seventy-fifth season on March 24, Mendelssohn's 'Scotch' Symphony was revived, to the satisfaction of a great number. Another item was Mr. Balfour Gardiner's exhilarating 'Overture to a Comedy,' which created a highly favourable impression. The vocalist was Madame Donalda. Wieniawski's Violin concerto No. 2, in D, was cleverly played by M. Paul Kochanski. Three of Max Bruch's 'Hebrew Melodies' for chorus and orchestra were conducted by Mr. Harry Evans, 'On Jordan's Banks' being, as usual, encored. In the remainder, Mr. Landon Ronald conducted.

A performance of Brahms's 'Requiem' which will long remain in memory was given by the Welsh Choral Union, under Mr. Harry Evans, on March 28, the soloists being Madame Alice Wilna and Mr. Robert Radford. The day has long gone by since technicalities could deter singers of the calibre of the Welsh Choral Union, who caught the mood of the calmly beautiful 'How lovely are Thy dwellings' no less surely than the grandeur and exaltation of the fugal 'Lord, Thou art worthy of praise.' The singers again exhibited their unique reserves of expression and tonal splendour. The Novello edition of the 'Requiem' was used, with the improved English version, and Mr. Ernest Newman's reprinted admirable preface made the official book of the words most helpful to a very large audience.

By their choice of Mozart's 'Requiem' and the Passion music from 'Messiah' for their second concert on March 30, the Catholic Philharmonic Society did not greatly attract the general public, for the attendance was less by far than the interesting performance deserved. The Catholic community here are not doing their duty by the well-trained choral combination which the ability and labours of Mr. H. P. Allen have called into existence. It is a choir which contains excellent material, and could ill be spared from the musical organizations of the city. Adequate vocal principals were engaged in Miss Edith McCullagh, Miss Dilys Jones, Mr. John Booth, and Mr. Hamilton Harris. Mr. Akeroyd led the orchestra, which combined with Mr. Alfred Benton at the organ in a clever performance of Handel's fourth Organ concerto in F.

The time-honoured Good Friday free performance of 'Messiah' was given in St. George's Hall, when a choir organized by Mr. W. J. Riley, of the Philharmonic Society, was conducted by Mr. Branscombe, with the City organist, Mr. Ellingford, at the organ. The vocal principals were Madame Alice Phillips, Miss Sara Silvers, Mr. Roland Jackson, and Mr. Frederick Grisewood. On Good Friday evening the Liverpool Choral Society sang Rossini's 'Stabat Mater,' followed by Sullivan's 'The Prodigal Son' under the direction of Mr. Percival Ingram. The solo-singers were Miss Constance Forrest, Miss Elsie Hulme Jones, Mr. Arnold Halstead, and Mr. Ramsey Clarke.

Another interesting Good Friday performance was that given by the Liverpool Village Choir, conducted by Mr. R. T. Edwards, whose selections included Schubert's 'Coronach' and Hiller's 'He in tears that soweth.' In the churches Stainer's 'Crucifixion' received many performances. A less conventional choice was made at Runcorn Parish Church, where Mr. Boraston's choir acquitted themselves well in Spohr's 'Calvary.'

Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' was sung by the Ormskirk Musical Association on April 2, and by the Warrington Musical Society on March 25. In the former instance the performance was directed by Mr. John Ball, with Miss Lilian Dillingham and Mr. Sam Hempsall as vocal soloists; while at Warrington Mr. Frank Crossley conducted the choir and orchestra of 200 performers, with Miss Mary Huxley, Miss Wilkinson, and Mr. John Adams as vocal principals. A feature of the miscellaneous music at this concert was the singing of Dr. James Lyon's melodious and effective part-song (in eight parts) 'Autumn moon,' specially written for the Warrington choir.

At the annual meeting of the Liverpool Church Choir Association, held in the Town Hall on March 30, it was made known that the financial result of the recent Festival was less satisfactory than the musical success, for a loss of twenty-three pounds was reported. The last three Festivals have resulted in deficits, but the previous three showed surpluses. Preparation for the fourteenth Festival will be made in the hope that the tide of public favour will turn once more.

The programmes of the closing concerts of three flourishing orchestral Societies mainly comprised of amateur players—the Societa Armonica, the Oxtan and Claughton, and the Liscard,—exhibited in no uncertain way the advance made in amateur taste and technique in quite recent times. The first-named was heard on March 21 in Cherubini's 'Anacreon' Overture, Tchaikovsky's fourth Symphony, three movements from MacDowell's strongly individual 'Indian' Suite, and Schumann's A minor Pianoforte concerto, Mr. Frederick Brandon being the soloist. Mr. Ivor Foster sang. The Oxtan and Claughton Society, conducted by Mr. James E. Matthews, also chose Tchaikovsky's F minor Symphony and the Schumann Pianoforte concerto, their soloist being Mrs. E. W. Morrice, a fluent and graceful player. The vocalist was Mr. Roland Jackson.

On the same evening, April 4, the Liscard Society, conducted by Mr. Philip Smart, closed their seventeenth season with a programme containing examples of Weber, Beethoven, Svendsen, and Coleridge-Taylor. Miss Elsie Chadwick played Mendelssohn's 'Capriccio Brillant' with the orchestra, Mr. Edward Stansfield gave examples of his skill on the double-bass, and Miss Dorothy Freeman contributed vocal items.

A new combination, the Liverpool Trio—Mr. J. P. Sheridan (violin), Mr. Walter Hatton (violinello), and Mr. Douglas Miller (pianoforte)—were heard to advantage in the Beethoven Trio in B flat, Op. 97, and other music, in the Yamen Rooms, on April 6. At their concert in the saloon of the Philharmonic Hall, on April 2, Mr. Vivian Burrows (violin) and Mr. Frederic Brandon (pianoforte) exhibited their artistic qualifications especially well in Mr. Brandon's new Sonata for violin and pianoforte, a clever work showing modern influences.

Mr. Vasco V. Akeroyd, the well-known violinist and conductor of the Akeroyd Symphony Orchestra, the Societa Armonica, and the Blundellsands Orchestral Society, was chief guest at a complimentary dinner held in his honour at the Midland Adelphi Hotel on April 7.

A performance of Handel's 'Saul,' with orchestral accompaniments, was given by the St. John's, Egremont, Choral Society on April 20, conducted by Mr. W. Biller, the vocal principals being Miss Isabel Fell, Miss Ruby MacMahon, Mr. Spencer Hayes, and Mr. James C. Brien.

The Moody-Manners Opera Company on April 17 produced Kienzl's Opera 'The pious beggar' (Der Evangelimann) for the first time in English at Kelly's Theatre. The success which has attended the production of the same composer's opera 'Der Kuhreigen' (The dance of Death) has apparently stimulated Mr. Charles Manners in reviving the earlier opera, which has already been heard in London,—but without receiving the appreciation it meets with on the Continent, where it is a recognised favourite. The story of the opera is somewhat conventional, and the first Act deals with the rivalry of two brothers for the love of the same maiden. Matthias, the successful suitor, is wrongfully accused by the treachery of his brother, and cast into prison. In despair his sweetheart drowns herself, and in the second Act, which opens after thirty years are supposed to have elapsed, Matthias appears, an aged and broken man in the streets of Vienna, as an 'Evangelmann' or 'Pious beggar,' one who ekes out a scanty livelihood by singing sacred songs and scripture texts. The hand of fate directs him to the deathbed of his erring brother, who before his death unburdens his guilt and remorse to the unfortunate Matthias, from whom he receives forgiveness. This harrowing story is relieved in the opera by two striking episodes—the villagers' bowling contest in the first Act, and in the second Act the song of the Pious Beggar and children, 'Blessed are the persecuted.' The music, without achieving greatness, is melodious and entirely appropriate to the action. A symphonic orchestra is necessary for its interpretation, and in this direction the performance was not beyond criticism, but otherwise it was extremely good, especially in the forceful representation of the parts of the brothers Matthias and Johannes given by Messrs. Frank Christian and Charles Moorhouse respectively. The chorus also deserve commendation for their excellent singing. The opera, conducted by Mr. Hans Winter, was well staged.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

Viewed in retrospect the season has revealed the increasing hold of popular orchestral concerts on the public of Manchester and the surrounding areas, and there is ample ground for belief that the time is opportune for another forward march in the direction of making our two series of 'Proms.' more symphonic in character. In the early days of the Wood-Robert Newman régime at the Queen's Hall, festina lente proved a sound guiding principle, and once Sir Henry Wood feels sure of his grip of the Manchester public and of its attachment to him, we may rest assured he will forge ahead in this direction; but in this connection we must not forget that the Spelman 'Proms.' for nine long and (in some respects) somewhat discouraging years, did a lot of hard spade-work, and most Manchester music-lovers will hope that both this and the Brand Lane combination may long be able to work side by side.

The Hallé Society's Orchestra has fulfilled over fifty engagements during the winter, a figure never before attained and due in no small degree to the policy of a weekly wage for the players inaugurated by Balling. The effect of the additional rehearsals, also secured under this new system, has been manifest on many occasions, and the Orchestra's versatility is incomparably greater than at any period in the last twenty years.

Joint rehearsals of the Orchestra and Choir present some difficulties in this business community, the usual mid-day rehearsal on the day of the concert finding many singers fast at work. Only part of the choir could muster when the joint practice was tried, on the occasion of Verdi's 'Requiem.' For the Wagnerian operatic concert which closed the season, much better results were obtained from a Saturday afternoon rehearsal. These tentative moves towards a solution of the problem are all to the good.

To the names of past leaders of the Hallé Orchestra—Strauss, Willy Hess, Risegari, and Brodsky—we must now add that of Rawdon Briggs, who leaves the band to devote his time more exclusively to solo work and chamber-music. In the latter branch of his art he not only plays second violin in the Brodsky Quartet, but leads a Quartet bearing his own name. As to the future, it is authoritatively stated that a player of European fame has been approached to fill the vacancy, but no clue is available as to his identity.

Interesting advance indications as to next season continue to appear from time to time: Brand Lane has arranged for Sir Henry Wood to conduct Schönberg's Five orchestral pieces; Balling is said to be contemplating the production at either a Hallé or Gentlemen's Concert of a Symphony by Mr. Harry Baynton Power. Nothing of greater dimensions than a concerto or suite has yet had such an honour at either of these series of concerts.

Mr. Walter S. Nesbitt takes high rank here as a Reger enthusiast, and he contemplates introducing to England through the medium of his Manchester Orpheus Choir, that composer's recent 'Die Weihe der Nacht' (Op. 119), for contralto solo and men's choir and orchestra, possibly also the earlier 'Hymn to Song'—this conjunction of the earlier and later manners having exceptional interest.

Following closely on the heels of the concert season came an opportunity to test our New Theatre, from an acoustic-operatic point of view. The Moody-Manners series of performances demonstrated clearly its entirely satisfactory character for seeing as well as hearing.

Unlike London and many Continental centres, Manchester's interest in music appears to be limited to the period from October to Easter. It can hardly be the case that the musical part of our population has no love for summer-time music; more likely it is merely convention and routine, like August summer holidays. But if people will go in large numbers to hear music at Blackpool or Harrogate in the dog-days, it needs no great effort of the imagination to perceive possibilities, artistic and financial, in orchestral concerts during June and July. Some day an entrepreneur will seize his chance.

Pressure of space recently has forbidden more than an occasional reference to the activities of the Manchester Musical Society, the pivot round which much unostentatious but very valuable propagandist work has revolved. Quite typical of its activities was the Lieder-abend at which closer acquaintance was made with the highly exotic art of Theodor Streicher, as well as with little-known songs of Wolf, Delius, and Strauss. Mr. Charles Neville and Mr. Samuel Langford, as respectively vocalist and translator-annotator-accompanist, have both on previous occasions laid us under a great debt of obligation in thus opening up fresh avenues of artistic experience.

The Manchester School of Music students chose Mackenzie's 'Colomba' for their annual operatic performance, on April 4, at the Midland Hotel Theatre. Some of Mr. Cross's students displayed possibilities—notably Miss Shuttleworth, a young contralto. This school of music differs from some institutions, in that it affords opportunities for study and musical education at all hours of the day,—often after a hard day's business has been done.

The annual orchestral concert of the Royal Manchester College, on April 2, attracted so large an audience that the Whitworth Hall of the University proved insufficient accommodation. The only student's composition performed was a 'Fantasie' for violin and orchestra, by Mr. F. Anderson-Tyrer. The solo part is rather too frequently overweighted, but this apart, the composer is felt to be quite sure of himself. Dr. Brodsky's pupil, Mr. Frank Tippin, played the solo part. Besides this composition, Mr. Tyrer played with considerable brilliance in the last two movements of Tchaikovsky's Pianoforte concerto.

The Altrincham Amateur Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. C. H. Fogg, has now completed its tenth season, and at its last concert played the Nocturne from Sibelius's 'King Christian II.' Suite, some dances from Bantock's early 'Cossack' Suite, and the conductor's new Overture 'Castalia.'

The remarkable standard of singing evolved by Miss Say Ashworth from members of the Manchester and Salford Girls' Institute was exhibited in the Free Trade Hall at the annual choir recital. Three choirs took part, and the music was of the highest order.

NEWCASTLE.

The Armstrong College Choral Society gave their twenty-second annual concert on Wednesday, March 18, in the King's Hall. The programme included Bach's Cantata 'Thou Guide of Israel,' the Motet 'The Spirit also helpeth us,' and Von Holst's 'Cloud Messenger.' Songs by Dvorák, Schönberg, Wolf, and Cyril Scott were sung by Miss Stelling and Mr. Potts. Mr. W. G. Whittaker conducted.

On April 1 a concert of extreme interest was given by the Choral Union, the programme containing a large selection of madrigals and part-songs, besides Bach's 'Sing ye to the Lord.' Three part-songs by César Cui were heard for the first time in England. Dr. Coward conducted. Two of Beethoven's Violoncello and Pianoforte sonatas were played by MM. Belousoff and Safonov.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

On March 25 the last concert of the Subscription series for the season brought Sir Henry Wood and the Queen's Hall Orchestra—always a welcome visit. An excellent programme included Sir Henry's arrangement of Bach's Toccata in F, Tchaikovsky's Symphony in F minor, Beethoven's Rondo in E flat for wind instruments, Bach's Gavotte in E for strings, Svendsen's 'Carnival in Paris,' and a selection from 'Die Meistersinger.' It was somewhat to be regretted that the last concert of the Sacred Harmonic Society took place so soon afterwards as the next evening. The chief feature of this occasion was a performance of Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater.' In its choral aspects it was delightful, but the orchestral effects suffered by comparison with the Queen's Hall players. Miss Emily Shepherd stepped into the breach occasioned by Miss Carrie Tubb's indisposition, and sang the soprano music excellently; her associates were Miss Alice Lakin, Mr. Joseph Cheetham, and Mr. Thorpe Bates.

The Alfreton Choral Society gave a performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast,' under the guidance of Mr. C. Robinson, on March 23, when the tenor solos were interpreted by Mr. R. Riley to the satisfaction of all. A miscellaneous selection followed, in which Mr. Riley and Miss Winifred Elliott (contralto) contributed effective solos.

At Halifax Place Mission on Palm Sunday, Maunder's 'Olivet to Calvary' was sung at the evening service. The solos were ably performed by Mr. Franklin Pearson, Mr. Joseph Asher, and Mr. Harry Phoenix, the organ accompaniment being played by Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson. Mr. E. M. Barber was the conductor.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

To wind-up a successful season the Sheffield Musical Union gave what on its choral side was a memorable performance of Bach's Mass in B minor. One of its several satisfying features was the ideal balance of parts in the five-part chorus. In the Kyrie the strong section of sopranos bore division without, as often happens, impairing the equality of the distributed parts. Dr. Coward drove his choir through the 'Cum Sancto Spiritu' at an alarming speed, and it speaks well for the virtuosity of the singers that the chorus was completed without unsteadiness or lack of clearness. Similar daring tactics were adopted in the 'Et Resurrexit,' the opening of which, after a moving performance of the 'Crucifixus,' was the acme of unanimous attack. The beauty of tone and the deep expressiveness in the opening of 'Et Incarnatus' marked the summit of the choir's performance in that direction. Save for an unexpected lack of sonority in the 'Sanctus,' the majesty of the choral singing was equal to the splendid traditions of the Musical Union. The soloists were Miss Edith McCullagh and Miss Helen Anderton, Mr. Webster Millar and Mr. Hubert Brown. Mr. J. F. Staton was at the organ.

The fifth season of Orchestral Promenade Concerts was brought to a close by an attractive concert in the Albert Hall, on March 31. The growing popularity of these concerts was shown by the fact that for the whole series the higher-priced seats were sold out before the first concert. It is the 'shilling' public of Sheffield which has not yet realised their real character. Debussy's 'L'Après-midi d'un Faune' serves to reveal the quality of the best division of the orchestra—the wood-wind, a section which will bear comparison with any in the provinces. Elgar's 'Wand of Youth' Suite (No. 2), Tchaikovsky's 'Casse Noisette' Suite, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and other works were also played in neat and refined style. Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman played Arensky's romantic Concerto, and the Hon. Mrs. Maurice Drummond sang. Mr. J. A. Rodgers conducted.

An enthusiastic and yet reverent spirit ran through the Rotherham Choral Society's performance of Brahms's 'Requiem.' Mr. T. Brameld, the conductor, leans to vigour in his choral interpretations, as was shown in the 'Hymn of Praise' which followed, but in the Brahms work a suitable reticence, particularly where the choir attended the soloist, was not neglected. Miss Dorothy Silk was appropriately spiritual in the soprano solo, and Mr. Robert Charlesworth declaimed the baritone solos very impressively. Mr. Gwynne Davies was the soloist in the 'Hymn of Praise.'

A flourishing suburban choral Society at Hillsborough performed Goring Thomas's 'The swan and the skylark' with point and general care as to accuracy and expression. Mr. F. A. Smith conducted. The Shiregreen Choral Society, which Mr. Gregory zealously directs, performed 'St. Paul' very bravely, showing promise of further development. Among other local performances may be named those of F. C. Woods's 'King Harold,' at Woodseats (Mr. W. Ludgate), and Sterndale Bennett's 'The May Queen' (Mr. J. C. Simon), by the St. Oswald's Choral Society. Mr. Alfred Barker showed further progress in his conducting of the neat and well-studied playing of the Sheffield Amateur Instrumental Society in Beethoven's C minor Symphony and other works. Miss Bettina Freeman sang ballads.

YORKSHIRE.

The most striking event of the month at Leeds has been the concert of the Philharmonic Society on March 25, when Mr. Fricker conducted a fine performance of Wolf-Ferrari's Cantata, 'La vita nuova,' the originality and charm of which made a strong impression on the audience. It was followed by a selection from César Franck's 'Beatitudes,' the Prologue and four of the Beatitudes being given. Miss Carrie Tubb, Messrs. S. S. Coltham, Thorpe Bates, and W. Hayle were the principals. The concert may be pronounced among the most successful the Society has given.

Two Church performances at Leeds call for mention. On April 1 Brahms's 'German Requiem' was given at St. Chad's, Headingley, under the conductorship of the organist, Mr. Percy Richardson, and on April 6 the annual performance of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion took place in the Leeds Parish Church, for the first time under the direction of Mr. Willoughby H. Williams, the new organist. Both were reverent and sympathetic performances, and a feature of the latter that calls for special mention was the highly artistic singing of the part of Jesus by Mr. William Hayle, the principal bass of the Parish Church. On March 23 Mr. Fred Dawson gave a pianoforte recital at Leeds, and delighted a large audience by his very brilliant playing. The Carl Rosa Opera Company paid their annual visit to Leeds on March 30, the only unfamiliar feature of their programme being Verdi's 'Aida,' a highly creditable production, with an excellent all-round cast.

At Bradford a chamber concert was given on March 27 by the recently-formed Edgar Drake String Quartet, who gave a sympathetic performance of Beethoven's early Quartet in A, and with the co-operation of Mr. George Smith as pianist, introduced Dvorák's delightful Pianoforte quintet. Miss Carrie Birkbeck was the vocalist. The fourth series of the Bradford Free Chamber Concerts came to an end on March 30, when String quartets by Mozart and Schubert, with Brahms's Pianoforte quartet in G minor were given, and songs by Miss Pattie Clayton. This was a typical programme, and it is worth recording that it, and others like it, though making no concession to 'popularity,' have secured the close attention of large audiences. Mr. S. Midgley, who has established the concerts, the means being provided by a few generous amateurs, is certainly doing a good work in creating an appreciative audience for one of the most exacting types of music.

The York Musical Society, on March 31, gave an excellent performance of the 'St. Matthew' Passion, the all-round efficiency of which reflected great credit on Dr. Bairstow, who conducted. Mr. Herbert Brown's reading of the part of the Saviour was in the best possible taste; it was dramatic, and at the same time dignified and reverent. Mr. Mullings, though not quite suited for the part of Narrator, sang with his invariable intelligence, and Miss Agnes Nicholls and Miss Dilys Jones were thoroughly artistic in their respective parts. The choir sang with greater spirit and precision than usual, and by allotting the choruses of the Disciples to the Cathedral Choir their utterances were distinguished from those of the Crowd. In Ripon Cathedral, the English adaptation of Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' was given on April 8, Mr. C. H. Moody conducting. Mr. William Ellis's artistic management of the organ (recently reconstructed) deserves warm praise. The soloists were Mrs. Trees, Mr. Ward Kennedy, and Mr. Fraser Gange. Messrs. Lloyd Hartley and Cohen gave a second recital of pianoforte and violin music at Harrogate on March 21, introducing Schumann's Violin sonata in D minor, while Mr. Lloyd Hartley gave an artistic reading of the Bach 'Chaconne' as transcribed so effectively by Busoni. The vocalist was Mr. W. Hayle.

Miss Ida Bellerby, a promising young pianist who is about to acquire fresh experience in Germany, gave a chamber concert at Ilkley on March 29, when, with the assistance of Messrs. Edgar Drake and H. P. Ambler, she introduced Pianoforte trios by Franck in F sharp minor, and Rubinstein in B flat. Miss Marian Edleston's very artistic singing was a feature of the concert. The Hull Vocal Society, under Dr. G. H. Smith, gave a performance of Brahms's 'German Requiem' on March 31, which, as a whole, reached a high level of efficiency. Mrs. Theilmann and Mr. Francis Harford were the principals. The programme, which also included Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' was to be repeated on April 23 in the fine Church of Holy Trinity, Hull, which claims to be the largest Parish Church in the country, apparently on stronger grounds than its rivals at Yarmouth and Coventry. The Middlesbrough Musical Union, on April 2, gave an exceptionally fine performance of Bach's B minor Mass. Miss Edith McCullagh, Miss Effie Martyn, Messrs. Webster Millar and Henry were the soloists, and the Leeds Symphony Orchestra supported the Society's excellent choir in a really worthy interpretation, which reflected great credit on Mr. Kilburn, who has worked so long and so unselfishly in the cause of the best music in the North of England.

Now that Easter has passed, the centre of gravity in musical matters has shifted to Harrogate, where at the Kursaal the summer series of twenty-seven weekly Symphony Concerts began on April 15, under Mr. Julian Clifford's direction. It is something that musical people in this part of Yorkshire can, on any Wednesday afternoon, be assured of a symphony, a concerto, and an overture or suite, adequately performed, and this to some extent alleviates the musical famine which the provinces suffer from in the summer months.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

ABERDEEN.—The concert given by the Aberdeen Male-Voice Choir on March 28 attracted an exceptionally large audience. The principal items were Cecil Forsyth's 'Kubla Khan' and Vaughan Williams's 'Mystical Song,' with representative part-songs by Brahms, Wood, Bantock, Nicodé, and others. The choral singing was of a high order, and fully up to the standard of this Choir's enviable reputation. Miss Mary Mackie and Mr. John Cooper were the soloists, and Mr. A. Collingwood conducted.

AYTON.—For their tenth season the Choral Association gave successful performances of Mendelssohn's '13th Psalm' and Elgar's 'Banner of St. George,' under the baton of Mr. George Allan. Miss Katherine Vincent was the soloist.

BANFF.—A highly creditable performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' was given, on March 27, by the Orchestral and Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. T. E. Wright. Both in efficiency and expressiveness the choral singing reached a high standard. The solo parts were taken by Miss Bessie Kerr, Miss Belle Runcieman, Mr. Knight, and Mr. Littlewood. The programme included the 'Jena' Symphony.

BLACKBURN.—The programme of the concert given by the Ladies' Choir on March 23 included Frederic H. Wood's 'The ballad of Semmerwater,' Walker's 'To music,' Percy Buck's 'Dawn,' and a new group of choral songs by Mr. W. Wolstenholme entitled 'The Choir Invisible.' Mr. F. Duckworth conducted the excellent singing of the choir, and solos were given by Miss Lilian Whiteside and Mr. Norman Allin (vocalists) and Mr. W. Wolstenholme (pianoforte).

CARDIFF.—The terminal concert given by the music students of the University College, Cardiff, was a great success. The programme consisted chiefly of modern music, including works by Grieg, MacDowell, Wallace, Elgar, Giordani, César Franck, Tchaikovsky, Farjeon, Chopin, Gounod, Arensky, and Brahms. The students that appeared were Muriel Davies, Haydn Matthews, Percy Thomas, Elsie Clark, Irene Griffiths, Marion Jones, Franklin Sparks, Edythe Jones, Ethel Malins, Doris Worsley, and W. Heber Evans. The playing of the young pianists, Franklin Sparks and Haydn Matthews, showed capacious ability. Mr. G. F. Lewis was the accompanist.

CHIPPENHAM (WILTS).—On March 23, the Choral Society gave a performance of Spohr's 'Last Judgment' in St. Paul's Church. There was a crowded congregation. The soloists were Miss C. M. Bush, Mr. A. Watson, and Mr. T. H. Fogg. Mr. W. R. Pulein conducted.—The Chippenham Amateur Orchestra of forty performers gave their annual concert in the Neeld Hall on April 17. The music included Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony, and Mendelssohn's Pianoforte concerto in G minor. The vocalist was Mr. Hubert Eisdell. Mr. W. R. Pulein was again conductor.

DUNDALK.—A successful concert was given by the Orchestral Society at the Town Hall on April 14, under the direction of Mr. Desmond Fitzgerald. The 'Jena' Symphony and Verdi's 'Nabucodonosor' Overture were the chief features of the programme, to which Miss Lily Christie, Mr. C. Norman Jeffares (vocalists) and Mr. C. J. Thornhill (violincello) contributed.

HARBORNE.—Bach's Magnificat in D was creditably performed at the last concert of the Harborne Wesleyan Musical Society, under the direction of Mr. Frank Edmonds. Accompaniment was supplied by an orchestra, and the solo parts were undertaken by Miss Ethel Burnard, Miss Nora E. Warr, Miss H. Raybould, Miss Gladys Lane, Mr. A. E. Woodley, and Mr. H. Wall. The programme included Aspa's Cantata, 'Gipsies.'

HAYDON BRIDGE.—The Vocal Union, which was formed this season by Mr. Henry W. Radford, organist and choir-master of the Parish Church, won the favourable opinion of a crowded audience in the Town Hall on March 25 in a programme that included the first part of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul.' The soloists were Miss M. C. Nichol, Miss C. A. Todd, Mr. George Hodgson, and Mr. E. J. Potts. Mr. F. W. Wadely, organist and choir-master of Carlisle Cathedral, accompanied on the pianoforte, and Mr. Radford conducted. On April 18 the newly-formed Orchestral Society gave their initial concert in the Town Hall with great success. Solos were contributed by Miss A. Westmoreland (vocalist) and Miss Hetty Page (violincello). Mr. Radford was an efficient conductor, and had his orchestra well in hand.

HEANOR (DERBY).—The Heanor Choral Union gave an excellent performance of Handel's 'Acis and Galatea' and Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' on March 18, with Madame Eva Rich, Mr. W. Burrows, and Mr. James Coleman as soloists. The choruses were sung in good style under the direction of Mr. Arthur H. Bonser, of Sutton-in-Ashfield.

HEDNESFORD.—Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' was performed complete by the Hednesford Philharmonic Society, a choir and orchestra of 120 performers, under the direction of Mr. Ernest Amplett. The choral singing maintained a high level of effectiveness, and excellent work was done by the soloists—Madame Laura Taylor, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Herbert Parker.

HOYLAKES.—The Hoylake Male-Voice Choir had a packed house for their concert at the Town Hall on March 28. The Choir have quite regained their old artistic efficiency. The soloists were Miss Norah Dall (vocalist) and Mr. Vivian Burrows (violin). The conductor is Mr. Charles Hughes.

HYTHE.—The Choral Society gave the third concert of their eleventh season on March 25, when 'The Mount of Olives' (Beethoven), 'Festival Te Deum' (Sullivan), and 'Prospect' (H. W. Davies) were performed. The soloists were Miss Marjorie Walker, Mr. Herbert Thompson, and Mr. Edward Halland. Mr. Alfred T. Dixon was principal violin, and Dr. A. T. Froggatt conducted.

JOHANNESBURG.—A concert was given on March 18 by the Choral and Orchestral Societies, when Schubert's 'Rosamunde' Overture and movements from Beethoven's fifth Symphony were the chief contributions of the orchestra, and the choir were heard in Lahee's 'The bells' and Haydn's 'The heavens are telling.' Miss N. Reinecke and Mr. J. W. Birrell (vocalists) took part, and Mr. F. W. Peters conducted.

KETTERING.—'Elijah' was performed to good effect by the Choral Society under the direction of Mr. H. G. Gotch on April 2. The chief solo parts were taken by Miss Rose Molyneux, Miss Dora Arnell, Mr. John Perry, and Mr. George Shrive.

LEAMINGTON.—Gounod's 'The Redemption' was creditably performed by the Madrigal Society at the Winter Hall on April 2, under the direction of Mr. E. Roberts-West. The solo parts were taken by Madame Laura Taylor, Miss Marguerite Gell, Mr. Ernest Ludlow, and Mr. Sydney Stoddard, all who took part contributing to the success of the occasion.

LEEK.—Barnby's 'Rebekah' and Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' were successfully performed by the Amateur Musical Society on March 30. The choir of eighty voices was under the direction of Mr. John Cope, Mr. W. Sherratt was organist, and Mr. R. T. Ford pianist, and the solo parts were taken by Madame Lily Moffitt, Miss Lily Moorhouse, Mr. Richard Ripley, and Mr. Francis Billing.

LEVEN.—The amateur Orchestral Society of forty performers gave a successful concert on March 26 at the Town Hall. Mr. J. M. Cooper conducted agreeable performances of Haydn's second Symphony, a selection from Wagner's 'The Flying Dutchman,' and movements from Beethoven's C minor Pianoforte concerto, Miss Carswell being the soloist. Songs were given by Mrs. Cooper, and violoncello solos by Mr. Messeas.

LLANELLY.—A highly creditable performance of Elgar's 'The dream of Gerontius' was given by Zion Choral Society on April 7, under the direction of Mr. D. J. de Lloyd. Both the ability and the expressive power of the choir were put to the service of the music in a way that gave great satisfaction. The solo parts were given by Miss Maud Wright, Mr. Hughes-Macklin, and Mr. David Brazell. Mr. W. F. Hulley's orchestra assisted.

MANSELTON (SWANSEA).—The second annual concert of the Manselton Congregational Church Choir took place on Good Friday, April 10. Considering that the choir is only in the second year of its existence, the programme was of a very ambitious character. The choral works performed were Beethoven's 'Ruins of Athens' and Schubert's 'Song of Miriam.' The choralists, under the baton of Mr. W. J. Owen, did their work excellently, the technique and general interpretation reaching a good standard. In addition to these works, the choir sang Gounod's 'By Babylon's wave,' Elgar's 'It comes from the misty ages,' Bishop's 'Sleep, gentle lady,' and Hatton's 'When evening's twilight.' The soloists of the concert were Miss Ailie Chegwidan, Miss Maggie Davies, Mr. John Thomas, and Mr. J. Amos Jones. The accompaniments were played by Miss Gertie Thomas, who also gave pianoforte solos, and Mr. Willy Roberts's orchestra.

OSWALDTWISTLE.—On April 8, at the Town Hall, there was given a recital of pianoforte works by Mr. W. H. Tomlinson and songs by Mr. H. Rigby. The former, which were interpreted by the composer, included a Sonata in F minor. The songs were interpreted by Miss K. A. Whittaker and Mr. Harry Goddard, and Mr. G. S. Oldham was accompanist. Both composers indicated high ideals.

PRESTON.—'An evening with Elgar' was provided on April 2 by Mr. Norman Woods, who gave a short lecture on Elgar and his works, with illustrations by the Preston Lyric Choir. These included 'Go, song of mine' and 'The challenge of Thor.'

SOUTHPORT.—On March 31, at the Cambridge Hall, the Southport Choral Society brought their season to a close with a performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Kubla Khan,' Verdi's 'Stabat Mater,' and Debussy's 'Cold winter,' Under Mr. J. C. Clarke's direction, the choir maintained their high reputation, singing with fine tone, precision, and brightness. The orchestra played with good effect Bantock's 'In the Far West,' Purcell's Suite in C major, Grainger's 'Mock Morris,' and Bach's Concerto in A minor, with Mr. John Lawson as solo violinist. The vocalists were Miss Mabel Corran, Mr. Arthur Rostron, and Mr. Harry Hopewell.

TORONTO.—Dr. Albert Ham and members of the National Chorus were recently entertained by the President of the Society, Sir Henry Pellatt, at his home. 'Come let us join the roundelay' and the 'Cherubim song' were among the pieces sung by the choir under Dr. Ham's direction.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS.—An interesting concert was given at the Great Hall on March 31 by the Vocal Association, under Mr. W. W. Starmar. Sullivan's 'The Golden Legend' was performed in a manner that aroused the enthusiasm of all who were present. The choir also gave Elgar's 'Bavarian Highlands' Suite, and the new cycle of unaccompanied part-songs by Mr. Starmar: 'Queen and huntress,' 'Waken, lords and ladies gay,' 'Pack, clouds, away!' and 'Twilight time.' These well-conceived and well-written works were adequately performed, and achieved a notable success. The soloists of the concert were Miss Florence Holderness, Miss Sara Silvers, Mr. John Collett, and Mr. John Prout. A full orchestra assisted.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

At the Opéra, the rehearsals of Alfred Bachelet's lyric-drama 'Scémo' are proceeding. It is said that the new work is full of interest and genuine originality. The production will take place in May.

At the Opéra-Comique, dissensions have arisen between the brothers Isola and M. P. B. Gheusi, on the matter of the managers' respective attributions. The issue of the conflict is not yet foreseen.

M. Broussan, one of the actual managers of the Opéra, whose privilege expires with the current year, will from January, 1915, become the head of a musical firm whose objects will be to publish and produce works, engage artists, form troupes, &c.

At the Théâtre des Champs Elysées was begun on April 23 the 'Anglo-American' opera season, given by the Boston Opera Company and that of Covent Garden jointly. The programmes range from 'Don Giovanni' to 'Pagliacci,' and from 'Parsifal' to Isidore de Lara's 'Les trois masques.'

At the Concerts-Monteux have been produced Henri Rabaud's second Symphony, which was well received, impressionist tone-sketches by Raoul Bardac, 'Heures,' and excerpts from Louis Aubert's 'La Forêt Bleue.'

M. Monteux has also provided Igor Stravinsky's score, 'Le Sacre du Printemps,' which, admirably performed, was received with enthusiastic applause. A majority of judges seem to esteem that the music has benefited by concert-performance, the audience listening attentively without having to divide its attention between the music and the freaks of Futurist choreography. Let it not be forgotten, however, that Igor Stravinsky has repeatedly asserted that the choreography of Nijinsky was in absolute harmony with the music and inseparable from it.

Other excerpts of M. Aubert's 'La Forêt Bleue' have been given at the Concerts-Hasselmans.

At the Concerts-Colonne, the novelties of the month have been: a tone-picture by Henri Lutz, 'L'île Engloutie,' and a song with orchestral accompaniment by Alfred Casella, 'La nuit de Mai.' M. Lutz's tone-picture is of a mild order. M. Casella's song, on the contrary, is extremely daring, and proceeds obviously from the influences of Schönberg and of Stravinsky. The composer is an expert in the art of dealing with discords and toning them down. 'La nuit de Mai' was remarkably well sung by Madame Maria Freund, and received with favour.

At the Concerts-Lamoureux no new music has been introduced this month, but at the orchestral concert given by the Union des Femmes Professeurs et Compositeurs was played for the first time Alberic Magnard's fourth Symphony—a work of lofty but austere and abstract style.

The Société des Concerts du Conservatoire has provided J.-G. Ropartz's Choral Symphony, to which the Prix Crescent had been awarded in 1906. Claude Debussy's 'Trois Poèmes de Mallarmé,' sung by Madame Vallin Pardo at the last concert of the Société Philharmonique, are made the subject of warm discussions. But they won much applause from the audience, despite their most recondite character.

At the Concerts-Séchiari were given a commendable Suite for oboe and orchestra by J. Rousse, entitled 'En Vendée,' and a prelude from Bourgault-Ducoudray's fine (posthumous) lyric-drama 'Myrdhin.'

Among the novelties produced at the last concert of the Société Nationale, special mention is due of two sets of songs by a beginner, Georges Auric. M. Georges Auric, who is not yet sixteen, displays cleverness, taste, and even invention, though perhaps a premature fondness for dealing in minute effects. The songs were excellently sung by Madame Paule de Lestang.

The same evening were played by Ricardo Viñes Erik Satie's 'Croquis et agaceries d'un vieux bonhomme en bois,' charmingly humorous tit-bits of the kind to which the composer has of late accustomed us, and Abel Decaux's 'Crépuscules.' The latter work is very ambitious, but crudely carried out. During its performance the audience began to show displeasure rather rudely, and only the perfect self-command and great authority of M. Viñes enabled him to reach the end. M. Viñes's pianoforte recital given on April 22 will be noticed in the June number.

Ricardo Viñes has given a pianoforte recital at the Sallé Erard with equal success. His programme comprised, after works by Bach, Couperin, Rameau, Chopin, and Liszt, a good deal of modern numbers including specimens of contemporary Spanish music. His readings were as usual admirably thoughtful, brilliant, and finished.

At the Société Indépendante, Charles Koechlin's String quartet was withdrawn from the programme at the last moment, Ravel's Quartet being given in its place. The remainder of the programme consisted of Madame J. Herscher's 'Ophelia,' songs by Jacques Pillois, a Nocturne by M. Enesco, and part-songs by Paul le Flem.

The following concert was devoted to works by Enrique Granados. The 'Goyescas' and other pianoforte pieces were played by the composer, who is a capital pianist. Madame Mathilde Polack sang with great spirit a set of attractive 'Tonadillas.'

M. Rhené Baton has been appointed assistant-conductor at the Concerts-Lamoureux.

M. Maurice Ravel is at Saint-Jean de Luz, where he has devoted himself to the task of writing a Trio and a Pianoforte concerto.

Foreign Notes.

AMSTERDAM.

An interesting discovery has been made in the archives of the Maatschappij tot Bevordering der Toonkunst. Three letters by Wagner, dated from Zürich and Lucerne, and eight letters by Liszt, dated from Weimar, all hitherto unknown, have been found. These letters, written in 1854-57, were addressed to the founder of the Society.

BERLIN.

Montemezzi's Opera, 'L'amore dei tre re,' will be given, for the first time in Germany, at the Deutsche Opernhaus, Charlottenburg.—Works by Isaak, Reyler, Friderici, Pieters, and Sweelinck were heard at the concert given by the Madrigal Choir, under Prof. Thies.—During the Autumn vacation the famous Berliner-Lehrergesangverein will undertake a concert tour through Belgium and England.—The report of the first International Music-Teachers' Congress held here last year has just been published.—The new Romantic Symphony by the Italian composer, Antonio Scontrino, performed at the Royal Opera under Richard Strauss, met with a cold reception.—Beethoven's nine Symphonies, the Choral Fantasia, the Violin concerto, the Triple Concerto, and the Pianoforte concertos in C minor, in G, and in E flat, will be performed at the popular concerts given by the Philharmonic Orchestra.

BREMEN.

P. Ertel's Symphonic-poem, 'Hero and Leander,' was recently given for the first time at the Philharmonic Concerts. The work proved popular.

CAIRO.

On March 11, Mr. Frederick Kitchener gave a pianoforte recital at the Savoy Hotel. A number of his compositions were well received.

COLOGNE.

The hundredth performance (in Germany) of Pierné's famous Oratorio, 'The Children's Crusade,' will take place here on June 30 next under Fritz Steinbach.—The forthcoming dramatic Festival at the Town Theatre includes Weber's 'Der Freischütz' in Pfitzner's version, Mozart's 'Don Juan' and 'Così fan tutte,' and Wagner's 'Die Meistersinger,' under Otto Lohse.

CREZFELD.

At the Town Theatre, the new Oratorio 'Kreuzauffindung' (The finding of the Cross) by Felix Novoviejski has been produced.

DRESDEN.

Joseph Haydn's Trumpet concerto in E flat (written in 1796), and the same composer's 'Serenade' for two string bands and kettledrums, were given a hearing at a Mozart Society's concert, under Haken's conductorship.

DUSSELDORF.

The ninetieth Lower Rhenish Music Festival will take place here at Whitsun, under Panzner's direction. The soloists are Frau Nordewier-Reddingius, Frau Hoffmann-Oegin, M. Urlus, M. Löltgen, M. Plaschke, M. Brongeeest (singers), Frau Elly Ney (pianoforte), and Herr Hubermann (violin). The programme includes Verdi's 'Requiem,' Tchaikovsky's 'Symphonie pathétique,' Handel's 'Coronation Anthem,' Brahms's Pianoforte concerto in B flat, Beethoven's 'Eroica' Symphony, Bruckner's 150th Psalm, Beethoven's Violin concerto, Haydn's Symphony No. 13, Reger's 'Ballet' Suite, and Strauss's 'Burlesque' (pianoforte and orchestra).

ESSEN.

The programme of the Tonkünstlerfest of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musikverein, to be held here from May 22 to 27, has been definitely settled. Three orchestral concerts and two chamber-music concerts will take place. Two new Operas—'Ratcliff,' by Volkmar Andreae, and 'Dandolo,' a comic-opera by Rudolf Siegel—will be produced: the former at the Town Theatre of Duisburg (a neighbouring town), the latter at Essen. The novelties include Huber's Scherzo for orchestra, H. Thiessen's second Symphony, O. Schreck's choral work, 'Dithyrambe,' and a Sonata for organ and alto solo by A. Jemnitz.

HAMBURG.

W. Gutmann's new Opera, 'Die Traumprinzess' (libretto by Robert Misch), was successfully produced here. The gifted young Russo-German composer is a pupil of Humperdinck and Juon.—Under the auspices of the Kunst-Gesellschaft, Tilly Koenen was heard in a number of songs by Arnold Mendelssohn, with the composer at the pianoforte.

LEIPSIK.

At the third Bach Festival a Cantata, 'Herkules am Scheidewege,' is to be performed. It contains the original setting of the music which Bach afterwards used in his 'Christmas Oratorio.'

LIÈGE.

On Sunday, March 15, a commemoration tablet was inaugurated on the house in rue St. Pierre No. 13, the birthplace of César Franck. 'La Fontaine des Beattitudes' will also be erected in one of the public places of the town.

MADRID.

K. Usandizaga's Opera, 'Las Colondrinas,' was performed recently for the first time. The work was accorded a favourable reception. The young Spanish composer is a pupil of Vincent D'Indy.

MOSCOW.

At a recent Symphony Concert, Glazounov's music to 'Le Roi de Judée,' under the composer's conductorship, met with a great success. The chief feature of the work is the 'Procession to Calvary'—a kind of funeral march.

PETERSBURG.

'Haschisch,' the new Symphonic-poem by S. Liapounov, has been produced at the first Russian Symphony Concert.

RIGA.

A feature of the seventh orchestral concert of the newly-founded Lettish Opera Company was the performance of a Symphony by the promising young composer, Jahn Meding (the first symphony composed by a native Lett). The programme was devoted entirely to Lettish works.—At the ninth Subscription Concert, Schnevoigt conducted the first performance of the Lettish composer Wihtol's new Overture, 'Sprihdits' (Tom Thumb), Alice Ripper being the soloist.—Lula Mysz-Gmeiner gave a recital and also sang songs by Mahler and Strauss at a concert of the Symphony Orchestra, at which Horsslin conducted the first performance of Max Reger's new Suite of 'Four tone-poems after Böcklin.'

STUTTGART.

The committee appointed by the German Stage-Society to judge the best German 'Don Juan' translation, has awarded the prize (£500) to M. Scheidemantel, the well-known singer.—The Festival performances (May 24-30) include 'Don Juan,' 'Figaro,' 'Falstaff' (Verdi), and Rossini's 'Barbier.'—A 'Lustige Serenade' in four parts for orchestra by F. Haas will be produced here at the first concert of the Court Orchestra under Von Schillings.

VIENNA.

The second Austrian Music-Teachers' Congress is to be held here on June 13, 14, and 15 next.—Five sacred cantatas by J. S. Bach were performed to perfection under Sigfrid Ochs at the Konzertverein.—Arnold Schönberg's arrangement of a Violoncello concerto by Georg Mathias Mann (from the collection 'Masterworks of music in Austria') will be published shortly. Mann (or Monn), who was born in 1717 near Vienna, is considered by Horwitz and Riedel to be the real founder of the new style of instrumental music. He wrote symphonies, trios, and fugues for stringed instruments.

Miscellaneous.

Princess Louise (Duchess of Argyll) has given her patronage to the performances at the Court Theatre on May 12, 13, 14, and 15, in aid of the Barclay Home and Workshop for Poor Blind Girls, the Margaret Street Hospital for Consumption, the National Hospital for Diseases of the Heart, and the 'Army Cot' Endowment Fund of the Royal Waterloo Hospital for Children and Women. The programme will comprise a new English Opera entitled 'Ilona,' by Mr. Arthur Herve, a musical scene entitled 'Snatches,' and an original Revue. Particulars can be obtained from the hon. secretary, Mr. H. E. Beaumont, 17, Green Street, Leicester Square, W.C.

It is announced that the Victoria College Glee Club of Toronto will tour for five weeks in England and Wales, sailing for Bristol from Montreal on June 2. The tour is under the management of the Brotherhood, and the Club consists of twenty-five young singers with Mr. Frank Oldfield, and Mr. Robert Courtney as vocal soloists. The conductor is Mr. E. E. Bowles.

The bells and carillon attached to the clock at the Royal Exchange have now been repaired, and the chimes are again performing satisfactorily. It is curious to note that when the Royal Exchange was destroyed by fire on January 10, 1838, the last tune played on the bells was, 'There's nae luck about the hoose.'

At Bexley Asylum on Good Friday afternoon, Gaul's Passion Service was admirably sung by the full choir of nurses and attendants; and it is noteworthy that no outside assistance had to be obtained for the solos. The organ part was played by Mr. Bruce Sholl, and Mr. Wakeling Dry assisted at the pianoforte.

Dr. Walford Davies's 'Everyman' is to be performed at Portman Rooms on May 7 by the Orpheus Choral Society, with Miss Ada Forrest, Mrs. Harry Bedford, Mr. Frank Mullings and Mr. Thorpe Bates as soloists, under the direction of Mr. Claud Powell.

An interesting lecture on 'Modern music and the new in the old' was given by Mrs. Franz Liebich before a meeting of the Incorporated Society of Musicians (London section) at the Regent Street Polytechnic on April 4.

The Canadian Northern Line have announced that first-class orchestras will accompany their Royal Mail Steamers, the inauguration being recently made on the R.M.S. 'Royal George.'

An interesting lecture on old English music, with copious illustrations by the Wimbledon Congregational Church Choir, was given by Mr. Cecil Henman at St. George's Hall, Wimbledon, on March 3.

Mr. Leigh Henry is director of the musical section of the School for the Art of the Theatre, Florence, and not, as he was described in our March issue, director of the School.

On March 21 the 'Liederkrantz' gave a dinner to Herr Max Laistner, who has been conductor of the Society for twenty-five years.

The light Opera 'Ma mie Rosette,' by Paul Lacome and Ivan Caryll, was revived at the Comedy Theatre on March 28 by the Sterling Mackinlay Operatic Society.

A concert was given by the Elizabethan Madrigal Society at the Royal College of Music on March 26. Mr. Lionel Benson conducted.

Mr. R. A. Greir has been appointed official organist and choral accompanist to the Imperial Choir of London.

A Modern School for the Violin

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ AND JAMES BROWN.

THE purpose of this Work is to provide, in one systematic and comprehensive scheme, all that is necessary for the acquirement of the Art of Modern Violin Playing.

"A Modern School for the Violin" consists of Six Books devoted to Daily Technical Practice, Six Books of Studies for Violin alone, and a number of Pieces with Pianoforte Accompaniment, the Violin parts being specially edited for the purposes of teaching.

SECTION A.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE. IN SIX BOOKS.

The foundation of "A Modern School for the Violin" is laid by means of a series of Six Books dealing exclusively with the important subject of DAILY TECHNICAL PRACTICE. The First Book of Technical Practice (Book 1A) is limited to the 1st Position; the Second Book (2A) to the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the Third Book (3A) to the first five Positions; and so on. Bowings and other technical devices are introduced in a similarly progressive manner throughout. Each Book of Technical Practice is divided into "Lessons" (or Chapters), and each Lesson contains a number of short repeating Exercises on some definite point of Violin Technique—as Fingering, Bowing, &c., with the needful explanations. Included in each Book will be found a complete set of Scales and Arpeggi, arranged according to the particular stage of advancement reached.

Taken as a whole, this section is intended to facilitate, and to insist on, a thorough, steady, and continuous progress in the mastery of the Instrument, this being the only possible means of preparing the groundwork for artistic achievement with all its lasting delights.

SECTION B.—STUDIES. IN SIX BOOKS.

Section B is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in Six Books. Each Book of Studies (Section B) is carefully co-ordinated, in respect of difficulty and range of subject, with the correspondingly numbered Book of Technical Practice (Section A). Thus the First Book of Studies (1B) is written in the 1st Position; the Second Book (2B) in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the 3rd Book (3B) in all Positions up to and including the 5th; and so on. It should further be explained that the two Sections are designed to complement one another, and that the "School" must be practised, not in single Books of Technical Practice and Studies alternately, but in pairs. Thus, Books 1A and 1B are to be taken concurrently, then Books 2A and 2B, 3A and 3B, and so on, and the appropriate pairs are now issued bound together in cloth (see Cloth Bindings below).

1A. TECHNICAL PRACTICE (1st Position)	2s. od.	1B. STUDIES (1st Position)	2s. od.
2A. DITTO (1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions)	2s. od.	2B. DITTO (1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions)	2s. 6d.

OR ANY OTHER CHURCH HYMNAL.

272 pages, Imperial 16mo. Cloth Boards, price Two Shillings and Sixpence.

Tonic Sol-fa Edition, Two Shillings and Sixpence.

Hymns only, Imperial 32mo, Cloth Boards, One Shilling.

Hymns only, medium 32mo, diamond type, cloth, 4d. ; paper, 3d.

Complete edition, bound with HYMNS ANCIENT AND MODERN (Quarto), 6s. 6d. net.

As its name implies, this book is designed for use with, and not in place of, other Church Hymnals.

For this reason the Hymns are numbered from 801, so that the numbers may not interfere with the use of any other hymn book, no other Church hymn book having as many as even seven hundred hymns. Each hymn has its own distinctive tune, and no hymn or tune in this work is found in Hymns Ancient and Modern (Old Edition), so that with the two books no duplication occurs.

CHORAL TECHNIQUE & INTERPRETATION

BY HENRY COWARD.

MUS. DOC. OXON.

Published as a Net Book.Price, Cloth, gilt, Five Shillings net.

PRESS NOTICES.

"The title and the author's name together will be sufficient to secure for this book a wide circle of musical readers. No one has done more than Dr. Henry Coward to further the remarkable advance in choral technique which has been so efficient in this country in recent years. Dr. Coward has spent his life in perfecting a system of choral training which he has exemplified in his Sheffield Choir, and carried triumphantly over the English-speaking world and even further. In this book he tells precisely what this system is and so fortifies precept with example, illustrating his points with quotations from musical masterpieces, that it places a valuable manual of instruction in the hands of every choir-master. It has been his aim to give 'such advice and instruction that no single problem connected with choral singing shall remain unsolved.' Those who know his work will not need to be assured that the book is eminently practical, but it may be added that it is written in the plain and forthright style which is characteristic of the author."—The Times, January 15, 1914.

"The author is one of the most brilliant examples of a man climbing from unpropitious surroundings to a high artistic plane, and it is always interesting to learn the factors that have contributed to such marked advancement. For many years past Dr. Coward held the first place as a conductor of choral societies, and although of late years several other musicians have shown themselves equally capable of securing fine performances, he must always be regarded as laying the foundation of what may be termed the new choral technique. Dr. Coward therefore writes with the authority of one who has verified the truth of his theories and proved the correctness of his methods by practical results of the most convincing kind. Choir trainers may not always agree with Dr. Coward's views of interpretation, and, truth to tell, they are more technical than æsthetic, but it is not too much to say that in this book will be found all the chief principles of the impressive delivery of choral music. Moreover, the book is written with a directness and clearness of expression which reminds one of the learned professor's answer to the young lady who expressed her enjoyment of his recent lecture: 'I am so glad you were able to follow me. I took great care that what I said should be understood by the meanest intelligence.'"—The Referee, January 11, 1914.

"Dr. Coward's great work, the publication of which has been eagerly anticipated by conductors, voice-trainers, and choralists generally, is hot from the press. In it the father of British choralism—that is to say choralism with art in it—gives away all his secrets. Aspiring organists and choir-masters have long sat at his feet eager to learn the secret of the marvellous power that the Sheffield doctor has wielded over the thousands of choralists with whom he has come in contact. Some of them by assiduous attention have assimilated some of the methods of the master; but it has been realised that behind the whole there is the personality of the man, his grit, his grip, his intense earnestness, and his determination to achieve success, however exacting the task before him."—Sheffield Independent, December 20, 1913.

"The book is a bewildering mine of information on the subject of choral technique; I can find no single point missing. But this is not all. Dr. Coward, in a spirit of tremendous enthusiasm, acknowledges that there may be some point overlooked or not elucidated with sufficient clearness, and therefore he invites queries, these to be addressed to him at the publishers. There are some excellent words of wisdom for the use of the choral conductor—which, indeed, are equally applicable to any other musical conductor. 'The man who lacks tact,' says Dr. Coward, 'is not fit to be a conductor.' 'Making rehearsals enjoyable is a valuable kind of tact. One of the best methods is to turn a petty annoyance into a pleasantry.' Dr. Coward brings his valuable treatise to a close with a series of appendices, in which is much wisdom as to hints on private practice, the necessity of a high ideal, singing with Latin words. There is a capital index, and a complete list of the musical examples used as illustrations, with the special point indicated for which they were selected. Altogether a most interesting and useful book."—Daily Telegraph, January 31, 1914.

"What that method is, and how it may be applied to choral singing, is told unreservedly and lucidly in Dr. Coward's book 'Choral technique and interpretation.' This book is something more than an exhaustive and, to choral conductors, an invaluable text-book of what may be conveniently described as 'choralism.' It is an unconscious autobiography of one of the most notable figures in the world of music. Henry Coward has written himself into these pages. We can visualise the man as he stands before a chorus, sure of himself, blunt and forceful, labouring at an idea, and gradually crystallising it into an apt phrase or a still more felicitous quotation or anecdote; persistent, insistent, prepared to bully or wheedle a choir into submission, and finally 'getting there' by sheer force of his genial, dogged, characteristic personality. He has put into the book, freely and fully, all he knows. He lays out for the benefit of inexperience all the harvest of thirty years of labour, study, and a degree of minute specialisation which in choral music has no parallel among even the great choir-trainers who preceded or are contemporary with him."—Sheffield Daily Telegraph, December 26, 1913.

"There can be no doubt that few living musicians are better entitled to discourse on the subject of choral singing than Dr. Coward, whose book on 'Choral technique and interpretation' is certain to be widely read, and its precepts carefully considered. As a conductor his interpretations may not always commend themselves to one's judgment, but as a choir-trainer it is no exaggeration to assert that his labours have marked a new era in chorus-singing. For this reason his clear exposition of the methods by which he has achieved his aims has an obvious value, and his book is the more readable because of the lively style and genial enthusiasm that characterise it. His description of his conduct of a rehearsal is full of suggestive points by which every choir-trainer may profit, whether he employ them with literal exactitude or not."—Yorkshire Post, January 14, 1914.

THE TIMES.

It is in its clear statement of facts, both in writing and by the use of simple diagrams, that Miss Julia O'Neill's book excels.

THE MORNING POST.

Her manner of putting down the facts is concise and clear. An immense amount of ground is covered in logical sequence, and the book is one of the most helpful publications as yet made. It is satisfactory to note that ear-cultivation is touched upon.

MUSICAL OPINION.

It is really surprising the amount of useful matter that Julia A. O'Neill has managed to compress within the covers of her primer, "A Practical Guide to the Theory of Music." Teachers who wish to keep abreast of the times in an educational sense will find this well-written guide calculated to help them to a knowledge of the latest and most accepted method of elementary theoretical instruction. We are pleased to note that the all-important subject of ear-culture has not been neglected in the present primer.

THE LADY.

Is a thoroughly praiseworthy attempt to present the cardinal facts of musical theory in a plain and straightforward manner to the beginner.
Wholly admirable is the way the gradual formation of our present-day clefs is explained.

HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS
IN MUSIC

CONTAINING

600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS

BY

ERNEST A. DICKS,

FELLOW OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

The scope of this book covers the whole ground of theoretical examinations in music. It supplies an invaluable equipment to candidates entering for the various Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge held periodically throughout the country, and it will be found extremely useful to those who are preparing for the higher grades of Diploma and Degree Examinations.The book is therefore very comprehensive. Its range includes questions and answers in Theory, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form,
Fugue, Acoustics, Musical History, Organ Construction, and Choir
Training.By no means the least valuable part of the volume is that section, consisting of upwards of one hundred pages, which contains reprints of past examination papers set by the Associated Board, Trinity College, and the Incorporated Society of Musicians; the Universities of Oxford,
Cambridge, London, Dublin, Durham, and Edinburgh, and the Victoria
University; The Royal Academy of Music, The Royal College of Music, and The Royal College of Organists. The advantage of having so many specimens of these actual examination papers within one cover is too obvious to need further comment or commendation.

PREFACE TO THE NINTH EDITION.

The author desires to acknowledge his great indebtedness to the authorities of the London University; the Royal Academy of Music; the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music; The Royal College of Organists; Trinity College of Music, London; and the Incorporated Society of Musicians, for their kindness in allowing him to incorporate copies of their latest Examination Papers in Parts II. and III. of his Handbook, in order that he might present their latest examination requirements.

J. S. BACH.
COMPLETE ORGAN WORKS.

A CRITICO-PRACTICAL EDITION BY

CHARLES-MARIE WIDOR AND DR. ALBERT SCHWEITZER.

In Eight Volumes.

Special Subscription Price, Complete, paper, Two Guineas. Separate Volumes, Seven Shillings and Sixpence net.

THE Editors have adopted as the basis of their edition the critically correct text established by the old Bach Gesellschaft. It is reprinted with no addition whatever. Their common conception concerning the manner of interpretation is submitted in the General Observations prefatory to Vol. I., and in the Suggestions for the Performance of the compositions contained in each volume; the manner in which Widor and Schweitzer play each piece in the given volume is concisely presented. The extended introduction lays down the general principles governing the interpretation of the Fugues and Preludes, and treats at length the questions of Tempo, Phrasing, Registration and Change of Manual. No marks of any kind have been added to the music itself, and the player is therefore at liberty to supply such registration, marks of phrasing and expression, &c., as he may deem proper and to adopt the ideas of the editors in so far as they coincide with his own and are suitable for his instrument.

THE ORGAN

BY

WALTER G. ALCOCK,

M.V.O.,

Mus. Doc. Dunelm., A.R.C.M., F.R.C.O.

Organist and Composer to His Majesty's Chapels Royal and Assistant-Organist of Westminster Abbey.

Published as a Net Book.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS NET.

THE ATHENÆUM.

A fine work . . . and is admirable at all points.

YORKSHIRE POST.

The name of Dr. Walter G. Alcock is in itself a sufficient guarantee of the sound teaching of organ-playing, and his book, "The Organ," more than sustains his reputation. . . . There are many useful exercises on various technical points, and some short original pieces which serve as further illustrations of the author's teaching. It is very clearly printed on good, stout paper, and from every point of view is a desirable book.

THE SCOTSMAN.

The work is a distinctly useful addition to books of musical instruction.

THE BRISTOL TIMES AND MIRROR.

Although many books of instruction about the organ have been published, the latest is among the best. Its merits are sundry. . . . If the book be thoroughly mastered no other one is needed for the purpose of tuition, for it is the key to everything that has been written for the king of instruments. The print is exceedingly clear, and the book itself neat and attractive.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS.

This is not an "instruction" book in the ordinary use of the term, for its scope is too wide, and the information given is so largely the result of personal experiment and experience that those who have already advanced in the art of organ playing will find many hints and suggestions which will prove of practical service. The book is admirably divided into sections dealing with the elements of organ art; and a very important chapter is that on hymn-playing.

THE SUNDAY TIMES.

Every young organ student will find himself greatly helped by "The Organ," a new manual of the instrument by Dr. Alcock.

THE CHOIR.

We congratulate Dr. Alcock on having produced a work which will rank with the best of its kind.

THE MUSIC STUDENT.

The work is up-to-date in every way, it is well arranged and graduated, and begins at the beginning. . . . One must look a long way to find a work which unites as much sound instruction with so much good music of all grades, all under one cover.

THE BOOKSELLER.

Dr. Alcock has produced a very helpful and useful book which the ambitious player will do well to study with great care and attention; he who follows the directions here given will undoubtedly find his work as an organist very materially assisted.

CHURCH FAMILY NEWSPAPER.

Written by a master of his subject, "The Organ" makes an immediate appeal to organists of all descriptions, for the matter contained in the book embraces all that is necessary from simple pedal exercises—called by some "first steps"—up to pieces requiring all the resources of modern organ technique.

TECHNIQUE
AND EXPRESSION

PIANOFORTE PLAYING

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cetera.

THE FINEST ENGLISH MAKE CHAPPELL PIANOS CANNOT BE EXCELLED

FOR THEIR EXQUISITE TONE, RESPONSIVE TOUCH,
REMARKABLE SINGING QUALITY, AND LASTING DURABILITY.

BACKHAUS says: "I cannot speak too highly of the brilliant and sympathetic tone and responsive touch. You need fear no rival."

PROFESSOR ERNST VON DOHNÁNYI says: "It gives me great pleasure to state that in the qualities of tone and touch the Chappell Piano ranks first in Pianofortes of the highest grade."

DR. RICHARD STRAUSS says: "I consider the tone of a remarkably sweet and sympathetic quality and of unusual sustaining power, the touch very responsive and light. Having always been used to pianos of German make, it was a great and agreeable surprise to me to find such a perfect instrument of British manufacture."

SELECTED PIANOFORTE STUDIES

PROGRESSIVELY ARRANGED BY FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

In Two Sets (Eight Books),

PRICE ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE EACH BOOK.

THE present collection of Studies is designed to provide teachers with a short course of Pianoforte Technique adapted to the needs of the average pupil, the intention being to spare the teacher the labour of choosing a sufficiently varied selection from the large mass of material existing, and at the same time to ensure that the different departments of technique shall be undertaken in the order which experience has proved to be the most beneficial.

The Studies are grouped in two Sets, and are so arranged that the different Books in which they are contained may be taken in consecutive order, but pupils who are already further advanced than the elementary stage represented by Set I. may commence at once with Set II., which will be found to be complete in itself, and to illustrate all the essential elements of technique.

When additional studies are desired, or studies on certain subjects which are not touched upon in this series, the larger collection, published under the title of "Progressive Studies" (from which the present examples have been selected), is of course available.

Sight-Playing Made Easy.

The chief difficulty of the pianoforte student & how to overcome it.

The pianoforte student's chief difficulty is playing at sight. Even those whose technique is fairly advanced and who are able to play difficult compositions after practising them, are not able to play much simpler pieces at first sight.The reason for this is simply because the ability to play at sight cannot easily be acquired by keyboard practising for many hours daily. Years of practising by such methods may bring a limited efficiency, but by my System a much greater efficiency can be gained after 3 months' practising for about 20 minutes daily.My System is not a system of mere transposition. It goes beyond that to fundamental principles. To a good sight-player the mere sight of the printed notesautomatically suggests the correct muscular movements for playing them. There is no conscious mental translation or transposition:
there is no looking at the keyboard, no spelling-out of the notes, no sorting-out of the fingers.My System establishes this automatic association between eye and hand. After three months a pianist is able to play at FIRST SIGHT any piece which is within his technical powers.The System is not only approved by professional musicians, but has the enthusiastic approval of the hundreds of pupils who have taken the Course. Lessons are successfully given by correspondence to pianists in all parts of the world, and are adapted to pianists of all degrees of proficiency.

"The most striking discovery of the present generation for practical musicians."—Musical News.

Play Better!

Are you satisfied with your pianoforte-playing, or would you like to play better? Most probably you are keenly anxious to become a better pianist. You want to be able to play with greater satisfaction to yourself, and to play works which you have never yet even attempted. If so, I can promise that my System will enable you to play better than you have ever dared to hope, and with an ease and skill which has hitherto appeared to be beyond your reach.

My System improves beyond measure a pianist's playing in every respect. The touch, however hard and rough, is rendered delicate and sympathetic. The technique is improved step by step until no difficulties remain, and trills, long skips, octaves, and repeated chords become easy of execution. Control over every graduation of tone, from pp to ff is given without any special effort, and the pianist is able to make his fingers do exactly what his musical mind directs them to do.

"From Brain to Keyboard."

MACDONALD SMITH'S SYSTEM OF PIANOFORTE-PLAYING.

Pupils of the System say:—"The change in my playing (at a concert) was marvellous." "The first lesson has had a truly wonderful effect." "I have no difficulty worth noting." "Far beyond anything I have ever expected." "I can play pieces hitherto undreamt of." "Worth twenty times the fee charged." "I have passed my examination with honours."

The lessons are given by correspondence, and are specially adapted to each individual student.

HENRI VERBRUGGHEN.

When Mr. Daniel Mayer conceived the idea of holding a Beethoven Festival at Queen's Hall this spring, he had first to consider to whom the chief direction of such an important musical enterprise should be entrusted. The scheme of the five concerts included all the nine Symphonies, the five Pianoforte concertos, the Violin concerto, and various vocal works, and for their due performance the London Symphony Orchestra, the Leeds Philharmonic Choir, some of the greatest living pianists, and other soloists were engaged. As we all know Mr. Mayer's choice fell upon Henri Verbrugghen, who, as solo violinist, quartet leader, and conductor, had devoted a considerable part of his artistic life to the study of all Beethoven's important instrumental compositions except the Pianoforte sonatas.

It is a pleasure to record that Mr. Verbrugghen proved fully equal to the occasion, which was probably the most important one in his successful artistic career. Special interest was created in his interpretation of the Symphonies, because it was known that he would introduce certain bold devices of his own in order to adapt the orchestration to the balance of tone in a large modern orchestra. Some of the details of these devices are explained below, but it may be said at once that they were conceived and carried out in a spirit of reverence and respect for the great composer, and with no idea of improving his masterpieces.

Henri Verbrugghen was born at Brussels in 1873. He was the only child of a Belgian merchant. His mother had considerable musical faculty, which found happy vent in a devoted application to Beethoven's chamber music. The home was the resort of many well-known artists, and thus the bias of the boy to the classical master was initiated. Henri took eagerly to the violin, and made a public appearance as a soloist when he was only eight years of age. Later his parents desired to shape his education towards medicine rather than music, but when at the age of thirteen a decision had to be made, the advice of Joseph Wieniawski, and Gevaert (the director of the Brussels Conservatoire), was sought, with the result that music won the day, and Henri entered the Conservatoire and became a pupil of Hubay, and, later, of Ysaye, who took unusual interest in his musical development. Whilst at the Conservatoire he won many prizes, and when he was sixteen he made an important step forward in turning special attention to the study of orchestration. Soon after he was admitted as a member of the Society of Conservatoire Concerts, an orchestra in which Ysaye, Cæsar Thompson, and other professors of the Conservatoire were performers. In 1893, when he was twenty years of age, he came to this country and joined the Scottish Orchestra, which was then founded by George Henschel. He also during this summer led the orchestra under Jules Riviere at Llandudno, and later he became a member of the Lamoureux Orchestra at Paris. During the three following years he was deputy-conductor at Llandudno, and it was this experience that finally determined him to adopt the career of a conductor. He became director of music at Colwyn Bay (a position he retained for four years), and he returned to the Scottish Orchestra, which was then under Wilhelm Kes (the founder of the Concertgebouw Orchestra at Amsterdam, now conducted by Mengelberg), and in 1902 he was appointed leader and deputy-conductor of the Scottish Orchestra, under Dr. (now Sir Frederic) Cowen. In the summer of that year and for three succeeding years he was leader of the Queen's Hall Orchestra during the Promenade season. After that period he centred attention on Glasgow, where at the Athenæum, which is one of the most important musical educational institutions in Scotland, he is chief violin professor, and in 1911 he succeeded Dr. Coward as conductor of the Glasgow Choral Union. During recent years he has conducted symphony concerts at Brussels, Berlin, Munich, and St. Petersburg. Notwithstanding all these varied and widespread activities, he has formed a string quartet party, which has appeared in many places in Scotland and elsewhere. The present speciality of this party is the sixteen Quartets of Beethoven, the whole of which have lately been performed at chamber music concerts at Glasgow and Edinburgh.

One of the features of the Athenæum music school is the orchestral class of forty string players. Mr. Verbrugghen finds it perfectly possible to train this class to a high degree of perfection that cannot be reached by amateur players on wind instruments. But he thinks it desirable that his players should not restrict their repertory to pieces composed for strings only, and so for the purpose of study the string parts of symphonies and other works written for full orchestra are studied and the missing parts are filled in on the pianoforte. For a few years an operatic class was a success, but it had to be abandoned because it was found to absorb disproportionately the energies of the school.

BEETHOVEN'S SYMPHONIES.

The idea of doubling wind parts in Beethoven's symphonies in order to balance the mass of strings now employed in a modern full orchestra is not a new one. It is an obvious apparent escape from a difficulty; but it is equally obvious that if it is applied crudely it leads to more difficulty than it removes. There are numerous passages in the symphonies that clearly can only be played properly by a solo performer free, under orchestral conditions, to give scope to his individual temperament. This consideration alone shows that the whole matter must be dealt with scientifically. It might seem sufficient to rule that the extra instruments are to be used only in Tutti. But Mr. Verbruggen goes further than this. He studies the physical convenience of his principal wind players who immediately after the characteristic gusts of forte and sforzando, in which Beethoven often indulges, are called upon to play delicately: a transition of effort that more or less embarrasses the most skilful performer.

We now give a few examples of Mr. Verbruggen's method of treatment:

(Fl. Ob. Clar. Fag. Corni.)

These are the first two bars of the first Symphony, in which all the wind are directed to play ff. The extra wind play a staccato forte note and the principals play only softly, and therefore with perfect ease emerge piano.

EX. 2.

This is another extract from the first Symphony. The extras attack the sf with the necessary force, and the others are then able to play quite smoothly the succeeding bars:

EX. 3.

In the Vivace at the above important theme for second violins, half the first violins are added. The first violin part here is quite unimportant, consisting only of an iterated G.

Adagio molto. ♩ = 84.

(Ob.)

EX. 4.

These bars from the second Symphony are treated as in Ex. 1, only the extra wind playing ff.

EX. 5.

This ominous string passage from the Allegro con brio with its threatening crescendo is treated in a cumulative way. A few strings play the pp, and players are added by degrees until the powerful climax is reached.

EX. 6. pp

This exciting passage in double octaves by all the strings, from the Allegro vivace of the fourth Symphony, is similarly treated. Bar by bar the number of players is increased.

Ob. Cl.

This passage from the 18th bar of the Adagio is treated as in Ex. 1, the oboe semiquavers emerging piano without trouble to the principal player.

EX. 8.

Allegro con brio. ♩ = 72. sf

In this wonderfully exuberant theme from the Allegro con brio of the seventh Symphony half the second violins are added to the first with excellent effect. In Mr. Verbruggen's opinion this theme is rarely made to stand out so clearly as it should.

All the printed orchestral parts are carefully and plainly marked, so that each player cannot possibly misunderstand what he has and has not to do; in fact what he has not to do is eliminated from the copy. The saving of time at rehearsal alone justifies this trouble.

Amongst the assets which have helped Mr. Verbruggen to attain a high position in Glasgow is his ability to speak excellent English fluently. His future development will be watched with interest by a wide circle.

COMMERCIAL MUSIC AND THE NATIVE COMPOSER.

By G. H. CLUTSAM.

It has recently been openly stated by one of our London impresarios, a dealer in that fascinating side-branch of music known as musical comedy that the native musician who can deliver material equal in its attractiveness to that of the ubiquitous foreigner is persistently and wilfully avoiding discovery. His existence is even questioned. And this idea has become an obsession with all those managers who control with a dubious enough authority the fortunes of the light musical stage in London at the present moment. With the exception of three or four native composers who have practically monopolised the attention of managers for the last ten or fifteen years, and whose fortunate mission it is to keep on providing variations of the same old tunes on the same old terms, year in, year out, who of the large array of our younger talented musicians has been afforded the smallest opportunity of showing his skill, or even want of it, in this branch of music? In one sense the native composer is to be congratulated if he does not feel equal to emulating, by a process of discarding taste, style, and every semblance of ordinary musicianship, the fluent pen of, say, F. Jean Gilbert. One mentions M. Gilbert as for the moment he is a much favoured personage, and looms large in managerial favour as a brilliant adept at his calling. If the scores of his composer are really so attractive to the public, the models on which they are constructed (the lines of the tunes, the rhythms and the forms in which their ingenuous delights are displayed) should easily be at the command of even the indifferent musician. As a matter of fact, there are dozens of respectable composers in London alone who could easily accomplish the work that is considered beyond their capabilities. Commissions are given to, or operas purchased from, the foreign composer for the simple reason that the manager argues with himself that nothing should succeed like success, and this idea saves a lot of thinking—a strenuous and unproductive occupation at the best.

But after all, one may say, what has this to do with our native composer? What do we expect him to do in this galley? Is it not as well for the cause of native art that the road to an artistic vernis should be closed to him? Well, it really depends whether his art is his hobby or his means of livelihood. There can be no hiding of an essential consideration for a composer who is bent on giving the best in him and is also desirous of making out an existence by his contributions to his art. The combination of objects is an impossible one. No publishing house, unless it be run by a philanthropic millionaire, could entertain a similar proposition; and it is quite time that the composer should grasp the fact that if his living is dependent on his art, his art has to suffer a severe compromise in the matter of ideals. The standard of much of the music published in England at the present moment is at an extraordinarily low level, and is likely to remain there so long as the purchasing public supports the output, and so long as the well-equipped composer holds aloof from any attempt at meeting a natural demand in a reasonable manner. There are large profits made from popular songs and popular musical comedy music, and it could easily be proved that these profits in the large majority of cases go to so-called composers who have not even the elements of musical art at their call to follow up their chance success. Items are accepted by publishers of this class of music mainly on tunefulness (in the worst sense of the word), and the facility with which they can be played and sung. Technical matters are seldom if ever considered. The same sort of irresponsible acceptance inspires the musical comedy entrepreneurs, and the public that really likes to be entertained with music of a lightsome, frivolous quality is having its taste (an infinitely better one twenty years or so ago) dragged down to a brutal vulgarity simply because the good composer will not take a hand in an artistic game (that is exceptionally lucrative, with a modicum of luck) for fear of his artistic sincerity being questioned. He has many things to consider, of course. He must study the taste as it is. He will soon realise that all popular music is conceived on two or three fundamental progressions, and his own skill will be called in to provide these with effective variations. If he can find a new one, he will be lucky. Still, this is beside the main question. There are signs that musical comedy as a commercial asset is losing, by reason of exhausted inspiration in its present creators and producers, a serious proportion of its attractive powers. When it is really dead, an astonished generation will probably realise that tens, nay hundreds of thousands of pounds have been expended by managers and publishers in the purchase of two or three old tunes imposed upon them and the public by the lucky ones in commercial music, and that most of the cash in recent years has gone out of the country; cash that if it had been sent his way might have enabled some struggling young artist, at a minimum expenditure of his musical intelligence, to settle down in peace for a lengthy period and produce symphonic-poems, grand operas, and other select things whose proper creation is only to be associated with worldly comfort. With a little intelligent consideration our musical-comedy managers might have posed as 'fertilisers' of the highest art, and put Mr. Ernest Palmer to shame by also making a profit out of the transaction.

However, as hinted, it being perfectly clear that those composers, native and foreign, who have had hitherto a monopoly of the light musical stage, are now entirely barren of an effective tune that is not too glaringly reminiscent, and that the managers are realising a most annoying reticence in the acceptance of their wares by the public, the intelligent composer, musically resourceful and consequently able to colour his work with an unusual tinge of novelty, should find a fine commercial field for his talents awaiting exploitation. That he will carry his public with him is a reasonable presumption, only he must step down to meet it. If he has high ideals the step will be a very long one, but he can cover up his submission to what he will probably consider a banal taste with an artistic dignity that should reconcile him to his position. In any case, and it will probably be considered a reprehensible statement to make, serious art, at the moment, is in the melting-pot. No one can establish its aims, claims, significance, or forebodings with the smallest degree of certainty. The giant in whom all the wonderful developments of the past few years will be assimilated, in whose musical crucible the hundred and one brilliant experiments of the brilliant, but not epoch-making, composers who have been occupying attention in the last decades will come to a perfect alloy, is scarcely yet to be discovered. There are not even premonitory signs of his appearance. All the same he is coming, and in awaiting his advent our young composers could not be more profitably employed than in catering artistically for the large public that only requires its music as an entertainment, and as a study in taste and possibilities the work is full of a delightful interest. Not only that, but by judicious and well-considered steps the public taste can easily be elevated. In fact, it is, unconsciously maybe, awaiting and expectant for that desideratum. And only the most completely equipped of our composers are capable of consummating the idea. The indifferent ones have been contributing their say in the matter in their hundreds, nay, in veritable little armies, ant-like stumbling over each other and other things in their race for some beautifully undefined goal, with a few of them actually getting there. This refers of course to all sorts and conditions of popular music. Once our composer who is now only seriously concerned with the creation of symphonic-poems and other offshoots of classical ideas turns his attention in the direction suggested, a wonderful change will come over the spirit of average music. The worst that can happen is that there will be no bad music, and the world is so full of it at the moment that another name altogether should be found for the commodity. Infinitely better and more moral is a good waltz than a bad or indifferent symphonic-poem. It is also infinitely more profitable than the greatest of symphonies!

M. IGOR STRAVINSKY'S OPERA :

'THE NIGHTINGALE.'

By M.-D. CALVOCORESSI.

M. Igor Stravinsky began to write the lyric play 'The Nightingale' in 1910, the very year when his name was for the first time signalled through the production at Paris of his ballet, 'The Bird of Fire.' After completing the first Act, he suddenly gave up the undertaking, feeling himself, as he explained to the present writer, thoroughly disinclined to deal with the form of the lyric play.

'I can write,' he said, 'music to words, viz., songs; or music to action, viz., ballets. But the co-operation of music, words, and action is a thing that daily becomes more inadmissible to my mind. And even should I finish my "Nightingale," I do not think that I shall ever attempt to write another work of that kind.'

Last year M. Stravinsky, we are told, expressed the same opinion to a representative of a London daily in the terse formula: 'Music can be married to gesture or to words—not to both without bigamy.' Nevertheless, immediately after having written 'Petrushka' and 'The crowning of Spring,' he reverted to 'The Nightingale,' which is now finished, and will be produced this month at Paris and in London. The briefest inspection of the new work is enough to make one realise how regrettable it would be did so gifted a composer abide by his decision not to write lyric plays. M. Stravinsky indeed is among all musicians of to-day one of the best endowed for dramatic music, and one of the few who may be expected to promote the genre of the lyric-drama. This the scores of 'Petrushka' and of 'The crowning of Spring' had already shown; and that of 'The Nightingale' is even more convincing, and in more respects. It shows not only the same admirable musicianship, daring, originality, power of suggestion, and absolute command of technique, but a new order of special qualities more specially conducive to excellence in the particular matter of dramatic music.

According to the modern conception of the lyric-drama, the chief quality of dramatic music is terseness—a quality most uncommon in all kinds of music, and which many will, not altogether wrongly, think almost incompatible with the very essence of musical art. The principle of music as generally understood appears to be amplification and repetition. At all events, the art of music has always consisted chiefly in that of working-out. And it is but of late that a number of music-makers and of music-expounders have raised an outcry against prolixity and redundancy in music: an outcry, it must be added, that for the present does not find much echo among the majority of artists and judges nor of the public.

The first of great musicians to abjure the principle of formal elaborate working-out in dramatic music and in lyric was Moussorgsky. A striking peculiarity of his best songs and of his masterpiece, 'Boris Godounov,' is the absolute lack, not only of anything resembling tautology or amplification per se, but of all that is not absolutely essential to direct expression (including many devices which no other musician of the time would have dreamt of leaving out), even if the omission be in defiance to all current laws of formal construction and balance.

For instance, the song 'The Orphan' ends, very dramatically, on the suspensive harmony of the dominant. 'Death's Lullaby,' which depicts a dialogue between a horror-stricken mother and Death, who comes to take away a child, ends abruptly on the burden of Death's last utterance with which the composer's purpose is fulfilled. He never gives a thought to the practice of bringing back the main key which would have led him either to an inappropriate modulation, or to a superfluous addition. Similarly, 'Boris Godounov' in the authentic version, ends, without even a cadence, on a chord that hardly leaves the impression of the tonic. And throughout the score, except or the very brief preludes, a Polonaise, and a march heralding the entrance of the usurper, the orchestra is hardly heard alone even for a few bars, transitions and intervals between utterances or even scenes being reduced to the strictest minimum.

The same principle obtains, to a degree, in M. Debussy's 'Pelléas et Mélisande.' But it is only at a later date that we can notice its intrusion in instrumental music—for instance, it has undoubtedly inspired M. Arnold Schönberg in the design of his famous Five orchestral pieces, or of the Pianoforte pieces, Op. 19.

My intention is not to pit the two principles against one another. Indeed, I think that beyond a certain limit, concision is incompatible with the very spirit of instrumental music. On the other hand it is a highly desirable virtue as far as dramatic music is concerned. But, were we all to agree upon that point, and to acknowledge that, judging by the actually prevailing tendencies, dramatic music will become more and more concise, it would hardly have the effect of making us find 'Tristan' or 'Die Meistersinger' less enjoyable and less admirable.

But the fact is that a new factor has appeared lately in the domain of dramatic music, which is now entering a new path; and consequently, a new order of artistic pleasure may be the outcome of this stage of evolution. The first consequence, of course, is a greater differentiation between the style of dramatic music and the style of instrumental music: unquestionably a progress, since it widens the range of methods and gives greater freedom to the composer's imagination.

Before attempting to show that 'The Nightingale' affords a most striking instance of brevity, 'the pul of wit,' as well in its last Act, which is altogether earnest and pathetic, as in its first two, which are chiefly picturesque and humorous, one could not omit to call attention to the fact that it is one of the very few extant lyric plays in which love plays absolutely no part. The peculiarity in itself is most unusual; and it acquires even a greater significance when one remembers that apart from the tragi-comic infatuation of Petrushka for his fellow-doll, the Dancing-girl, and from one beautiful song, 'Spring in the cloister,' which is the lament of a maiden deploring the absence of her lover, love has never been selected as a theme for inspiration by M. Igor Stravinsky, who in all likelihood would fully endorse all that Mr. G. Bernard Shaw, at the beginning of his preface to 'Three plays for Puritans,' writes concerning the obnoxiousness and triviality of the senseless intrusions of that one passion as a foundation for all plots and developments.

'The Nightingale' consists of three short Acts. Music and action proceed evenly and rapidly. All the symbolic purport, all the undercurrents of suggestions contained in the text are never explicitly alluded to except in the brief reconductions of a minor character, a Fisherman who appears at the beginning and at the end of the Acts, appears in the background to prophesy and to explain, foretelling the delight that will be caused by the bird's sweet songs, 'the gifts of the heavenly Spirit,' the distress that will follow its departure, and its final victory over death. Those brief passages are the only ones in which, to quote Schumann's epigraph to the last of the 'Kinderszenen,' the poet speaks—'der Dichter spricht.' All the rest is kaleidoscopic, ceaseless movement.

The plot follows Andersen's well-known tale closely. In the first Act, after the opening song of the Fisherman, the Nightingale* appears and sings. Led by a Kitchen-maid who knows the bird's favourite haunts, the Chamberlain, the Chief Bonze, and a body of dignitaries come to inform the Nightingale that the Emperor of China wishes to hear it sing. The bird complies, and allows itself to be carried to the Palace.

The second Act begins with a picturesque hors d'œuvre: all the servants of the Court are adorning the gardens with lanterns, torches, and silver bells. They talk of the famous Nightingale. The Emperor appears and the feast begins. The Nightingale sings, and fills all hearts with wonder and rapture. At the very moment when the Emperor, moved to tears, expresses his heartfelt admiration, appear messengers from the Emperor of Japan, who bring as an offering a clockwork nightingale perched on a musical box. The artificial bird is forthwith set into motion. After listening to its play, the Emperor wishes again to hear the real Nightingale. But the bird has vanished. The Emperor, in high dudgeon, sentences it to perpetual banishment and orders the gift of the Emperor of Japan to be carried to the Palace and given a place of honour in his bedroom.

The curtain rising on the third Act reveals the Emperor in his bed, dangerously ill. Death is at his bedside, ready to pounce upon him, and has already taken hold of his sword, his sceptre, and his crown. He is tormented by the memories of all his doings, by the dreamy chant of ghosts that swarm around him. He gasps in remorse and agony, he murmurs, 'Music might dispel these horrors.'

And suddenly the voice of the Nightingale, responding to the appeal, makes itself heard, 'Here I am!' and the bird sets to the task of driving away Death. It sings, describing the beautiful garden of the dead, its restful charm and sweet calm, its unbroken silence. Death listens, and so potent is the appeal of the song, so deeply is the grim Death enraptured, that he is seized with a longing to return to his own realm, relinquishes crown, sceptre and sword, and retires. The grateful Emperor thanks the Nightingale, and beseeches it not to depart again. 'Rest in peace,' replies the bird. 'Every evening I shall come to thee, and I shall sing and whisper unto thy heart.'

All is quiet; the courtiers appear and imagine the Emperor to be dead. The pages reverently draw the bed curtains, and a dead march is played. But suddenly the Emperor pops out his head, and all ends in joy.

* The part of the Nightingale is sung from the orchestra; so is that of the Fisherman.

The greater part of the diverting episodes introduced by Andersen in the tale are included in the dramatic version. For instance, in the first Act the courtiers, on their quest for the Nightingale, mistake for its song, firstly, the lowing of a cow, and then the croaking of frogs. At Court, after the Nightingale has sung, all the ladies fill their mouths with water, and throwing back their heads proceed to gurgle in imitation of the bird's trills. But in all such cases, M. Stravinsky contents himself with the barest touches, and in obedience to his steady policy of conciseness and speed passés lightly, without dwelling one instant upon the amusing effects which in the mind of more composers than one would have been sufficient excuse for more or less protracted digressions.

Even in the third Act, whose atmosphere is altogether emotional, and in which occur many of the topics upon which music can most appropriately dwell, there is not one instance of prolixity nor even of amplification. The score semper ad eventum festinat.

This attitude towards his text M. Stravinsky justifies by curious reasons: 'I want neither to suggest situations or emotions,' he says, 'but simply to manifest, to express them. I think there is in what are called "impressionist" methods a certain amount of hypocrisy, or at least a tendency towards vagueness and ambiguity. That I shun above all things. And that perhaps is the reason why my methods differ as much from those of the impressionists as they differ from academic conventional methods. Though I often find it extremely hard to do so, I always aim at straightforward expression in its simplest form. I have no use for working-out in dramatic nor in lyric music. The one essential thing is to feel and to convey one's feelings.'

This despotic attitude—the sole point upon which a comparison between the spirit of Dr. Richard Strauss's art and that of M. Stravinsky might be founded, but in which it is far more natural to acknowledge the faithful counterpart of Moussorgsky's creed: 'Plain truth, however unpalatable, and nothing more. No half measures. Ornamentation is a superfluity'—has served M. Stravinsky's ends well, and led him to write a score of which the least that can be said is that it is remarkably pithy and spirited. Its style, in a measure, is what acquaintance with 'The crowning of Spring' or with the recently published 'Japanese songs' leads us to expect. But the music of 'The Nightingale,' naturally enough, is far less brutal than that of 'The crowning of Spring,' since the action takes us not to the barbaric age of prehistoric Russia, but to the highly formal and polished civilisation of a Chinese court. Apart from that, however, there is much in it (and especially in the last two Acts) that strikes one as hardly less daring than anything formerly dared by M. Stravinsky. Indeed, whatever might have resembled conventional treatment would have been quite incompatible with the very principle by which the composer was guided. Only the most forcible suggestions could serve his purpose adequately, enabling him to convey his message as briefly as possible without loss of vigour and of point. And such an order of suggestions could hardly be achieved without an abundance of bold strokes. But for all that, the effect of the music is one of mellowness and dainty refinement, many unexpected things being toned down by the general perspicuity of treatment.

Despite this delicacy of the texture, M. Stravinsky makes use of a full orchestra, comprising wood-winds by threes with a piccolo, clarinet, bass clarinet, and double bassoon; three trombones and tuba; two cornets, besides the usual two trumpets; two harps, two glockenspiels, a célesta and a piano-forte; and the whole of the usual percussion, to which are added small antique cymbals.

MENDELSSOHN
IN ENGLAND.

One of the chief events of the 1915 season will be the visit of the famous Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto to this country and the Continent in May. A large sum of money has been raised at Toronto to finance the undertaking. The Choir will consist of 220 (200 with 20 in reserve) members. They will leave Toronto on April 20, and after giving concerts at Montreal and Boston will leave the latter city in a steamer specially chartered, and will arrive in London on May 1. The first concert in England will be given at Queen's Hall, May 4, under the patronage of His Majesty King George, and with the co-operation of the Queen's Hall Orchestra. Then Liverpool, Manchester, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Leeds, and Birmingham will be visited, and on May 12 and 13 two more concerts will be given at Queen's Hall, London. After that the Choir will go to Amsterdam, Berlin, Frankfort, Wiesbaden (probably), and to Paris, arriving there about May 24, and they will leave Havre for Canada a day or two afterwards.

This is a great enterprise which deserves every possible encouragement. The Choir and their able conductor Dr. Vogt will, we can safely say, be received with the sincerest cordiality by the choral organizations of Great Britain as well as by the general public. The repertoire of the Choir is a fine one. It includes most of the great modern oratorios as well as many smaller works, accompanied and unaccompanied. The title adopted by the Choir does not mean that its object is to exploit Mendelssohn's works; in fact, these works are often conspicuous by their absence from the programmes. Canadian and United States critics agree as to the outstanding merit of the Society's performances. It may be well to add that the visit is not undertaken by the promoters in any spirit of vanity. With perfectly legitimate pride, they simply desire to show the Mother Country that in a great Dominion centre the traditional choral instincts of our race are finding artistic vent, and they look forward eagerly to fraternising with British choralists and musical folk generally.

A picturesque way of removing A PIANOFORTE surplus stock has been adopted by POGROM. Messrs. Allan, pianoforte dealers, of Melbourne. Recently fifty-one obsolete pianofortes were borne through the streets to the strains of 'Auld Lang Syne,' heaped in a pile, soaked in kerosene, and—cremated!

Wide regret has been caused by Dr. Georg Henschel's retirement, at the height of his powers, from the field in which he has worked so long and so well—that of Lieder singing. We cannot easily part with so rare a combination of great personality, great skill, and the highest ideals as his art continually afforded. It should be noted that Dr. Henschel has no intention of abandoning his work as teacher and conductor, but aims rather at augmenting it. We hope in our next number to give an account of his later activities that shall supplement the article in our issue for March, 1900, and to give our readers the benefit of Dr. Henschel's opinion on various matters of interest.

The fullness of musical life in Bournemouth has long been known as a phenomenon to provoke wonder and admiration. Both the Bournemouth public and the British composer have reason to be grateful to Mr. Dan Godfrey for his splendid energy. Attention has been recalled to his work by the coming-of-age of Bournemouth Municipal Music, which, as our correspondent records on p. 403, was celebrated on May 21. A book of over sixty pages gives an interesting history and an exhaustive catalogue of musical events since Mr. Godfrey's first venture with a military band in the season of 1893-4. Readers of the Musical Times will remember an article on music in Bournemouth, by Dr. Charles Maclean, that appeared in our issue for April, 1913 (p. 332).

When these notes appear, Sir Joseph Beecham's Grand Opera and Russian Ballet Season at Drury Lane will be well under way, but no opera-ballet new to London will have been heard. The new works make their appearance on the following dates:

June 8	..	Opera 'Prince Igor'	..	Borodin
June 9	..	Ballet 'Daphnis et Chloe'	..	Ravel
June 11	..	Ballet 'Papillons' (on music by Schumann)	..
June 15	..	Opera-Ballet 'Coq d'or'	..	Rimsky-Korsakov
June 18	..	Opera-Ballet 'Le Rossignol'	..	Stravinsky
		(First performance on any stage.)
June 18	..	Ballet 'Midás'	..	Steinberg
June 23	..	Ballet 'La Légende de Joseph'	..	Richard Strauss
June 26	..	Opera-Ballet 'Nuit de Mai'	..	Rimsky-Korsakov
July 4	..	Opera 'Dylan'	..	Holbrooke
		(First performance on any stage.)

The remainder of the repertoire includes a number of the works in which the Russian Ballet first turned its popularity in London, and the following operas: 'Boris Godounov,' 'Ivan le Terrible,' 'La hovanchina' (each with Chaliapine in the cast), 'Der Rosenkavalier,' and 'Die Zauberflöte.' The first three representations of 'La Légende de Joseph' will be conducted by the composer.

In an article on 'Balilla Pratella and Futurist music,' contributed by Mr. Leigh Henry to a recent number of the Egoist, we read that Pratella's musical writing is the direct outcome of his mental breadth, being based in his own words on a desire 'to liberate the true sensibilities of music from all imitations and influences of the past; to feel and sing with all changes towards the future, drawing inspiration and aesthetics from natural sources and traversing all the phenomena of the present, human and as yet beyond human; and to exalt the man symbol perennially rejuvenated in the varied aspects of modern life and their intimate relation with natural causes. ['Manifesto dei Musicisti Futuristi,' March, 1911.]

We are further told that one of his latest works, entitled 'Musica Futurista per Orchestra,' Op. 30, is remarkable for the graphic manner in which it synthesises the dynamic energy and mental emotionalism of contemporary thought.

This, however, is rather disappointing, for surely other inspired composers have done the same. And now we can only express our regret that our musical entrepreneurs show such a deplorable lack of enterprise in turning a deaf ear to the vociferations of Italian Futurists. We are really anxious to see the 'man symbol' rejuvenated by the Queen's Hall Orchestra.

If any are weary of the eternal sameness of European music, from JAVANESE MUSIC. Bach to Bartok, they may now look for a new diversion from the East. We understand that a Javanese Season is to be given in London next Autumn by Miss Eva Gautier, a Canadian singer who has toured extensively in far Eastern countries. She is bringing a 'gamelan'—a set of native gongs of limpid tone—with twelve players to manipulate it, and a troupe of Javanese dancing-girls. The repertoire is to include Javanese, Sundanese, and Malay songs. Scenery by Bakst will be used. Herr Paul Seelig, an authority on Javanese song, is actively encouraging and assisting the enterprise.

THE MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS OF THE BIBLE.*

BY KATHLEEN SCHLESINGER.

The music of the ancient Hebrews as set forth in the Old Testament has always been wrapped in a certain atmosphere of mystery. No satisfactory account of it has been given, although the subject has attracted many writers, who have expounded theories and speculations innumerable. These theories are mainly based upon extremely meagre indications furnished by the musical instruments mentioned in the Bible, some of which have not yet been satisfactorily identified, and upon the character of the musical scenes described, supplemented by what is known of the ancient musical traditions of the Synagogue.

An attractive account in English of the music and musical instruments of the Bible, which has enjoyed a well-deserved popularity, was published in 1879 by John Stainer, and the publication of a new edition, revised by the Rev. F. W. Galpin, must be regarded as an event of importance to musical students. All interested in such questions would naturally hope to find in the new edition some fresh light cast upon the nature of the music of the ancient Hebrews, and, incidentally, upon that of the surrounding nations. But this is not the case, for Mr. Galpin has allowed the Introduction—which after thirty-five years is necessarily not up to date—to stand without additions. It would have added to the interest and utility of the book if Mr. Galpin had seen his way to expand this introductory chapter into a general survey of the nature and state of music in the days of the Old Testament.

The vast sources of knowledge opened out since the 'seventies by the publication of translations of the cuneiform inscriptions alone, might have been drawn upon to show the startling similarity which exists between the ritual of the ancient Sumerians and Babylonians and that of the Semitic races. Substitute the name of Jehovah for that of Bel or Merodach, and some of the psalms or hymns of ancient Accad with their lofty spiritual conceptions and vivid poetic imagery read like apocryphal Psalms from our Bible. The analogy is still more striking when we find that the hymns for public services in the Temple were classified by the Sumerians, not according to context, but to the instrument used for the music.

'A psalm on the Manzu for the service Bull in his chamber, for instance (Bilingual tablet l. 37 of the Hymn, 'The Bull to his sanctuary') and 'Prayers for the Temple, a Hymn on the Balaggu, concluded with a psalm on the Halhallatu (the reed pipe, Semitic, Hallil or Khalil)' are reminiscent of some of the headings of our Psalms. The latter example is from the Isin series of six tablets Muten-nu-nunuz. If we turn to the heading of Psalm ix, we find it inscribed 'To the chief musician upon Muth-labben.' The word labar in the

Her song on the pipes, for the shepherd her song on the pipes
His sister, she that knows the art of song, in that abode, her song on the pipes
For the nether resting-place, sounds forth in abundance.
(Early Sumerian text, probably c. B.C. 2200—S. Langdon).

In connection with the scale given by the pair of pipes (p. 114) it might have been as well to explain that the low pitch of those short pipes, $17\frac{3}{4}$ inches long (E \flat four-foot tone) is due to the property of the cylindrical bore which converts the pipe into a closer pipe an octave lower in pitch than the open pipe of the same length but overblowing the odd numbers of the harmonic series only—and therefore not the octave—which are the distinctive characteristics of the drone and of the clarinet family generally.

We do not find any explanation offered for the extraordinary potency ascribed to music in the Bible; the important position it held in the ritual of the ancient Hebrews; the elaborate organization of the musical services of the Temple on a scale surpassing any modern conception or usage 4,000 musicians; 120 trumpeters. We do indeed Sumerian or Babylonian means priest. This may be a pure philological coincidence, or it may mean that the Psalms were to be sung to certain Babylonian chants.

The chapter and supplementary notes on the Khalil are full of interesting and valuable information, and the old pipes from the tomb of the Lady Maket here illustrated (Fig. 50), the Gingroi or wailing pipes of the Ancients, which sob out with a peculiar buzzing tone, due to the extremely narrow cylindrical bore of the reeds, combined with the single beating reed mouthpiece, are precisely similar to those which were used in the annual ritual wailing for Tammuz in ancient Babylonia:

'Then unto the shepherd, into the Elysian fields went forth (another);
As for me unto Tammuz to his resting place I will go.'

find references in the book to the use of the Nel and Kinnor to inspire the prophets to prophecy (pp. 38 and 94); but the discussions on the form and structure of these instruments do not afford a solution of the mysterious potency ascribed to the How is it that a similar potency does not accompany the use of stringed instruments at the present day. No such effect has ever been claimed by listeners. Joachim playing upon a Strad. What are we to think of the magical or miraculous effect of the Shophar on the walls of Jericho? And why was it that at the rebuilding of the Temple, B.C. 535 (Ezra iii. 10, 11) although the priests were set with trumpets and cymbals to praise the Lord by courses, unremittingly, the converse did not take place; as when Amphion built the walls of Thebes by the magic of his music?

How explain the effect of the singing and playing in unison of the 120 trumpeters at the induction of the Ark into the newly-consecrated Temple of Solomon 'It came even to pass,' we are told (2 Chr. v. 13) in a singularly impressive and beautiful narrative at 'as the trumpeters and singers were as one, to make one sound to be heard in praising and thanking the Lord,' His glory came down as a cloud and filled the sanctuary. It was, therefore, to a vast body of sound in unison, accompanied by a powerful web of ascending and descending harmonics (commutation and resultant) at the potency of the music was ascribed.

III. THE LONG-NECKED LUTE OR GUITAR.—HITTITE ART:

The harmonic series of notes which constitute the actual scale of the Keren, Shophar and Khatsotsrah given on p. 156, but the statement needs a slight qualification; for, although the long, slender tube of the natural trumpet will give the harmonics from the 3rd to the 12th or 16th, the fundamental, and in most cases its octave, would be out of the question; whereas on the Shophar and Keren with their short tubes of wide calibre, the latter could be good notes, but not more than No. 3 and perhaps Nos. 4 and 5 of the series would be obtainable.

If, however, the explanation I gave (February, 1914) of my conception of the music of the ancients be accepted, and we imagine the realms of the harmonics open to their ears, so that, together with the simple melody or sequence of notes played on their stringed or wind instruments, they heard the harmonic chords above, of that mysterious ethereal quality which affects us so strangely when we listen to these concomitant harmonics for any length of time, then we can, on thinking the matter over, understand how these wonders ascribed to music might have come to pass by virtue of certain natural laws.

The divine origin ascribed to strings—a belief which still lingers in Persia at the present day in 'The divine Tar (string), the King of Music,' also symbolised in the mystical contest of Apollo and Marsyas—becomes significant. Man plucks a string, and after his finger has left it the natural elasticity of the wire, silk, or gut produces a music of great beauty over which he has no control except that he can stop it by damping the string. But in singing, or in playing upon a wind instrument, the case is different: the moment the performer ceases to breathe out his note all sound ceases—no after-vibrations are audible. The music of strings, therefore, would be accepted as a divine gift, while song and the music of wind instruments would seem to be the human medium of intercession.

The enjoyment of these harmonics also explains the prevalence of drums of all kinds in the East, played delicately with the finger-tips—not struck barbarously with sticks, as in the West; the skin of the drum-heads gives out real music in harmonics as well as the most varied and intricate rhythms. The cymbals of the Ancients, too, differed essentially from ours; their bell-like shape, and the method of striking one against the other with an elastic blow instead of clashing them, bring out a musical note of definite pitch and pure quality.

the Kithara. Mortals, however, seem apt to confuse these two very different instruments, and for so many centuries the word 'lyre' has been loosely used to cover both genera without distinction. And yet the difference is a fundamental one. The Kithara the Kinnor of the Bible and the so-called harp of David—was an instrument of superior construction

X. THE SACRED TRUMPETS (ARCH OF TITUS, ROME): c. 80 A.D. (p. 160.)

When we turn to the main divisions of the book which are concerned with the musical instruments, Mr. Galpin, as might be expected, gives the reader valuable additional matter and some interesting plates not in the original, some of which are reproduced herewith. If we consider this new edition as a tribute to the memory of Sir John Stainer, then the editor's Supplementary Notes are a model of courteous self-restraint and discreet scholarship. But in an era characterized by intense activity in all fields of research more might have been said.

The treatment of the musical instruments is throughout more archaeological than musical, and frequently belongs to the domain of Biblical exegesis.

having a box sound-chest composed of back and front plates connected by sides or ribs, as in the modern violin. (See Figs. 14, 16, 38, 41, and 42 where these features are clearly seen.) This principle of construction is eminently favourable to resonance, and in the older specimens of which representations have been discovered, the sound-chest is very large and massive, suggesting a powerful sonority, as, for instance, in the Ancient Chaldean Kithara (not Lyre) (Pl. 1A - which it has been reversed) from a bas-relief ascribed to the Gudean period, c. B.C. 2500, discovered by M. Sarzec and now in the Louvre. It is possible that we have here the Manzu to which the psalmist sang the service 'Bull to his Sanctuary' with the

Fig. 50. THE GINGOI OR WAILING PIPES.

Stringed instruments have the place of honour assigned to them in antiquity, and justly so. They are the instruments of the gods and heroes who are credited with their invention: to Hermes the Lyre; to Apollo

The Lyre, on the contrary, was slightly built, as shown in Fig. 17, and had originally a back formed om a tortoise-shell, to which was glued a belly of tin.

In ancient Greece, where we meet with the two instruments thus named, the Lyre is described as the instrument of the youth and maiden, and of the musical amateur, whereas the Kithara was the instrument of the professional musician, the Kitharedos, whose distinctive and exclusive costume is described by Aristotle (Polit. V., 6. 5). Had we any doubt as to the identity of the Lyre, it would be at once dispelled by the word Lyra appearing on certain coins at the side of the type of instrument described above. (See Encycl. Brit. s.v. Lyre.) The sound-effects of Kithara and Lyre are characteristic of the two great classes of stringed instruments of which the guitar and lute are the two best known types of necks. Guitar and Lute are not interchangeable terms. In the face of important structural distinctions so greatly influencing the tone, it seems a pity to confuse the two types as has been done in Pl. IB, where the instrument depicted is the true Babylonian Tanbur. The same remark applies to Pl. III., in which the instrument to the left is undoubtedly a guitar as the one in Plate IV. is a Lute. No one is better aware of this distinction than Mr. Galpin. With regard to the suggestion by Mr. Galpin that the man to the right in Plate III. is not playing a bagpipe but holding a performing monkey (p. 152), I quote lines 863, 864 of the Acharnians of Aristophanes*:

'And do you, all of you Bumble-bee pipers from Thebes, blow the dog's tail with your bone pipes.'

passage which has greatly puzzled commentators. Playdes and a few others suggested that the bagpipe which Aristophanes mockingly referred to was made of the complete skin of a dog, mounted with pipes. A similar instrument known as the Chevette, consisting of the whole skin of a kid, was in use during the Middle Ages in Europe. The Hittite bagpipe is evidently an illustration of the bagpipe described by Aristophanes, as I pointed out in the Athenæum in 1910, and also to Prof. Garstang, when he sent me the photograph from Bydos.

In conclusion, let it be said that the casual musical reader will find much to interest him in this new edition of a favourite book that should find a place in all libraries, public and private. The student, too, though he may not find therein quite all he expected, will nevertheless be stimulated on reading the book to new thoughts and studies by the contrast between the old and the new.

SOME MUSICAL EPITAPHS.

By C. EDGAR THOMAS.

A tablet in Ashover Church, Derbyshire, pays a personal tribute to the musical abilities of a bassoon-layer in this wise:

In memory of David Wall,
Whose superior performance on the bassoon endured him to an extensive musical acquaintance. His social life closed on the 4th Dec., 1796, in his 57th year.

Shakespeare's familiar lines, 'The evil that men do lives after them; the good is oft interred with their bones,' have perhaps never materialised better than in the case of a bad fiddler, whose epitaph reads:

Old Orpheus play'd so well, he moved Old Nick,
But thou mov'st nothing but thy fiddle-stick!

The Cathedral Church of Norwich has paid tribute to one of its organists with this eulogistic epitaph:

Here William Inglott, organist, doth rest,
Whose art in musick, this Cathedral blest;
For descant most, for voluntary all,
He past on organ, song, and virginnall.
He left this life at age of sixty-seven,
And now 'mongst angels all, sings St. in Heaven;
His fame flies far, his name shall never die,
See, art and age here crown his memorie.
Anno Dom. 1621.

George Lambert, the organist of Holy Trinity Church, Hull, is graced with this analogous verse, the resemblance of which to a foregoing epitaph will be noticed:

Tho' like an organ now in ruins laid,
Its stops disorder'd, and its frame decay'd,
This instrument ere long new tun'd shall raise,
To God, its builder, notes of endless praise.

A facetious inscription adorns the dilapidated headstone over the grave of another organ-blower, named Knust. It says:

Here lies George Knust,
At last in the dust,
Out of spirits and low;
Who for God's church did puff
All his life, long enough,
And its organ did blow—
'Till the puffer grim death,
Blew him out of breath.

The last line appears to have found favour among organ-blowers, for it also occurs over the grave of another of that calling, at St. Mary Winton College, Oxford. The subject's name was Merideth, and the opportunity of including an atrocious pun was not allowed to pass unnoticed:

Here lies one blown out of breath,
Who lived a merry life and died a Merideth.

Old St. Pancras Churchyard contains at least two epitaphs to members of the musical profession, besides several to its correlative, the dramatic. The first of these is just a brief notice:

Sacred
To the memory of
Mr. Stephen Paxton, Professor of Music,
Who departed this life August 18th, 1787.
Aged 52 years.

Paxton was a performer on the violoncello, and the author of several compositions, vocal and instrumental. He played principal parts at oratorio meetings, and his execution on the violoncello was specially praised by Burney. For some time he was a professional member of the Catch Club, and was generally respected for 'his exemplary virtues and universal charity.'

The next is:

To the Memory of
Mr. John Danby,
Professor of Music.
Who departed this life May 16th, 1798.
Aged 41 years.

Reader! If excellence in Music's Art,
By turns to sadden, or to cheer the Heart:
Whether by playful Catch, or serious Glee,
Or the more Solemn Canon's Harmony:
If Genius such as that can raise a sigh,
Or draw the trickling tribute from thine Eye;
Pause o'er this spot, which now contains the Clay
Of him in whom those Talents lately lay.
The spirit, fled to join its native Skies,
Here all that now remains of Danby lies.
Rest, much respected, much lamented Earth,
Remnant not more of Science than of Worth:
And tho' thy Works have wrought a better Frame,
This record is but Justice to thy Name.

* See 'Origin of the early organs of the Ancients,' Intern. Mus. Soc., I., 2. K. S.

Danby, who was a Catholic, held the post of organist to the Chapel of the Spanish Embassy, for which he wrote several Masses, Motets, and Magnificats, now preserved in the Chapel library. These works are chiefly written for two or three parts, and are totally eclipsed by his glees, some of which are the best of their kind. During the latter part of his life he lost the use of his limbs, and a concert was given for his benefit at Willis's Rooms, on May 16, 1798. At half-past eleven on the same night Danby died at Upper John Street, Fitzroy Square.

On a gravestone in Stoney Middleton Churchyard is an inscription in memory of 'George Swift, of Stoney Middleton, who departed this life August 21st, 1759, in the 20th year of his age.' The stone was erected by the choir of which he was a member :

He's gone from us, in more seraphick lays
In Heaven to chant the Great Jehova's praise ;
Again to join him in those courts above,
Let's here exhalt God's name with mutual love.

John Macbeth, late piper to His Grace The Duke of Sutherland, has furnished a splendid example of the epitaph biographical, which may be read in the old cemetery of Newport, Monmouthshire. Macbeth died in 1852, aged forty-six years :

Far from his native land, beneath this stone,
Lies John Macbeth, in prime of Manhood gone ;
A kinder husband never yet did breathe,
A firmer friend ne'er trod on Albyn's heath ;
His selfish aims were all in heart and hand,
To be an honour to his native land,
As real Scotchmen wish to fall or stand.
A handsome Gael he was, of splendid form,
Fit for a siege, or for the Northern Storm.
Sir Walter Scott remarked at Inverness,
'How well becomes Macbeth the Highland dress !'
His mind was stored with ancient Highland lore ;
Knew Ossian's songs, and many bards of yore ;
But Music was his chief, and soul's delight.
And oft he played with Amphion's skill and might,
His Highland pipe, before our Gracious Queen !
'Mong Ladies gay, and Princesses serene !
His magic chanter's strains pour'd o'er their hearts,
With thrilling rapture soft as Cupid's darts !
Like Shakespeare's witches, scarce they drew the breath,
But wished, like them, to say, 'All hail, Macbeth !'
The Queen, well pleased, gave him by high command,
A splendid present from her Royal hand ;
But nothing aye could make him vain or proud,
He felt alike at Court or in a crowd ;
With high and low his nature was to please,
Frank with the Peasant, with the Prince at ease.
Beloved by thousands till his race was run,
Macbeth had ne'er a foe beneath the sun ;
And now he plays among the Heavenly bands,
A diamond chanter never made with hands.

At Norwich is another old-time musical epitaph, set up to commemorate Richard Yleward in 1669 :

Here lyes a perfect Harmonie,
Of Faith and Truth and Loyaltie,
And whatsoever Virtues can,
Be reckoned up, was in this Man,
His sacred ashes here abide,
Who in God's service liv'd and dy'd.
But now by Death advanced higher,
To serve in the Celestial Quire.
God save the King.

From Kimberley is taken the next inscription, in memory of John Jenkins, ob. 1678, aged eighty-six years :

Under this stone rare Jenkins lye,
The Master of the Musick Art,
Whom from the Earth, the God on high,
Call'd up to him, to bear his Part.
In Anno 78, He went to Heaven.

The custom of having an orchestra in the village church choir was one that died a hard death, eventual disappearing altogether about the middle of the last century. An epitaph at Warnham, Sussex, reminding one of the days when the violin, sackbut, flute, or hautbois were essential parts of every rustic orchestra worthy of the name. The verses in question are comparatively modern, being inscribed in 1880 to Michael Turner, probably one of the last leaders of the old-time village choir as our grandsires knew it :

Aged 89 years.

His duty done, beneath this stone
Old Michael lies at rest.
His rustic rig, his song, his jig,
Were ever of the best.
With nodding head the choir he led
That none should start too soon ;
The second too, he sang full true,
His viol played the tune.
And when at last his age had passed,
One hundred—less eleven,
With faithful cling to fiddle string
He sang himself to Heaven.

By way of concluding this article it may not altogether out of place to give the two following epigrammatic scraps, which are both at least century old, besides possessing a certain amount of interest to musicians :

THE TWO FIDDLES.

A Scotchman, delighted when Solomon play'd,
Would tender his hand ; but, 'No,' Solomon said ;—
'Though your flattery greatly allures,
This mark of your kindness I needs must repel ;
My fiddle you like, and that's very well,—
But I'm not over partial to yours !'

A gentleman once said to his son : 'What word in the English language, taking away the first letter, would surely make you sick ?' The answer was :

Take this—for I can find no better :
The word you mean is music ;
By cutting off the initial letter,
'Twill certainly make u-sick.

DICTION.

BY ALBERT VISETTI.

It is in song that music and poetry meet. Lyrics of the best kind, such as Shakespeare's, have a certain musical quality, and if they are merely recited in monotonous voice they lose half their charm. When intelligently read they naturally, and of their own accord, sing on in the mind of the reader. Formerly the lyricist and the composer were one,—the Troubadours, and the Minnesingers conceived words and melody simultaneously. At the present day there are some public performers who with more or less success make impromptu verses upon any subject presented to them. Such productions, however, do not rise to the level of poetry. In such a case as that of Robert Burns, on the other hand, we have a real poet imbued with the genius of his race, being stirred by some lovely melody or folk-tune which had become associated with debased words, reforming and purifying these, or writing a new and beautiful lyric to be henceforth worthily associated with the melody which had attracted him. The fitting of words to a given melody is needless to say of everyday occurrence at the present time, but, also needless to say, the quality rarely rises above the commonplace.

Many recent composers have set indifferent words to beautiful music, but the greatest of modern ng-writers, Schumann, attached equal importance words and melody. He who has once heard humann's settings of Heine's lyrics can hardly the latter, although they are poetry of the first tier, without thinking of the melody to which they have been set, nor can one hear the melody without nking of the words. The same thing applies to e folk-song or national song, where words and music e altogether inseparable, ('Let Erin remember,' cots wha' hae,' 'Rule, Britannia').

Seeing that the song has a certain literary quality, is plain that the singer can on no account afford to ore diction. He must, in fact, be able to recite a ce of verse or prose, and therefore have some owledge of elocution. Nevertheless there is nothing ore common on concert platforms than faulty diction. st as bad grammar and careless pronunciation in linary and everyday speech reveal a certain lack of ture, so also the artistic effect of a song is marred mpletely by negligence and defective taste with gard to the words that are sung. There are many ncert-singers who perform in such a way that ir text is altogether unintelligible, but even this is haps not quite so great an evil as slovenly pronun- tion, for in the former instance the song is merely perfect, an important element of it being lost to the arer whereas in the latter all the artistic refinement ich is one of the first requirements of a good song altogether sullied and spoiled. Purity of vocal sound, arp distinction of consonants, are vital to good ing, and they must be studied thoroughly along- e the work of pure voice delivery. Reading ctice should be done every day,—a reader who syllabically distinct in utterance is almost certain e an easily understood singer. At the same time e rise and fall of the voice as the intelligent reader ks to give life and meaning to his words prepare n to sing with convincing expression. A receptive ditor, hearing a great artist singing, is quite con- ced for the time being that there is no other ssible meaning to be given to the words sung— rds whose sincerity is so greatly emphasised by ir clear delivery.

Those who are only beginning to sing find some ficulty in pronouncing their words in the usual y, though this is soon remedied by practice, but e can be no excuse for those who give a vulgar awl to their vowel sounds, or who slur their con- nants in a slovenly manner: who say, for instance, ymph sand shepherds,' instead of 'Nymphs and epherds,' or 'Spani' ships of war, said he,' instead of panish ships of war, said he.' This is, as we ve hinted, only evidence of imperfect education d culture, or carelessness in approaching serious rk, both of which can be cured by the earnest dent. It is helpful, for example, to read acknow- ged masters of prose and poetry, and to appreciate e niceties of word use—shades of distinction in rds that are often looked upon as synonyms, our and sound in imitative words, &c. In ch ways the student is induced to pronounce efully for the sake of the exact meaning, and train his own ear to catch these delicacies of und. Correct impression leads to correct expression. e same applies to the singing of foreign texts. ench is one of the most beautiful languages in the rld, but if pronounced with an English accent it is e of the most hideous. It is impossible to derive ethetic pleasure from the song 'La lune blanche luit ns les bois' if the second word is pronounced one' and the last 'bwa,' especially as in this case e lyric itself is one of the most perfect ever written e poet Verlaine. Englishmen usually find less ficulty in pronouncing German, but even there a certain breadth in the vowels and an incorrect rendering of the 'ich' and 'ach' sounds are all too frequent.

In conclusion the words of Gustav Engel may be quoted as summarizing the whole question: 'The most natural thing in cultivating the voice is to preserve that peculiarity by which it is distinguished from all musical instruments—its connection with language. Nowadays we demand much from musical lyric and from the poems that form its foundation, and tolerate no opera without a good dramatic plot. In the same proportion we require from a singer his whole attention to the joining of word and tone. In our days a singer can please even if he does not possess a large voice. But he cannot sing satisfactorily the simplest song without an artistic treatment of the language.'

Church and Organ Music.

OLD ITALIAN CHURCH ORGANS

By C. F. ABDY WILLIAMS.

Rome, St. John Lateran. There are five organs in this Church, two being in the choir, one in the Cappella del Coro, a fourth on wheels, in the nave, and the fifth, the largest and most ancient, forms a striking object on the wall over the north door. It was built by Luca Blasi of Perugia in 1599. The late Monsignor Stonor, Dean of St. John Lateran, introduced me to Signor Capocci, the organist, who kindly allowed me to examine the instrument. Entering by a little door in the wall we ascended a narrow corkscrew staircase with candles in our hands. It seemed an immense way up, and it was evident that no one had been there for years. At the top of the stairs we emerged into the organ-loft, and found here an amazing sight. Everything is in ruins. The front of the organ, which looks so imposing from below, with its long array of tall pipes, is the only part standing. The centre pipe, an enormous pedal F 26-ft. (the lowest note of the organ), has sunk, with its own weight, into its foot. This defect, however, cannot be seen from below. The two keyboards have parted company, showing a great gap between them. The keys can still be pressed down, but they rise slowly and sullenly, as if in resentment at being disturbed from their many years of slumber. The sharps are white and the naturals black. The compass is F to F, five octaves, but the lowest F sharp and G sharp are omitted. The coupling arrangement is curious. The upper keys are armed with metal projections, shaped like the letter L, intended to engage with corresponding eyes in the lower keyboard; but how they were brought together, whether by drawing the upper keys forward, or pushing the lower ones back we could not see, and Capocci did not know.* The action is tracker, and there is a roller board, which has evidently been added after the organ was built. Capocci told me that Walcker of Ludwigsburg had 'restored and ruined' the organ in the 19th century. He showed me a memorandum drawn up in 1859 by his father, who was organist before him, explaining to the Dean and Chapter that no Italian builders had sufficient experience to deal with pipes of such magnitude, and proposing to employ Walcker, who had already consented to restore the instrument.

* Some years previously I played on the large three-manual organ in the Cathedral of Malaga, built in 1781. It had no couplers, but its keyboards could be drawn out over each other in such a way that when one played on the Great, for example, its keys pressed down the keys of the Choir. The Choir could then not be used separately till the Great was pushed back to its normal place. This was explained to me by the organist, the mechanism for this primitive 'coupling' being no longer in working order.

Since Walcker, a 'Frate' had been at work on it and had 'done further mischief,' said Capocci: but anyone with the smallest experience of large organs could see that it has long been past all repairing.

There are twenty-one pedals of a curious shape, the sharps, ornamented with projections towards the player, being arched on the top from front to back. The pedal-board is set at an angle of forty-five degrees, like those in Northern Italy, and the pedal keys are fastened to the lower manual by wires, outside the case. The lowest seven or eight only have their own pipes, as I could see by the trackers: apparently the principale is Spezzato. There are eighteen stops on the right and twelve on the left of the keyboards. Those on the left are levers shifting from right to left, and their names are printed on labels glued to the case. The right-hand registers are draw-stops, with their names on their knobs, as in modern organs. The uppermost stop on each side is the Principale, and the rest proceed downwards by Ottava, Quindecima, &c., as in column 2 of the Lucca organ. There are a Cornetto and a reed whose name we could not see. There are also several accessories on each side, in the form of draw-stops and levers, but we could not discover their functions.

We next went to the bellows chamber, a large shed built on the loggia overlooking the Piazza S. Giovanni in Laterano. There are six bellows, but no reservoir. They are arranged, with ample space, on each side of a conveniently wide passage, into which their long levers project. Pressure is given by the weight of broken statues.

Returning to the Church we now went inside the organ, and found the mechanism in such a condition as to suggest the havoc of a railway collision. Everything is bent and twisted and broken almost beyond recognition. We lifted out two of the smaller pipes that had escaped being smashed, and blew into them; they gave a soft fluty tone of an agreeable quality. We examined a big reed-pipe made of wood and mitred. It was about six feet long, and fitted into the heaviest boot I have ever seen; this was made of lead. The reed itself was very thin and of great breadth in proportion to its length, and had shared in the general collapse, its edges being bent up till it was hardly recognisable as a reed.

Capocci told me that in his father's time the organ was just playable till about 1863, but that ten years later it had broken down completely. Its tone is thus described in Gaetano Capocci's Memorandum of 1859: 'This instrument, constructed about 1599, was at that epoch one of the chief organs in Italy as to its grand and imposing front. In those times, however, the art of organ building was not advanced to the stage in which it stands now. . . . Those great pipes of pewter which show on the front produce no more than the smallest possible sound, which is hardly perceptible, hence they were more for appearance than for reality. The interior contained few registers, all of lead, and of the lightest possible intonation. They were without doubles (Contrabassi) or wood stops, hence the organ had no power compared with others in this basilica.'

Many suggestions for its restoration have been made, but nothing short of complete removal and the substitution of an entirely new one is possible. The authorities, however, are not likely to undertake this.

Rome: Sta. Maria degli Angeli. The only organ in this enormous basilica is an ancient positive, in two portions, as at Sta. Prisca, but not of the same shape.

It is concealed behind the high altar, a position in which I often found the organ. Its bellows are blown by pulling leather straps through the bass end of the lower case. There is no reservoir. There are six draw-stops for the pipes, a seventh being a Ripieno and an eighth a Nightingale. The last, frequently alluded to by Praetorius, consists of two small pipes and a leaden cup to hold water. The verger brought some water, poured it into the cup, and we were able to sound the Nightingale stop.

The compass of the keyboard from E to D is only one note less than four octaves, the lowest being a short octave. A set of pedals is coupled by wires to the pallets of the manual stops.

The verger told me a long story of how this organ had formerly belonged to St. Paul-without-the-Wall and was brought from there in a bullock-cart to serve for the wedding of the present King of Italy. It reminded me of the allusions one frequently meets with in old English church accounts of payments for carriage of organs from one church to another.

Rome: Sta. Bonaventura, on the Palatine. I had some difficulty in persuading the priest-in-charge to allow me access to this organ, the antiquity of which had been mentioned by the verger of Sta. Maria degli Angeli. I had to climb upstairs into a sort of lumber-room, bending my head and shoulders to escape the beams and the cobwebs; this led to the organ gallery.

The organ is very ancient. It has one keyboard and eleven stops, some being half-stops. There is a Nightingale, but this is not in working order. The pedals, E to C only, are attached by strings to the bass notes of the manual. The compass of the latter is the same as at Sta. Maria degli Angeli. The keyboard is much worn, and the case is worm-eaten. The date is thought to be about 1600. The tone is certainly good, and the instrument is kept in playable condition. There are drawstops instead of levers, and one of them is the usual Ripieno stop. A French priest joined me at the organ, and we spent a pleasant hour discussing it and playing on it by turns.

Rome: Sta. Maria in Cosmedin, Bocca della Verità. The organ is kept in a museum of antiquities, consisting chiefly of amphoræ and inscriptions, above the vestibule, and outside the Church. It is an old one, with one manual, a short octave of small pedals, and about ten stops, and is mounted on flanged wheels fitting a little tramway that leads from the museum into the gallery of the Church. I did not play on it. Probably it is only used for festas, and not allowed to disfigure the Church on other times. I noticed at Rome a tendency to keep the organ as much out of sight as possible.

Baveno: Lago Maggiore. The organ in the Paris Church is square, and its pipes are concealed by curtains which are drawn when the instrument is played. Down each side of the case are a number of medallions of Saints. On the top is a figure carved in wood, of St. Cecilia playing on an organ. She is flanked by two large flowerpots containing enormous flowers, carved in wood and painted.

The instrument has two manuals and thirty-five half-stops. The pedals are only a foot long, and are set up at an angle. The stop handles are lever-moving sideways, and there are two Ripieno pedals. There are also several iron composition pedals.

In the gallery alongside the organ stands a chest with a number of little doors. I took it to be a music cupboard, but on pressing down one of the composition pedals I was surprised to see all the little doors open. The chest proved to be an elementary swell-box, but it had no effect whatever. There is a set of bellows, a thunder pedal, and a terzo mano pedal, coupling both the manual and pedal to themselves an octave above. Six of the levers are on the left, the remaining twenty-nine on the right. The bellows are outside the Church in the porch. Originally they had no reservoir, but some years ago were themselves turned into reservoirs by the addition of small feeders worked with a wheel. They are weighted with pieces of granite from the neighbouring quarries.

Pallanza, Lago Maggiore: San Stephano. The organ in this Church is very ancient. It is square, with six 'flats.' Between them are saints playing on stringed instruments. There are thirteen lever stops, the lowest being a real Vox humana. A Ripieno pedal acts without moving the external levers. There are no levers in this organ. A long thin lath of wood runs the length of the sound-board alongside the feet of the pipes. Between the pipes, which are separated by a good space, are wire tongues projecting from the lath. These act on short wires projecting upwards from inside the sound-board. On pushing a stop-lever the lath is pulled lengthways a few inches, and its wire tongues pull the little upright wires in the same direction. The latter admit wind to the pipes when a pallet is open. The vertical wires return to their places by means of concealed springs when the stop-lever is 'off.' Although I could see only one row of pipes, I have no doubt that each stop has its own lath and set of little tongues: and I believe this to be the 'Spring-laden' system of registering, described by Praetorius. I have read somewhere that it was used a great deal in Holland at one time, in preference to the slider. It is said to have the advantages that there would be no sticking of sliders, such as often happened in old organs (and does to-day), from the weight of pipes bearing on a weak sound-board; that defects could be more easily remedied by the organist; and that there could be no 'robbing' of the wind.

There are four octaves of keys, the lowest being E, and the upper, with a short octave. An octave of pedals is connected with the manual by external wires, as at the Basilica of St. John Lateran. There are four small bellows at some distance from the organ, arranged in pairs, two above and two below. The upper ones are worked by levers, the lower by ordinary levers, and they are weighted by pebbles from the shore of the lake. There is no reservoir.

Pallanza Parish Church. The organ was modernised at the end of the 19th century. There are about fifty half-stops, controlled by the usual levers, and a clever arrangement of the two Ripieno pedals; this, by the way, is also found at Baveno. The organist draws any combination of stops that he will require most often in a given piece, and latches them. He prepares a second combination by drawing the levers forward half an inch, which brings them into contact with a vertical bar attached to the first Ripieno pedal. On pressing this pedal the second combination of stops is added to the first. The second Ripieno pedal will now act on all the stops which have been neither latched nor drawn forward. The unlatched levers return to their 'off' position by springs when the Ripieno pedals are released. It will be remembered that at Lucca I found three Ripieno pedals.

There is a small Swell in a little case alongside the great, as at Baveno. But its shutters are not thick enough, and it is therefore ineffective. The pedals, of two octaves, minus one note, are flat, and just long enough to allow the heel to be used—with care. The parish priest introduced me to the organist, a young and enthusiastic musician, trained at Milan, with a passion for Bach. He played a Bach fugue, and extemporised for me in excellent style, surprising me with the effects he managed to get out of so primitive an instrument.

Suna, close to Pallanza. The organ was built in 1870, but was in process of cleaning when I saw it. It has one manual, half an octave of pedals, and its wind reservoir is weighted with bricks.

The following anecdote occurs in 'Pallanza antica e Pallanza nuovo,' by Viani Agostino, 1891: 'Early in the 17th century there were great rivalries between Suna and Pallanza in ecclesiastical matters. In 1602 some Pallanza men, armed with cross-bows, and accompanied by priests and seculars, had the audacity to disturb the Mass which was being celebrated by the Sunesi, causing such a tumult that the poor Sunesi fled. Some years later the Pallanzotti, having the worst disposition of mind towards the poor community of Suna, had the hardihood to steal the organ from their Parish Church.'

Philo.—As with the plain-song melodies, so with certain other old types of hymn-tune. We find both the 'English Hymnal' and the new 'A. & M.' giving us the original rhythms of some beautiful tunes of Gibbons, among others. If you are in any doubt as to the improvement, give a fair trial to both the bawdierised and original versions of Gibbons's 'Angels,' Hayes's 'Magdalen College,' and others of that ilk. Compare the harmonies, too. Here is the third line of Gibbons's Song 13, as given in the old 'A. & M.' (No. 182):

Unexceptionable, of course, as harmony; but it does not happen to be Gibbons. This is what Orlando wrote:

The 'English Hymnal' courageously prints it unaltered. The 1904 edition of 'A. & M.' retains the chord of D⁷, but lays an improving hand on three of the remaining half-dozen chords, and modifies the rhythm:

These are the alterations that should irritate musicians! I fancy few will deny that of the three versions the first is the best. And talking of original forms of popular tunes, I have not yet met anyone who, having heard the Easter Hymn as it appeared in 'Lyra Davidica,' did not prefer it to the modern form, excellent as that is. The old has a quaint carol flavour all its own. This the modern version has lost, without acquiring anything in its place. The 'English Hymnal' gives both, while the new 'A. & M.' remains faithful to the altered version.

Auctor.—I saw in a musical journal recently that of fourteen London churches who adopted the new 'A. & M.,' seven had either returned to the old edition or adopted the 'English Hymnal.' What do you make of that?

Philo.—It simply bears out what I have been saying. I doubt if the musical and ecclesiastical authorities at any of these seven churches could lay their hands on their hearts and deny that in essentials the revision is an improvement.

Clericus.—I fancy the trouble is more likely to be caused by the substitution of new tunes for old favourites.

Philo.—There, I admit, we are on difficult ground. In any kind of art designed for popular use, the best from a purely artistic point of view is not always the most suitable. Further, when a tune has been identified with a certain hymn for anything more than a decade, it is no easy matter to depose it, however superior the new tune may be. None the less, in cases where the old is bad and the new is good, we should not let the difficulty of the task deter us from what is an obvious duty. Further, I have lately had some surprising evidence that such changes can be effected without bloodshed, and even with less heart-burning than might be expected. As a case in point, take Barnby's tune to 'For all the Saints.' Here you have a case of a tune that fits the hymn about as badly as possible. The result is such a crop of false accents as can hardly be found elsewhere. 'For all the Saints . . . 'And win, with them . . . 'And when the strife . . . 'And hearts are brave . . . 'The golden evening . . . 'The Saints triumphant . . . 'The King of Glory . . . 'From earth's wide bounds . . . 'Through gates of pearl . . . '—here are some of the worst. Now I am free to admit that some of the old Psalm tunes do occasional violence to the verbal accent,—indeed, such violences are almost inevitable in hymn-tunes, since any slight metrical irregularity can be overcome only by alterations of the music, to the confounding of the congregation, and of the two evils we choose the lesser. But this tune of Barnby's offends badly in every verse, and to some extent in every line. If it were music of outstanding merit one would complain less, but it is not even Barnby at his best. What an outcry there was when the 1904 edition of 'A. & M.' appeared without it! Instead, it gave us a splendid tune by Stanford, a virile, singable melody, with an admirable free organ part, and, as might be expected, impeccable in the matter of accent. If our clergy and organists really go on using Barnby's tune because they honestly think it is better, one can say nothing, of course, since there is no arguing over matters of taste,—though false accents are matters of fact rather than of taste.

Clericus.—I do not envy the vicar or organist who tries to shelve Barnby's tune.

Philo.—So I should have said a few months ago. But I have lately had brought to my notice several churches where either the Stanford tune or the excellent one in the 'English Hymnal' has taken its place, and the change seems to have met with approval. Anyway, the new tunes are being heartily sung. Also, I was myself present at a church at Easter where the original version of the Easter Hymn was sung with gusto, and I have also recently heard 'When morning gilds the skies,' sung with obvious enjoyment, not to the popular and excellent Dykes's tune, but to a melody from the Genevan Psalter of 1551—a fine, strong piece of work, but one which personally I should never have dared to thrust on a Dykes-loving public. I mention these instances to show that congregations are not so hopelessly hidebound as we imagine them to be. What is wanted is more courage on the part of the clergy and organists—courage-cum-tact, of course. Introduce your new tunes with caution, and don't be afraid of repeating them at frequent intervals. You cannot estimate the worth of a hymn-tune by playing it or by hearing it sung once. The better the tune, the better it will bear repetition. So use it often, and if in doubt as to which is the better of two tunes, use them alternately for a few months. You need have little fear that the unfit will survive. Tunes, like human beings, usually find their level if you let them fight fair.

Clericus.—You have mentioned the 'English Hymnal.' What is your opinion of it?

Philo.—It is a book that has the making of the best hymnal of all. I put it this way, because at present it is suffering from the faults inevitable in a first edition of such a comprehensive work. But the blemishes are almost all of a type that can be, and no doubt will be, removed in a subsequent edition. Even now it is far superior to both forms of 'A. & M.' in its variety. There are not a few dull things in it, and an injudicious insistence on its more archaic features has been responsible for disaster in one or two parishes. I have heard of a church being emptied by its use; though as to that, one could undertake to empty any church by the tactless use of any other book. Even sermons have been known to—; but bearing in mind the presence of the cloth, let us not pursue this digression. I can only say that my own almost fanatical interest in the subject dates from my acquaintance with the 'E. H.' One may paraphrase the advertisement of a well-known journal, and describe it as 'the hymn-book that makes you think.' Anyway, I come back to this fact: here are two hymn-books, both of which are vast improvements on the old edition of 'A. & M.' They contain many fine new tunes by some of the best of modern English composers, better forms of plainsong and other old melodies, a wider selection owing to the inclusion of many fine tunes of the Grenoble, Rouen, and other quasi-plainsong types—ideal for congregational use, and healthily vulgar in the best sense of the word—and a marked improvement in such matters as arrangement, indexes, and so on. All these claims, however, would appear to go for little with the majority of people. Only the best should be good enough for use in church. Here is the best, and the bulk of the clergy and organists retain the worst, not as the result of careful consideration, but because they allow the irritable and faddy side of them to take command of their judgment.

Clericus.—You are a very inconvenient person, Philohymnus! I feel that I ought to go into the matter, more by token that our present hymn-books will shortly need renewing.

Philo.—Do nothing hastily. Form a committee of about a dozen representative members of your congregation to join you and your fellow clergy, your organist, and one member of your choir. Get a few copies of both books, and circulate among the committee for a month. Then when you have all really got at the inside of the matter, meet and thrash out the question. Remember, that in regard to new tunes the difficulty is less real than apparent, since in both books many old favourites, superseded in the body of the collection, are to be found in the appendices. As to the performance of hymns, I suppose you will agree with me that no singer who knew his craft would adopt the same style for a folk-song, a Schubert lied, a 'royalty' ballad, a Wagner scena, and a Bach aria.

Auctor.—We can manage to subscribe to that obvious remark without any undue strain.

Philo.—Very well. Both these new hymnals contain types of tunes as strongly differentiated as the kinds of vocal music I mentioned. Therefore, when we come to consider the method of performance we shall find that, as I said to Clericus just now, our concern will be with things far more important than expression marks. The 1875 edition of 'A. & M.' did such a great work in the cause of the popular side of Church music, that one dislikes finding fault with it. Nevertheless, the more we become acquainted with the original forms of some of the older types of tune, the less we feel inclined to forgive the compilers for their meddling 'improvements.' They evidently felt that these old strains needed some kindly attention to make them quite respectable. In taking this view, they were merely acting in accordance with the custom of their day in regard to old music generally. How many editors of folk-song in the 'seventies could refrain from smoothing over the (to them) rough places by adding leading notes, simplifying rhythms, and so on? For a monumental instance, compare the old edition of 'Moore's Irish Melodies' with Stanford's edition, based on Petrie and Bunting, and published in 1894. Our hymn-book compilers bulldozed old hymns in much the same way.

I mentioned Gibbons's 'Angels' (Song 34). Here is the original form of the first line:

This is restored in the 1904 edition, and also appears (in notes of half the value) in the 'E. H.' The 1875 edition gave us this dull form:

I could cite more instances of such vandalism than you will have time or patience to listen to. You see the inevitable result—a collection of tunes as nearly as possible all of one type. In regard to melody, rhythm, and harmony, the old tunes had to toe the line, so to speak, and have their hair cut and their faces well soaped so that they might not disgrace the highly superior circle to which they were given the honour of entrée.

Clericus.—Are not you getting away from your subject? You were talking about the manner of performance.

Philo.—What I have just said bears on that. The result of this reduction of Plainsong, Genevan, Scottish, Old English, and German types to (as nearly as possible) the terms of a Victorian hymn-tune, ended of course in their being performed in a uniform manner. My attention was first drawn to this subject many years ago, when at a harvest festival, I heard 'Nun danket' raced through at about $\text{♩} = 120$. It was, as you may imagine, singularly unimpressive. The crotchet passing-notes in the harmony sounded trivial, and the congregation, being allowed no breathing time at the ends of the lines, joined in but sparsely. I was not surprised when the organist said to me afterwards, 'I don't like that old German tune. It never seems to go!' I was young and diffident, and he well stricken in years, so I forebore to tell him that it had gone only too well, so well that its principal beauty—weight and breadth—had been shed en route.

Clericus.—Would you sing all hymns slowly?

Philo.—Not at all. That would be almost as great a fault as singing them all fast. What we want is more variety in tempo. Many modern tunes, as well as most of the melodies of the Rouen and Grenoble class, will bear a good swinging pace, the latter type for the reason that they are mainly in triple time, with the bar as the unit. Old English, Scottish, and Genevan psalm-tunes just as clearly call for more deliberate methods, while German Chorales (especially when the harmonies contain many passing-notes) can hardly be sung too slowly, provided the rhythm be well looked after. This latter point attended to, it is possible to have slow singing without the effect of dragging.

Plainsong tunes can be sung quite quickly,—indeed, the proper free-flowing rhythm is not possible by any other method. Let us aim at more variety in our hymn-singing—not the kind of variety to be obtained from fussy and sentimental dynamic changes,—such as '(f) In life, (p) in death, O Lord, (cr.) Abide with me,' or '(ff) Alleluia we sing, like the children bright, (pp) With their harps of gold, and their raiment white,' or '(f) Thy ransomed creation, (p) though feeble their lays,'—(all of which directions are in the hymn-book most widely used to-day), but by a choice of pace in keeping with the style and period of the tune, the more frequent use of unison-singing with free organ part, and the alternation of verses for boys and men, with occasional unaccompanied vocal harmony. In regard to free organ parts, I may mention that the 'A. & M.' proprietors have recently issued a collection of such harmonies for certain hymns of the older type. For the most part they are splendidly written, and should serve as models of what every organist of course ought to be able to do for himself. Their use emphatically demands a slow tempo, and the mere fact of the collection being issued together with the disuse of expression marks in the 1904 edition of 'A. & M.' is significant of a pronounced change of attitude in authoritative quarters. To sum up: Expression in hymn-singing should be on broad lines, general rather than particular, and should depend upon the character of the hymn, dynamic methods being more in keeping with hymns of a personal and intimate character than with doctrinal types. The pace of a hymn should be determined not by its length, or by a clerical desire for the service to 'go with a swing,' but by the character and class of the tune.

Finally, I believe that a service, however simple, at which four or five good hymns are well sung by choir and congregation, need never lack musical interest. There is much more fine music in some of these imperishable old tunes than in most of the easy popular anthems and services of to-day. The latter compared with such things as 'St. Ann's,' 'Hanover,' 'The old 104th,' and dozens of others, are as lath-and-plaster is to granite.

Popular Composer (entering).—The lath-and-plaster for me, all the time! I have composed some very successful anthems of this type. One of them, 'O consider my adversity' has reached its ten-thousandth number; and another, 'I said in my haste, All men are liars,' is well on its way to the half-million mark. Both have been warmly approved by the dusky incumbents of Wallapoona and Banana Island. Go to! A man must live! My lath-and-plaster brings me royalties. Can you expect me to be keen about your granite which brings me none, and is a beastly hard, uncongenial substance to boot?

Philo.—Those few pithy sentences tell us more about the state of our Church music than columns of correspondence.

Lector (waking up).—Or yards of homily! I have had a delightful afternoon, and join with Sancho Panza in calling down blessings on him who invented sleep. I was dreaming that I heard a street-organ playing 'Innsbruck' very fast, arranged as a two-step, and saw Bach and Luther, arm-in-arm with Sankey and Moody, dancing to it. The human mind is so given to retaining the things that don't matter, that long after I have forgotten Philohymnus and his jeremiads I shall see old John Sebastian, with his wig very much on one side, fealty footing that 'Innsbruck' two-step for all the world as if it were a pedal solo.

THE CHURCH OF IRELAND HYMNAL.

It is well known that for some years past a committee has been at work revising the words and music of the hymn-book officially used in Protestant churches in Ireland. On May 1 the Joint Hymnal Committee submitted their final report to the annual General Synod of the Church of Ireland. More than 3,000 hymns had been considered, and as a result of much sifting, 717 hymns were recommended, 470 of which are in the existing Hymnal, as issued in 1893. The 247 additional hymns include a section in the Irish language, with metrical translations. After much debate the Synod formally approved of the recommendations, but suggested a further revision of the Irish section and of the Carols, also the omission of Nos. 257 and 606, the Primate recommending the addition of 'God be with you till we meet again.' It was further resolved that the Committee should present the musical edition at the next session of the General Synod. The original 'Church Hymnal' was published in 1873, under the editorship of Sir Robert Stewart.

MR. FRED COZENS.

After having served for forty-nine years as organist to St. Stephen's Church, Coleman Street, Mr. Fred Cozens has been re-elected for the fiftieth year. A congratulatory resolution was passed expressing 'high appreciation of the able and efficient manner in which Mr. Cozens has carried out his duties, and the high esteem and regard felt for him by all who have been brought into relationship with him.' Mr. Cozens was once a chorister at the Temple Church, under Dr. Hopkins. After a short period as organist at Chigwell Parish Church, he received his present appointment in April, 1865. For over thirty years he has been an assistant lay-vicar (tenor) at Westminster Abbey. His other activities, which include abundant teaching and recital-giving, have helped to form a busy career.

The steady increase in the number of competent blind musicians has been the incentive to the starting of an Embossed Music Fund, with the object of supplying the blind musician, especially the blind organist, with a more adequate stock of Braille music. Though a certain amount has lately been done, the supply of complete settings to Morning and Evening Canticles and Holy Communion is still limited to three, Stanford in B flat, Tours in F, and Smart in F; while the supply of anthems and organ music is quite inadequate for average needs. Donations should be sent to the hon. treasurer, Mr. P. V. M. Benecke, Magdalen College, Oxford. Circulars with full particulars may be had from the hon. secretary, Mr. H. C. Warrilow, 10, Staverton Road, Oxford.

Sir J. D. McClure, Mus. D., presided over the sixth annual Conference of the Free Church Musicians' Union held in Paddington Congregational Church on April 28. There was an excellent attendance, and the president's address was listened to with much interest. The Rev. John Wakerley spoke upon 'The aspect of worship music from the minister's standpoint.' During the evening choral selections were sung by the Nonconformist Choir Union, conducted by Mr. Harry Sharland. Madame Nellie Dunford and Mr. Arthur Rose were the vocalists, and Mr. J. A. Meale gave organ solos. It was announced that Mr. Horace G. Holmes was elected president for 1915, and Mr. H. F. Nicholls and Mr. J. E. Leah were re-elected secretary and treasurer respectively. The annual meetings next year will be held at Newport (Mon.), where the general secretary and founder of the Union resides.

Some interesting recitals have recently been given in the First Presbyterian Church, Rosemary Street, Belfast, by the organist of the Church, Mr. Wilfrid J. Layton. One programme was devoted entirely to British music, the organ works chosen being Basil Harwood's first Sonata, Frank Bridge's Adagio in E, Sir Hubert Parry's Choral Prelude, 'The old 104th,' and Healey Willan's 'Epilogue'; the songs, given by Mr. Alfred J. Layton, were Stanford's 'Prospice' and Norman O'Neill's 'The one eternal Sun of right.' Other programmes have represented the French and German schools. Bach's 'St. John' Passion was given at this Church under Mr. Layton's direction, for the first time at Belfast, and on April 29 Mr. Layton gave a lecture-recital of Bach's music at the Ulster Arts Club.

We have recently received the specification of a new organ installed in Holy Trinity Church, Winnipeg, by the Canadian Pipe Organ Company, St. Hyacinthe, Quebec. We regret that we are unable to print it in extenso. There are fifty speaking stops.

Mr. W. H. J. Coventry, late organist and choirmaster of St. Saviour's Church, Hoxton, has been presented with an illuminated address, together with two handsome easy chairs, by the past and present choirmen of that Church on the occasion of his resignation after thirty-five years' service.

Messrs. Novello & Co. have just issued under one cover Barnby's edition of the Ferial Responses with Litany, and the Preces and Responses with Litany according to Tallis.

The Hampshire Association of Organists held a meeting at the Town Hall, Portsmouth, on May 2, when Dr. Sweeting gave a lecture on 'The organ music of César Franck.'

On May 5 Mr. F. Gostelow completed his twenty-fifth year of service as organist of Luton Parish Church.

The choir of Penarth Road United Methodist Church, Cardiff, sang Arthur Broad's Cantata, 'The Moabites' under Mr. W. H. Short's direction on April 22.

Gounod's 'Mors et Vita' was sung with English words at College Street Chapel, Northampton, on April 26. Mr. R. W. Strickland was the organist, and the solo parts were taken by Mrs. Colin Croall, Mr. George Cook, Miss Gertie Smith, and Mr. Alfred Falkner.

On Saturday evening, May 2, the Manchester and District Church of England Organist and Choirmasters' Association concluded their first session, under the presidency of Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson. Mr. T. Barlow Maude, choirmaster of St. Ann's Church, City, gave an excellent address on choir-training. At previous meetings papers had been read by Mr. Nicholson and Mr. W. H. Ellis.

A Festival service was held at Cartmel Priory Church on May 3. The choir, numbering 160 voices, sang Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' and Bach's 'Sleepers, awake!' Lady Valda Machell sang three solos. Mr. George Rathbone was at the organ, and Mr. Alfred Willink conducted. The organ is being rebuilt at a cost of £500.

The Carnforth Choral Society gave a Festival service in Warton Parish Church on May 10. The choral works consisted of the 'Gloria' from Bach's Mass in B minor, the same composer's 'Sleepers, wake!' and Brahms's 'Song of Destiny.' Mr. Gervase Elwes sang the 'Benedictus' from the Mass in B minor, and Mr. George Rathbone, in addition to accompanying throughout on the organ, played the 'St. Ann's' Fugue. Mr. Fuller-Maitland, the president of the Society, sang in the choir, and Mr. Unsworth conducted.

The Leytonstone Church Choir Association commenced their fourth year by assisting at Evensong on the anniversary of the King's Accession at the Church of St. Andrew. Harwood's setting of the Canticles in A flat, Noble's 'Glory to God,' and the 'Hallelujah' from 'Judas Maccabæus' were sung by the choir of 150 voices. The Association now comprises the choirs of five churches in Leytonstone and Wanstead Slip.

Reviews.

Give unto the Lord (Psalm xxix.). Set for S.A.T.B., with accompaniment for organ and orchestra. By Edward Elgar (Op. 74).

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

This work, composed for the 1914 Festival of the Sons of the Clergy, is a notable addition to the already long list of choral settings of the Psalms. The words have inspired the composer to some characteristic strains, full of the breadth and vigour we have come to expect from him. The note struck by this fine opening phrase:

Maestoso. ♩ = 72. Nobilmente.

S. Give un-to the Lord, O ye might - y, with its bold drop of a seventh, and the meeting of the voices in unison on the word 'Lord,' is maintained throughout a work full of graphic touches. The passage dealing with the words 'the glory of God thundereth,' with its rolling bass and detached chords, the little syncopated figure set to 'breaketh the cedar-trees,' the desolate and bleak effect of the voice-parts at 'strippeth the forests bare,'—these are a few of the many notable points. In contrast to such dramatic passages, is the suave setting of the words, 'In His temple doth everyone speak of His glory.' Typically Elgarian phrases are:

A.

T.

B.

TEMORS & BASSES.

Yea, the Lord . . . break-eth the ce -

- dars of Leb-an-on.

and the beautifully simple ending:

1st SOPRANO.
S. The bless - ing of peace. th-

2nd SOPRANO.
A. The bless - ing of bless - ing, the bless-ing of peace. . .

peace, the bless ing of peace. . .

lento.

The work, which takes about seven minutes to perform, would serve well as a Festival anthem. The music is not very difficult, but the faithful carrying out of the composer's intentions in such matters as nuance and phrasing—upon which much of its effectiveness depends—calls for a well-trained choir.

Six songs from 'A Shropshire Lad,' 'Bredon Hill,' and other songs. Eleven Folk-songs from Sussex. By George Butterworth.

[Augener, Ltd.]

A. E. Housman's 'A Shropshire Lad' poems appear to possess as irresistible an attraction for English composers as do those of Heine for German musicians. Mr. Butterworth's settings are especially worthy of careful study if only for their striking individuality, and for the admirable use made of folk-song idiom. In a brief review it is impossible to indicate the many beauties of these songs, but taking them as a whole, the chief impression left upon the mind is one of classic grace and purity of form and outline rather than of warmth of colour and rich embroidery. In many of the songs the accompaniment consists of only an occasional simple chord or arpeggio, and yet there is no sense of loss. We cite 'Loveliest of trees' as an instance of the remarkable effect produced by this economy of material. The most ambitious setting is that of 'Bredon Hill.' The composer reflects the varying moods of the poem in a series of entirely satisfying modulations, the reiterated melody for the voice gradually rising in register to the climax of the last verse. But it is a difficult song to sing, and the voice-part, especially at this climax, is singularly ungrateful. An abrupt change from the chord of F minor to the dominant of E \flat major, with a descent for the voice of a 9th, from the G in alt, is apt to be very disconcerting.

The arrangements of the Sussex folk-songs are models of what such arrangements should be. The version of 'Tarry Trowsers' should become widely popular.

Summ' is icumen in. By Jamieson B. Hurry.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Dr. Hurry's description of the famous piece of old English music was first published in connection with the unveiling, at Reading Abbey, of a memorial tablet bearing a facsimile of the Canon. In response to a widespread demand, the author has issued an enlarged and revised edition. The various sections of this handsome booklet deal with the Canon, the composer, the transcribers, the performers, the manuscript, the harmony, the notation, and the modern score. The book ends with some famous musicians' opinions of the old work, and by way of frontispiece there is a beautiful facsimile of a portion of the original manuscript.

Russian Organ Album. 1st series. Arranged by H. A. Fricker.

[Breitkopf & Härtel.]

This is a collection of sixteen short pieces, mainly drawn from pianoforte and chamber music, by various modern Russian composers. Arensky is represented by five works, Rebikov by three, and among other composers included are Glière, Cui, Rachmaninov, and Tchaikovsky. The pieces are well adapted for the organ, and are only moderately difficult. The volume should be a useful addition to the organist's library.

O Thou that hearest prayer. Anthem for Lent or general use. By R. Walker Robson. (No. 1048, Octavo Anthems.)
Te Deum Laudamus. Chant setting by John E. West. (No. 914, Parish Choir Book.)

The Office of Holy Communion. Set to music in the key of C. By John Ireland.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Mr. Walker Robson's anthem is a devotional setting of some well-chosen words. An organ part is provided, but it is merely a duplication of the voice parts, for use when the choir needs support. The music should if possible be sung unaccompanied, when the excellent vocal writing will be heard to advantage. The anthem is about as difficult as Goss's 'O Saviour of the world.'

Mr. West's chant-setting of 'Te Deum' should be useful where congregational singing of the Canticle is desired. The three chants are bold and well contrasted, and the reciting-notes are not inconveniently high.

A satisfactory feature in modern settings of the Communion Service is the liberal use of progressions of markedly ecclesiastical character. The time is happily gone when the main requirement was mere tunefulness or musical effectiveness. It is now generally recognised that Church music, like Church architecture, should have a distinctive idiom, and it is natural that this idiom should draw somewhat from the ancient modal system, and from the polyphonic school of Church music.

Mr. Ireland, in his setting of the Communion Service, shows himself to be under both these influences. The result is not a stifling of his individuality, but an ability to impart the right flavour to his ideas. The music throughout is gratefully written for the voice, and mainly bold and diatonic in character. How much may be done with simple means is shown in many parts of the Service, but in this respect we would especially commend the Benedictus, a beautiful, unaffected piece of music, yet simplicity itself. As a specimen of the composer's bold and telling vocal writing, we quote the following—one of many such passages:

The Service (which includes a setting of the Lord's Prayer, for unaccompanied singing) may be heartily commended. It is well within the powers of the average parish church choir.

A New School of Gregorian Chant. By Rev. Dom Dominic Johnner, O.S.B., of Beuron Abbey. Second English edition. Translated from the third re-written and enlarged German edition by the Rev. W. A. Hofer.

[Ratisbon : Frederick Pustet.]

In 1906 Dom Johnner, O.S.B., brought out the first edition of his 'New School of Gregorian Chant,' which at once arrested attention such that a second issue was almost immediately called for. A completely re-written and revised third edition appeared in 1913, and it is from this revision that the present English edition has been translated by the Rev. W. A. Hofer, of the Diocese of Birmingham.

Dom Johnner sets forth in clear language the best method of rendering Gregorian chant, with admirable vocal exercises. He advocates free rhythm, and illustrates his examples with rhythmical accents. The historical notes are particularly valuable. No better text-book can be recommended, and the examples are all taken from the official Vatican choral books.

Frage. Perpetuo (The Humming Bird.) Two pieces for violin. By Franz Drdla. Op. 131.

[G. Schirmer, Ltd.]

These two pieces would be very acceptable concert items. 'Frage' is a melodious piece, perhaps a little too definite in style for its title, while its companion is an attractive specimen of the 'non-stop' type. The pianoforte accompaniment to both pieces is easy.

Love's Dirge. Song to Sleep. Lights in fishing-boats at sea. By Gustave Ferrari.

[G. Schirmer, Ltd.]

Three admirable songs, with particularly well-written accompaniments. We are specially impressed by 'Love's Dirge,' a sombre and expressive little work.

Correspondence.

THE MANUSCRIPTS OF CLEMENTI.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—I possess a large parcel of autograph music by Clementi, including portions, more or less complete, of Symphonies in C, D, and G. Two interesting dates occur in the MSS.—'Roma, 1807,' and 'Paris, Aug. 2, 1821.'

I shall be happy to permit any inquirer to see the manuscripts.—Yours faithfully,

WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS.

A SWELL-BOX FOR THE TUBA.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—I believe that there has been considerable controversy lately, as to whether it is advantageous to enclose the Tuba in a swell-box. I have heard that many experts have said that there is absolutely no doubt about the question. Perhaps this may be so in the case of non-resonant buildings, when the practice is undoubtedly conducive to greater efficiency. There are of course excellent examples of enclosed Tubas at St. Alban, Holborn (Willis) and Burton Parish Church (Norman & Beard).

We know that it is a stop of extremely powerful tone; it is, in fact, the most powerful stop of the organ. Therefore is it beneficial to enclose it in a swell-box? One expects to find good reeds in an organ honoured with the appellation of a Tuba, generally a Contra Posaune, Cornopean, or Clarion, or something of the same family. However, I should like to say that whereas the Tuba can sometimes be enclosed with good results, it is better as a rule to keep the Tuba unenclosed. It then possesses its full traditional quality of tone, and gives a fine contrast to the Swell Cornopean, as well as the Full Great with reeds

Yours sincerely,

A. E. LUCIUS BURR.

HUDDERSFIELD ORGANISTS.

With reference to the following statement in our last issue (p. 297): 'Huddersfield has the honour of being the nursery of other well-known organists, amongst whom, beside the brothers Parratt, may be mentioned the late Dr. Peace and hard by Shepley claims Dr. Charles Wood, and his brother, W. G. Wood, who was unhappily cut off in the prime of his career,' Mr. W. F. Wood writes as follows:

'There is an historic city in the North of Ireland called Armagh, which has always been proud to claim Dr. Charles Wood and Prof. W. G. Wood as two of her illustrious sons. 'For some thirty years or so my grandfather, Charles Wood, was a lay Vicar-Choral in Armagh Cathedral, and also held the position of Diocesan Registrar. He died at Armagh in 1893 and was buried in the old Cathedral churchyard. Both my father, the late Prof. W. G. Wood, and my uncle, Dr. Charles Wood, were born at Armagh, and received their early musical training at the Cathedral there.'

Obituary.

We regret to record the following deaths:

LILIAN NORDICA (LILIAN NORTON), the famous American singer, at Batavia on May 10, the result of illness caused by the accident to the S.S. 'Tasman,' on which she was a passenger. She was born on May 12, 1859, at Farmington, Maine. Her first appearance in England was made at the Crystal Palace in 1878. It was not until she had studied bel canto at Milan that she achieved fame. The period of her successes then opened with her operatic début as Violetta in 'La Traviata,' at Brescia. For many years Madame Nordica was one of the world's leading prime donne. At Covent Garden, where she first appeared in 1887 as Violetta, she was always a favourite. In 1894 she first played Elsa in 'Lohengrin,' and later she became accustomed to the larger Wagnerian parts. She was last heard in England in 1912, when she gave a song-recital at Bechstein Hall, amid universal delight in the undiminished perfection of her art. Madame Nordica was married three times—to Mr. Frederick A. Gower (an aeronaut), Mr. Zoltan F. Doehme (a Hungarian tenor), and Mr. George W. Young, who survives her. Her teachers were Mr. John O'Brien, of Boston, and San Giovanni, of Milan.

RICHARD HARRISON, at the residence of his son (Thomas Harrison), 28, Nottingham Street, Dublin, on April 29. He was born in 1835, and was educated as a chorister in Christ Church Cathedral under R. W. Beaty, a fellow chorister of his being the late Canon Torrance, Mus. D. In 1856 he was appointed organist of Booterstown Church, and retained the post for twenty-one years. On the resignation of Mr. Beaty, who had been organist of the Free Church, Great Charles Street, Dublin, from 1828 to 1877 (being also Master of the Choristers of Christ Church Cathedral), he succeeded his old master, and officiated at the Free Church from 1877 till his death. He was thus fifty-eight years an organist—the oldest at Dublin—and was a capable though unassuming musician.

EDWIN BENDING, at Brondesbury, on April 26. For fifteen years organist at St. James's, Westmoreland Street, and for twenty years organist and choirmaster at St. Cuthbert's, West Hampstead. Early in his career he was associated with eminent musicians, including Sir Arthur Sullivan, Sir Julius Benedict, Signor Alberto Randegger. His organ recitals at the Albert Hall were widely known and admired.

NORMAN SALMOND, a singer who prior to his retirement had a great vogue, especially in connection with the light operatic stage. He was born in 1858. His first important public appearance was made as Richard Cœur de Lion in the original production of Sullivan's 'Ivanhoe' in 1891. His son, Mr. Felix Salmond, is a well-known violoncellist.

W. J. W. JACKSON, at Forres on May 13. Organist and choirmaster at the United Free High Church, Forres, from 1903 to 1913, he was widely known as a performer of exceptional attainments. At a former time he acted as assistant to Sir Arthur Sullivan and to Dr. A. L. Peace, both of whom thought highly of his gifts.

JAMES CUTHBERT HADDEN, on May 1, aged fifty-three. Organist at Crieff in 1884, and at St. Julius, Edinburgh, in 1889. He was known as the author of the 'Life of George Thomson,' 'Chopin' and 'Haydn' (in the Master Musicians Series), 'Favourite Operas,' and 'The Operas of Richard Wagner.'

ERNST VON SCHUCH, at Dresden on May 3, at the age of sixty. He had for many years been Director-General of the Royal Opera at Dresden, where he conducted the first performance of 'Der Rosenkavalier.'

AMBROSE AUSTIN, on May 14, at the age of eighty-seven. For thirty-two years manager of the old St. James's Hall, Piccadilly, Mr. Austin was a well-known personality.

JAMES ALEXANDER BROWNE, on April 25, in his seventy-sixth year, formerly bandmaster in the Royal Horse Artillery.

THE WESTMORLAND FESTIVAL.

That the competition Festivals which the late Miss Wakefield instituted twenty-five years ago are continued in the spirit of their founder was fully realised at the meeting which took place on April 21 to 24. The competitions followed the lines which experience has shown to be most profitable—in an artistic sense—and it will suffice to venture upon a few generalisations in regard to them. One thing that was very striking was the high level of quality in the test-pieces, and the fact that nearly all those for adult choirs were for unaccompanied voices. The pieces by Orlando di Lasso and Martin Pierson, among the ancients, by Brahms, Parry, Stanford, and Charles Wood, among the moderns, were all calculated to elevate the standard of musical appreciation in the district. The most distinctive characteristic of the Kendal Festivals is the stress laid upon the music for combined performance, and the excellent concerts which formed part of the event must be dealt with later on. Their value in introducing local amateurs to important works is obvious, and in order that the task of preparation may not be neglected, the wise plan is adopted of including them in many cases among the test-pieces. In a word, it is thoroughly realised at Kendal that the end of these competitions is something more than technical proficiency, and those who had gone through the music set them could not fail to attain higher ideals than would be suggested by music less carefully selected for its æsthetic value.

A disappointing feature of the competitions was the low standard in the children's choirs, among whom an epidemic of false intonation seemed to have set in. Whether it was a chronic complaint it is not easy to decide, but against this conclusion must be set the fact that in the performance by the massed choirs of a very charming children's Cantata, 'Singing leaves,' by George Rathbone, there was no sign of it whatever.

The standard attained by the adult choirs was satisfactory. The actual quality of the vocal material was not higher than one expects in sparsely-populated districts, where careful selection of voices is impracticable; but this, it is hardly necessary to point out, has nothing whatever to do with the value and importance of a competition Festival, which is not so much to produce virtuosity as to make the most of the material available in the locality. That the orchestral classes produced no contest was disappointing, but not very surprising; while it was satisfactory that the instrumental trios were so good. The value of these competitions depends very much upon the judge. Dr. Walford Davies certainly understood the nature of his office, and his advice, very pleasantly tendered, was calculated to help those who heard it to make further progress before the next biennial Festival comes round. To take one topic only, his remarks on the danger of laying too much stress on the multiplication and over-emphasis of 'points' were admirable, for this is one of the evils which may so easily be induced by competition, and one knows by experience how it leads to a mechanical and soulless precision.

An exceptional interest attached to the two evening concerts, in that this was the first occasion on which they were conducted by Mr. Balling. He had a difficult task in following a conductor as painstaking and inspiring as Sir Henry Wood, who has been compelled by his many duties to relinquish this post; but Mr. Balling soon acquired the confidence of his singers, and the concerts have never been more exhilarating and uniformly enjoyable. The principal choral works were Bach's Cantata, 'Sleepers, wake,' and double-chorus, 'Nun ist das Heil,' Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' Dvorák's 'The Spectre's Bride,' and Hamilton Harty's 'Mystic Trumpeter' (conducted by the composer), all of which were sung with a spirit and force that never slackened, while the volume of tone produced by the choir of some 350 voices (a different body on each occasion) was excellent. The programme was not confined to choral music, and one could not but realise the value of the object-lesson when the choir were listening (and most of them did listen attentively) to Beethoven's eighth Symphony, the 'Oberon' and 'Meistersinger' Overtures, and the 'Thalassa' Symphony of Dr. Arthur Somervell (a native of Westmorland, be it remembered), interpreted by the Hallé Orchestra. The solo vocalists were Miss Agnes Nicholls, Mr. Frank Mullings, Mr. A. W. Willink, and Mr. Herbert Heyner. Mrs. Argles, who as president well maintains the enthusiasm which her sister, Miss Wakefield, infused into these Festivals, conducted the children's concert, and a word is due to the excellent work done by Mr. A. H. Willink in the capacity of honorary chorus-master.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

FIRST STAGE OF THE SEASON.

Taken in all, the opera season at Covent Garden by the Grand Syndicate has, so far as it has proceeded, offered more variety than usual. The first stage, which came to an end on May 23, has been formed of German works. This, in the eyes of the management, spells Wagner—and Wagner it has been. True there has been some Puccini interspersed, just in the same way as olives are found on the dinner table. But the real business of the season since it began, on April 20, has been to provide opera from the Fatherland. A complete cycle of Wagner was made up with the help of 'The Ring,' 'Parsifal,'

'Die Meistersinger,' and 'Lohengrin.' Some curious truths have been demonstrated in the course of the five weeks. The most pleasant is that the British public has taken kindly to 'Parsifal.' Less pleasant are the undoubted facts that 'The Ring' does not enjoy the popularity it did, and that some of our touring Opera Companies can give points and a beating to the Royal Opera Syndicate in the presentation of 'Lohengrin.' This is the general aspect of the season. In its particular aspect it has been remarkable for the number of different artists we have been invited to meet, and for the number of disappearing ladies who have graced the boards and been seen and heard no more. There may be reasons, but it is none the less tantalising to hear a fine artist who gives us a glow of satisfaction and then find that he or she is not to appear again. But the tantalising process must keep public interest alive, and it has certainly kept the critics busy. Those attached to the more prominent papers have had the pleasure of attending the Royal Opera for every performance that has been given since April 20.

THE GERMAN OPERAS.

Since they have been in the majority, the German performances require first consideration. The performances of 'The Ring'—twice round—introduced nothing new of note. An American singer, Miss Maude Fay, appeared as Sieglinde and Gutrune and also as Elsa, but though showing good intention as an actress also demonstrated herself to be too highly endowed with a vibrato even for such polyphonic music as that of Wagner. On the other hand Fräulein Gertrud Kappel has returned, and by her superb work as the Brünnhildes has easily taken first place as a Wagnerian heroine. That sterling artist Madame Kirkby Lunn has given her share with all its wonted effectiveness. Good work has been done by Herren Knupfer, Bender, Fönss, and Van Hulst, the last a new-comer from Holland with a most expressive voice and method. The tenors have been good in the shape of Herr Cornelius, who has proved the mainstay of this department in 'The Ring'; Herr Sembach, equally good as Loge, or Lohengrin, or Parsifal; and Mr. Hutt, who succeeded better as Sir Walther than as Parsifal. As to 'The Ring,' the interest when Fräulein Kappel was not singing has been inclined to shift from the stage to the orchestra, since the dominating figure of Herr Nikisch was there, and able to show us many beauties formerly disguised by the noisy manner of their presentation. Mr. Albert Coates has sustained—and more—the good repute of the British conductor by his interpretation of 'Parsifal,' which has been of a very high order. Herr Nikisch's 'Lohengrin' was inclined to the conventional; but the attitude of everybody to this beautiful work was rather that which regarded it as 'old-fashioned.' Then late in the series Mr. Clarence Whitehill made his appearance among us once again, and achieved much by his Wotan, his Amfortas,—new, but not convincing,—and his Telramund. A deputy for him appeared in 'Das Rheingold' in the shape of Mr. Robert Parker, who displayed a remarkably fine bass voice of the right kind. Finally, the last two performances of 'Parsifal' were conducted by Herr Egon Pollak, of Frankfurt, who imported a strong idealism, an appreciation of blend, and a consideration for the singers that was very gratifying. The appearances of various representatives of Kundry must be recorded. There have been Fräulein Pfeilschneider, who has better command of looks than of voice; Madame Matzenauer, who gave us both Kundry and Ortrud in a style that caused us to clasp our hands in gratitude for an artist at last—and then disappeared; Fräulein Morena, who appeared during the winter, but took part in 'Parsifal' for the first time here; and Madame Kirkby Lunn, who has shown us that the praise she received in America as Kundry was not more than was deserved.

ITALIAN OPERA.

In order to secure the necessary brilliancy the season opened with Puccini's 'La Bohème'—and brilliant it was; much preferable to sitting in the dark for three hours inspecting the bottom of the Rhine and like places. Madame Melba was the Mimi with all her old charm of voice, more vibrant than of yore; Signor Martinelli, bigger of voice than before, assisted, with Signor Ancheschi, who is, or regards himself as, a miniature Scotti. Quite a feature was the conducting of Mr. Albert Coates, who gave a good display of Anglo-Russo-Italian temperament. He also presided over Puccini's 'Manon Lescaut' a few days later. Then we were introduced to two new-comers, both at once. One was Signora Bianca Bellincioni, a daughter of the well-known creator of Santuzza, and the other Signor Crimi, a modern Italian tenor on the small side. Signora Bellincioni has the distinction of being a very charming actress, as well as a very charming person to look at. But her singing is less attractive. Her method is the bad Old Italian in three distinct registers, and much use of what may with truth be classed as the voce Bianca. She afterwards appeared as Minni, a pathetic figure, looking the part to life, and giving with much tremulousness all the harrowing incidents of the death of a consumptive. In 'Manon' her place was taken by Signora Claudia Muzio, who is said to be an example of heredity. The fact remains that she is one of the greatest artists that has stepped on Covent Garden stage for many a long day. She has a round, musical voice well under control, and as an actress has such power that she brought down the house when she appeared as the singing-tragedian in 'La Tosca.' Signor Caruso is with us once again, and prices have gone up. The question arises whether it is altogether worth it, for if his reputation is as good as ever his voice is not. There is some consolation in that he is singing better than last year, and there the matter must rest. So far he has appeared in 'Aida' and 'La Tosca.'

THE STATE PERFORMANCE.

Even at this early stage of the proceedings there has already been a State performance, given in honour of Their Majesties The King and Queen of Denmark. As usual there was a most extensive scheme of decoration whose chief effect seemed to be to destroy utterly the beautiful acoustic properties of the theatre. But on these occasions people do not so much use their ears as their eyes. For those who could spare some attention for the stage there was a remarkable bill of fare. Madame Destinn, Madame Edvina, and Signor Scotti made their first appearance this season in an Act from 'Aida' and 'La Tosca,' which, with Madame Melba as Mimi in 'La Bohème,' formed the bill. The 'Aida' excerpt was remarkable for the number of German artists who sang in it, and for the fact that it was conducted by Herr Nikisch. The performance was well attended, Their Majesties King George and Queen Mary supporting the visitors, the audience also including Ministers, Ambassadors, and suffragettes. FRANCIS E. BARRETT.

MUSIC OF ELIZABETHAN CHOIRBOY PLAYS.

Mr. G. E. P. Arkwright read a paper on the above subject at the meeting of the Musical Association on April 20. He said that it had long been known that throughout the early part of Queen Elizabeth's reign the choristers of various chapels and cathedrals frequently performed plays, but no one had hitherto troubled to hunt up the music for them. Owing to the great importance of these plays in the history of English drama, it became a matter of real interest to collect what we could of the music. Some years ago, he (the lecturer) had come across some songs which were quite evidently of a dramatic nature. The language was absurd in character, being typical of that of many plays of the period, and no doubt Shakespeare was making fun of it in 'Pyramus and Thisbe.' In a survey of the history of the Chapel Royal, Mr. Arkwright showed how it came about that later the Gentlemen and the Children, whose primary duty was to sing in the Chapels and elsewhere, took part in presenting plays for the delectation of Queen Elizabeth. The Children acted continuously from 1517 to 1585. The music for the plays was doubtless, as a rule, composed by the Masters of the Children—Richard Farrant, William Cornish, and others. The plays were greeted with a chorus of praise, notwithstanding their doggerel. A lively conduct of a moving story; a mingling of pathos and merriment; opportunities for good acting, and, above all, for the introduction of highly-trained and affecting singing: these seemed to be the most important considerations. The songs seemed to have been introduced without any necessary bearing on the action of the play, and though the words might be absurd, they could be made the vehicle of emotional music. The death of hero or heroine was invariably accompanied by a song. The surviving examples of this kind of music consisted almost entirely of Invocations to Death, laments for friends or lovers, songs of despair of falsely-accused heroines and such like, but particularly death songs of the kind which Shakespeare parodied.

The paper was illustrated by songs sung by Miss Gertrude Sichel and Miss Champneys, while instrumental pieces were contributed by some string players conducted by Dr. Marian Arkwright.

ADOLF HENSELT: IN MEMORIAM.

The centenary of Adolf Henselt's birth took place this year, on May 12. He died on December 10, 1889, in his own villa in Silesia, Bad Warmbrunn, where he is buried. It is remarkable that he retired from his career after only four years of public performance, and in the midst of triumphs equal to those of his contemporaries, Liszt and Thalberg, although he kept up his wonderful art until the last years of his life. He came once to England, but only a select audience had the privilege of hearing him play. He played at Broadwood's, and it will be of interest to English readers to hear the account of these private recitals, as they are referred to in the letters addressed to a Russian lady—a composer and pupil of Henselt's, by an Englishman, the late A. J. Hopkins, who was acquainted with nearly all the foremost artists of his time, and was able to give us authoritative judgments. Some of these may be quoted on this occasion of the centenary of Henselt, for whom Hopkins had particular sympathy and admiration:

'Henselt I heard twice, in 1854, I think, and in 1867.

In this last year, on the last day of August, he played a great programme in our large room to the best audience we could get to hear him. He played nearly every piece twice over to please himself, and when done he embraced and kissed me. His Chopin playing was glorious; faultless, but on a larger scheme' than Liszt's. (April 29, 1896.)

'I always repeat: Henselt was a great Chopin player.' (September 7, 1901.)

'I know Chopin is a little difficult for a German—there is something of an obstacle between. Yet Henselt was a real German, and Chopin never had a finer interpreter.' (September 7, 1901.)

MR. ARTHUR HERVEY'S OPERA.

A new one-Act Opera written by Mrs. Arthur Hervey and composed by Mr. Arthur Hervey was produced at the Court Theatre on May 13 at a matinée given in aid of various charities. Its theme is tragic and its style modern, so that all requirements of modern opera are fulfilled. The assistant of a famous Dutch painter, desiring to win the affections of his master's wife, arouses her jealousy by letting her overhear her husband's impassioned addresses to a famous actress who is sitting for him. His wife, poor thing, is unaware that he is merely reciting passages from a new play the actress is producing, and does not take the trouble to inquire where her husband learned such fine language. What she hears makes her jealous, and she agrees to fly with the assistant, leaving a farewell letter. The lover comes to take her away, and meets the husband. Convenient foils on the studio wall provide the opportunity for immediate settlement. The husband falls and villainy triumphs—not for long, as the painter lives sufficient time to explain all to his wife. To this fast-moving story Mr. Hervey has supplied a delightful score. He presents an extraordinary amount of variety in a short time, and shows marked ability in differentiating between the various characters. For the Wife there is good dramatic writing in the best modern Italian style, and for the Actress passages of lyric charm unquestionably French. The others are equally well treated. The instrumentation is masterly, its touch firm, and its point always appropriate. The Opera was very well performed by Miss Bettina Freeman as the Wife, Miss Di Temple as the Actress, Mr. Ivor Walters as the Husband, and Mr. Julien Henry as the Villain. The composer conducted in excellent style and was well received.

THE IMPERIAL CHOIR.

Dr. Charles Harriss's zeal for bringing English people together in the fellowship of song is not only energetic and wide in scope, but it is lasting. The work of the Imperial Choir for the present season was as thoroughly carried out as any of its previous activities, and the outcome was the enthusiastic and rich-toned singing of 2,000 voices at the Albert Hall on May 14 in the following well-designed and worthy programme:

Hymn	'Jesu, Lover of my soul' ..
(In Memoriam The Duke of Argyll, The Earl of Minto, and Lord Strathcona).
Chorus	'Make a joyful noise' ..	Mackenzie
Madrigal	'The silver swan' ..	Gibbons
Part-song	'In the merry Spring' ..	Ravenscroft
Choral ballad ..	'The Sands of Dee' ..	Harriss
Ode	'Blest Pair of Sirens' ..	Parry
Part-song	'Morning song of praise' ..	Bruch
Double chorus ..	'Praise the Lord with harp and tongue' ('Solomon') ..	Handel

This was not music that could be left to tell its own tale. It required many varieties of choral style and carefully-directed choral expression. Though deprived of ordinary opportunities for full rehearsal such as a standing choir enjoys, the Imperial Choir nevertheless showed the benefit of their training conspicuously, and much of the singing was significant and highly effective in manner, while the tone was always a thing to admire. We regret that lack of space forbids a detailed account of the proceedings. Dr. Charles Harriss showed again the easy command he can exercise over large bodies of singers. M. Tivadar Nachéz (violin) was the soloist in his own arrangement for violin, pianoforte, and organ of a Nardini Concerto that he possesses in figured-bass manuscript. Songs were given by Miss Clara Butterworth, Miss Alys Gear, and Mr. Wilfrid Virgo, each of whom earned and deserved the full favour of the audience. The accompanists were Mr. Hamilton Harty (pianoforte) and Mr. R. A. Greir (organ).

THE SOUTH WALES FESTIVAL.

This four-days' feast of music, held in four different centres, was again a conspicuous success. The assistance of the Queen's Hall Orchestra was a prominent factor in the artistic completeness of each event. The enthusiasm and fine tone of South Wales choristers were continually manifested, and it was again shown what splendid material a body of Welsh singers affords for the interpretative work of a skilled musician. At the Albert Hall, Swansea, on April 27, Sir Henry Wood conducted and secured excellent performances of Brahms's Alto Rhapsody, Schubert's 'Song of the spirits,' and Goetz's 'The water lily,' with the Swansea and District Male-Voice Choir. Beethoven's seventh Symphony, and the Prelude to 'Parsifal,' completed an enjoyable programme. On the following day, at Neath, Sir Frederic Cowen's 'The Veil' was given by the Neath Choral Society under Mr. T. Hopkin Evans, and it was again seen in what specially high regard the work is held in this part of the Kingdom. The choir fully realised the dignity and mysticism of the music, and the interpretation was thorough in both expression and efficiency. The solo parts were sung effectively by Miss Esta d'Argo, Madame Ada Crossley, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. James Coleman. Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony and other works completed the programme. The task of Mountain Ash Choral Society on April 29 was less arduous, but it was carried out with no less credit. It consisted of Elgar's 'The banner of St. George,' Mendelssohn's 'When Israel out of Egypt came,' the March-chorus from 'Tannhäuser,' and Harry Evans's arrangement of 'Hen Wlad fy Nhadau,' each of which was sung with notable power of tone and expression. A strong instrumental programme included Cyril Jenkins's Tone-poem 'Wales,' Bley's C major Violin concerto, with Mr. Lionel Falkman as soloist, and the 'Meistersinger' Overture. The solo vocalists were Miss Esta d'Argo and Mr. Herbert Brown. Mr. W. T. Millar conducted. The final concert of the series included a performance of Dvorák's 'The Spectre's Bride' by the Newport Choral Society that fully sustained the high artistic level of the Festival. Under Mr. Arthur E. Sims's direction brilliant effect was given to the dramatic and musical material of which this picturesque and individual work is made.

No. 71.

WHAT THE COMPETITION FESTIVAL DOES FOR MUSIC.

In the Daily Telegraph for May 23, Prof. Percy Buck makes some interesting comments on the work accomplished by the Festival movement in the East of London (People's Palace). Replying to criticisms on the movement about which he has heard, but which he does not quote, he says:

'I do not believe that any musician could hear the efforts of performers in the first year of a competition, and, revisiting the scene after five or six years, compare them with the later accomplishment, without being converted immediately to the view that on practical grounds the movement deserves whole-hearted encouragement. . . I can only describe the difference in the standard of attainment as amazing.

'Well-known as the movement is in country districts—for almost the whole of England is now honeycombed with Festivals—the Londoner who frequents the Opera and Queen's Hall is still, I think, a little in the dark as to its purpose and methods. What do we expect that the establishment of a festival will do for a district, and how will it do it? Any enthusiast could, from his experience of what actually has been done, fill a volume with answers. . .

'Any middle-aged man who heard the Boy Scouts from St. Simon's, Bethnal Green, sing "Tom Bowling," or the Young Men's Guild from St. James's, Ratcliff Highway, sing "You gentlemen of England," or the Shoreditch Working Girls' Club sing "Ye banks and braes," would admire unreservedly the beauty of tone and style, and admit regretfully that such singing by such choirs was undreamed of in his young days. . . .

'No one with practical experience of choral Societies will overlook the immense difficulty of keeping them alive when the impetus of an "appearance" is removed. If a choir offers its members nothing but practices its death is merely a matter of months. To the innumerable small bodies of singers in this thickly-populated district a concert appearance is almost an impossibility. But one annual performance in the great hall of the People's Palace must in many such cases be an occasion of pride and pleasure, and even perhaps a motive for existence. And when such choirs have the chance of learning, in addition to their competition pieces, a larger work, and to take part with their fellow-competitors in its performance at a final concert, an almost incalculable impetus is provided. . . .

'At the People's Palace the choice of music was from first to last admirable. From the fine national songs demanded of the children to the part-songs of Tchaikovsky, Parry, Stanford, Elgar, and Granville Bantock, and the anthems of such writers as Gibbons, one and all were beyond caviel. The singing of Toynbee Hall in Dvorák's "Slavonic cradle song," of St. Thomas's, Stepney, in Tchaikovsky's "How blest are they," of the Bethnal Green Choral Society in Gibbons's "Silver swan," and of Mr. Day Winter's choir in Bantock's "On Himalay" would have given a real thrill of pleasure to the most jaded concert-goer in London. Yet how many of a normal Queen's Hall audience, if challenged by a champion of Manchester as to the musical resources of London, would ever dream of including in his assets the choral-singing of Stepney, Bethnal Green, or Whitechapel. . .

'I would say that certainly the most astonishing and possibly the most far-reaching advance is in the singing of ordinary church choirs. An eminent man recently complained that in many churches the actual music sung was of so poor a type that no one with any critical sense could tolerate it in patience. He might have added remarks on the quality of the singing which would have been only too true; but he certainly could not have referred them to any of the choirs in this competition. In the larger class three choirs—St. Simon Zelotes (Bethnal Green), St. Mary (Stratford), and Holy Trinity (Stepney)—each sang an anthem (Redford's "Rejoice in the Lord") and a Psalm, both unaccompanied. Of the Psalm I can only say that in all three cases the singing would have done credit to any cathedral in the land. The boys' voices were mellow and beautiful, the balance excellent (the tenors in all cases being unexpectedly good), and the words and feeling perfect. And the anthem, difficult enough in its way to test any choir, and necessarily somewhat out of the style to which such choirs are accustomed, was scarcely less good. Yet these were voluntary choirs, trained in two cases by clergymen, easily reaching a standard which thirty years ago would have put to shame more than half of our cathedrals. Happy are the congregations which are privileged to listen to them! In the smaller choirs the Psalm-singing was quite beautiful, and if the anthem—probably none of the choirs usually sing anthems in their churches—was not quite so good, it still served to show zealous training on the right lines. A small choir from St. Paul's, Shadwell (trained and accompanied by a lady), was a perfect object-lesson in what musicianship can do with small resources.

'Lastly, it must be remembered that the work of these Festivals is amongst those who are definitely not concert-goers. The improvement in standard of these six or seven years I have said, without exaggeration, is amazing; and it is a standard which the competitors have arrived at by listening to each other, and learning from each other. At first unimagined, it was then seen in the distance and realised as a remote possibility, and finally, after incessant application, it is attained by those who, without this one opportunity, would still be singing bad music badly. . . .

ENGLISH WORDS AND FOREIGN SONGS.—

Discussing the use of songs by foreign composers as tests at competitions, the representative of the Daily Telegraph at the Midland Festival says:

'Debussy, of all composers, should never be sung in English, neither should Richard Strauss, neither should that greater Richard whose name was Wagner, neither, indeed, should anybody who set his melody to foreign words. The words were not foreign to him, but our English words are foreign to his music, and the imposition of a new language is not excusable, whether in opera or in song, unless it has the direct sanction of the composer himself, which is very unlikely if he meant what he wrote in the first instance.'

So at one fell swoop practically all but English composers' songs would be barred—all Schubert, all Schumann. This is a counsel of perfection that if followed would be a serious deprivation. It is all a question of whether what is gained is more than what is lost.

[The Junior and School Choir results are given in the SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW.]

MORECAMBE.—MAY 5-9.

The scheme of this Festival was as usual large and comprehensive. There were forty-seven classes, including solo-singing, pianoforte, violin and numerous choral sections. Many of the finest choirs in the Lancashire district supported the Festival, and the children's day was as usual a great attraction. A church choir festival was held at St. Laurence Church, and a Free Church Choir Service at Green Street Wesleyan Church. In the chief school choir classes a new and interesting Cantata for children, 'Childe Allen-a-Dale,' by Mr. S. H. Nicholson, was used as a test and the whole work was afterwards admirably performed under the direction of the composer. A striking feature was the singing of a fishermen's choir under Mr. James Cooper. They sang 'The coasts of High Barbary' (Folk-song), and 'Drake's drum' (Coleridge-Taylor), with remarkable rhythmic vitality. A suite of five English Folk-songs arranged for the Festival by Dr. Vaughan Williams, and used as a test in one of the choral classes, was another interesting performance. But the musical climax of the Festival was the performance of the eight numbers of the 'Gloria' from Bach's Mass in B minor. Four first-rate choirs (Barrow, Carnforth, Mr. Aldous's, and the Morecambe Madrigal) combined for this purpose, and the Nelson Orchestra assisted. Mr. Harry Evans, although unwell, conducted with his usual force and ability. The soloists were Miss Sara Silvers, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. George Parker. The adjudicators were Dr. W. G. McNaught, Dr. H. Walford Davies, Mr. Harry Evans, Mr. S. H. Nicholson, Dr. J. W. G. Hathaway, Mr. C. H. Fogg, Mr. W. Granger, and Mr. Leonard Watkins; the musical director, Mr. Percy W. de Courcy Smale; the official accompanist Mr. E. Bennett North.

The chief results were as follows:

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Open Class).

Tests: 'The happy isle' (four-part, unaccompanied) (Bantock).

'In the heart of a dreaming rose' (Hathaway).

Morecambe Madrigal Society (Mr. P. W. de Courcy Smale).

- 2nd. Ancoats Girls' Institute Choir (Miss Say Ashworth).
Mr. Aldous's Choir, Lancaster (Mr. J. W. Aldous).
Haverigg Millom Madrigal Society (Mr. H. G. Cooke).

Carlisle Madrigal Society (Mr. John R. Cockbain).

Blackpool Orpheus Ladies' Choir (Mr. Clifford Higgin).

- 1st. Padiham Ladies' Choir (Mr. E. Hitchon).
'Triphena' Ladies' Choir, Penrith (Miss M. E. Thomson).

Lowther Choir, Carlisle (Mr. Will C. Darley).

Mr. Hitchon's Choir were at their best in Mr. Bantock's piece. The performance was very fascinating.

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Open Class).

Tests: 'The Reveille' (Elgar).

'New Year's song' (Weingartner).

'The home-coming' (Von Holst).

- Colne Orpheus Glee Union (Mr. L. Greenwood).
1st. Todmorden Male-Voice Choir (Mr. Harold Lees).
Lancaster Male-Voice Choir (Mr. R. T. Grosse).
2nd. Nelson Arion Glee Union (Mr. Lawson Berry).
3rd. Habergham Glee Union (Mr. E. Hitchon).

The singing in this class reached a very high standard. All the tests were exacting. Todmorden was only one mark ahead, and Nelson and Habergham were not far behind.

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Class B).

(Eight entries.)

Tests: 'Tally ho' (Lee Williams).
'Father of heroes' (Callcott).

- 1st. Steeton Male Glee Union (Mr. Hume Wrathall).
2nd. Carlisle Glee Union (Mr. Will C. Darley).
3rd. West Ardsley Orpheus Glee Society (Mr. Fred Clough).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (Class B).

(Eight entries.)

Tests: 'Early one morning' (arr. Rutland Boughton).
Madrigal, 'All creatures now are merry-minded' (Benet).

- 1st. Penrith (Miss M. E. Thomson).
2nd. Blackpool Orpheus (Mr. Clifford Higgin).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (Open Class).

Tests: Madrigal, 'Stay, heart, run not so fast' (Morley).
'Spring wind' (Hubert Bath).
Madrigal, 'What is our life?' (Gibbons).
'These sweeter far than lilies are' (Walford Davies).

Bradford Philharmonic Society (Mr. C. Milne Rooks).
Armley Choral Society (Mr. H. H. Pickard).

Morecambe Madrigal Society (Mr. P. W. de Courcy Smale).

Accrington and Church Co-operative Choir (Mr. Edward Whittaker).

- 2nd. Blackpool Glee and Madrigal Society (Mr. Herbert Whittaker).

- 1st. Mr. Aldous's Choir, Lancaster (Mr. J. W. Aldous).
Haverigg Millom Madrigal Society (Mr. H. G. Cooke).

- 4th. Barrow-in-Furness Madrigal Society (Mrs. T. M. Bourne).

The William Woolley Choral Society, Nottingham (Mr. William Woolley).

- 3rd. Carlisle Madrigal Society (Mr. John R. Cockbain).
Hanley and District Choral Society (Mr. Ernest C. Redfern).

This competition excited great interest. Mr. Aldous's Choir were in fine form, and excelled in interpretation. There was little to choose between them and the Blackpool Glee and Madrigal Society. There was much to admire in the polished performance of the Carlisle Society; but they were not so well equipped with voice as were the two former choirs.

We regret that the unusual demand upon our space this month prevents our giving a full criticism of the performances of the choirs in this Class.

OTHER CHORAL CLASSES.

The Rev. C. S. Spooner's Choir, Shireshead, were the only entry in mixed village choirs; Bentham Musical Society (Mr. J. E. Constantine) the only local male-voice choir that came forward; and in a class for choirs of fishermen and sailors only, Morecambe (Mr. J. Cooper) sang unchallenged. Five female-voice choirs entered in the 'B' class, Burton-in-Lonsdale (Mr. J. E. Constantine) proving the best; the same conductor's Bentham Choir were first out of three local female-voice choirs; his Burton-in-Lonsdale mixed choir won the prize for sight-singing. Hornby Glee Class (Miss G. M. Illidge) won the challenge shield in the 'concert-music' class.

STRING ORCHESTRAS.

Test: 'Romance' (Sibelius).

- 1st. Huddersfield (Mr. A. W. Kaye).
2nd. Nelson Congregational (Mr. C. Townsley).
Padiham (Mr. Harry Tate).

FULL ORCHESTRAS.

Test: 'Siegfried Idyll' (Wagner).

Nelson Congregational (Mr. C. Townsley).
Slaitthwaite Philharmonic (Mr. A. Armitage).

The prizes in the solo classes were won by Miss Minnie Barlow (soprano), Miss Annie Petty (contralto), Mr. Willie Gardner (tenor), Mr. James Cooper (baritone), Mr. Charles Pighills (bass), Miss Marjorie Brown (pianoforte accompaniment), Miss Harriet Greenwood (senior pianoforte), Mr. James Stevens (senior violin), Master G. Jowett (boys' vocal solo), and Misses Doris Wright and Edith McLeod (girls' vocal solo).

KENDAL (WESTMORLAND).—April 21 to 24.

THE 'MARY WAKEFIELD' FESTIVAL.

This event still continues to prosper. The appeal is entirely local. Nowhere else is the ideal end of the competition Festival better exemplified, for practically all the resources of the singers are concentrated on the combined production of important choral works, which on this occasion included 'Sleepers, wake' (Bach), 'Song of Destiny' (Brahms), 'The Mystic Trumpeter' (Hamilton Harty), 'The Spectre's Bride' (Dvořák), and 'Now shall the grace' (Bach). The policy of this Festival is to have the assistance of the best orchestras obtainable. Last year the Queen's Hall Orchestra, under Sir Henry Wood, appeared, and on the present occasion the Hallé Orchestra provided accompaniments and played orchestral works, amongst which were Dr. Somervell's Symphony 'Thalassa,' Beethoven's No. 8 Symphony, and the 'Oberon' and 'Meistersinger' Overtures. Mr. Michael Balling conducted. The artists were Miss Agnes Nicholls and Mr. Herbert Heyner.

The competitions were held on each day. The Carnforth Choral Society (Mr. E. Unsworth) was successful in two of the chief mixed-voice classes and in the male-voice choir class the Eversley Choral Union was only one mark behind Carnforth in two of these classes. Nine village choral Societies who did not take the concert music sang 'Fain would I change that note' (Charles Wood), Hornby, Skelsmergh and Grange being placed in order named. The concert music formed another class in which Carnforth, Kirkby Lonsdale, and Grange excelled.

The children's day brought forward some rather untuneful singing in the competition classes, but the combined choirs gave quite a brilliant performance of George Rathbone's beautiful Cantata, 'Singing Leaves,' under the direction of the composer. Dr. Walford Davies was the adjudicator.

BRIGG (NORTH LINCOLNSHIRE).—April 21, 22.

This now old-established Festival has the advantage of being inspired by the well-known artist Mr. G. Elwes, who with his wife (Lady Winefride Elwes) and a committee, contrives to maintain the interest of this event. There were ample entries to keep Dr. Bairstow active for the two days. In the open class the Brigg Choir distinguished itself, and Scunthorpe was also in good form. Amongst other choral winners there were Frodingham, Althorpe, and Hibaldstow. A children's day brought much well-trained singing. Miss Muriel Foster sang at the concert, and gave away the prizes.

PETERSFIELD (HANTS).—April 21-23.

This Festival is established mainly for the performance of important works. Competitions are, however, regarded as indispensable educative means, and they serve to show that there are excellent capacity and good teaching in the district. On the children's day Petersfield gained the challenge banner offered for the highest aggregate of marks. In another division Harting secured a challenge cup for the highest aggregate, and they were very successful in other classes. In the adult choral classes Petersfield, Horndean, and Sheet were respectively first in various sections, Horndean winning the challenge shield. Dr. Somervell adjudicated.

The principal works performed were Mendelssohn's 'Walpurgis Night,' Schubert's 'Song of Miriam,' Dr. Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on Christmas Carols, a Concert-stück for violin and orchestra by Dr. Somervell, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 8. Dr. H. P. Allen conducted.

KESWICK.—Mr. Harry Evans, who adjudicated, paid a glowing tribute to the worth of competitions in the musical world. One heard the most perfect interpretations by amateur choirs and conductors.

Scotby Choral Society secured five firsts and one second. Other awards were: Clifton Musical, one first and one second; Brampton Madrigal and Male-Voice, two firsts and two seconds; Carlisle Presbyterian, one first and one second; Braithwaite, one first; Lazonby, one first; Greta Choir (Ladies' and Male-Voice), one second; and Workington Congregational, one second.

SALISBURY.—April 22, 23.

The fourth Wilts Musical Competition Festival was held at Salisbury on the above dates. The change of centre from Trowbridge fully justified the expectations of those who had organized it, as there was a very large increase in the number of entries (92 as against 62 last year), and the city itself was strongly represented in all classes, notably by two choral Societies in the open class for large choirs. The adjudicators were Dr. Terry, Dr. Brewer, Dr. Marion Arkwright, and Mr. W. H. Leslie. The work chosen for the massed choirs was Bach's 'Hold in remembrance Jesus Christ,' and Dr. Terry heartily congratulated the committee on their choice. A performance of the work was given by a body of over 600 competitors under Dr. Terry's baton, at the afternoon concert, accompanied by the Festival orchestra. This orchestra, with the exception of the wind instrumentalists, is composed entirely of amateurs resident in Wiltshire and trained by Mr. Frank Bartlett (of the London Symphony Orchestra). There were numerous entries in the classes for schools, both secondary and elementary, and a fair number of these received the certificate awarded for obtaining four-fifths of the maximum marks, thereby showing a decided improvement in the standard of performance compared with last year. At the concert on the second day the various classes sang the pieces they had learned for competition, and the massed choirs from all classes, over 700 strong, gave a spirited performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Viking Song,' with orchestral accompaniment.

In the mixed-voice choir section the Downton Choral Society (Mr. P. T. Fry) was first in its class, and Salisbury City Choir was first in the open male-voice choir class. Villages under 500 brought six entries, Patney (Rev. W. Weekes) winning. The Swindon Ladies' (Madame M. Dockray) were the first of eight. In the children's classes there were many performances that called forth high praise from Dr. Brewer. The chief results were: Bradford-on-Avon Secondary School (359 marks out of a possible 400); Elementary schools (two sections): Salisbury St. Edmund's Boys' School; Salisbury St. Edmund's Girls' School; Elementary schools (mixed): Bradford-on-Avon Christ Church School; Elementary schools (girls): Wilton Park School, Alderbury Church School; Village elementary schools (9 entries): Horningham Church School (167); Juvenile choirs (8 entries): Swindon Sanford Street Congregational Sunday School Juvenile Choir and Swindon Industrial Junior Choir.

An afternoon concert massed no fewer than 800 children, and there was a large audience. The arrangements throughout showed the thoughtful care of Mr. J. Thornton, the hon. secretary, and Miss K. Stephenson.

BOLTON.—April 22-25.

The Bolton Festival has only been held for two years, but in scope and attractive power for students it takes a high place among northern festivals. A note in the preface to the programme claims that already it has given a wholesome stimulus to the varied musical life not only of the town but of the surrounding areas.

The competitions occupied the attention of six adjudicators—Mr. Frederic Austin, Mr. F. Bonavia, Dr. Coward, Mr. C. H. Fogg, Mr. W. S. Nesbitt, and Dr. R. Rogers. The awards in the chief classes were as follows:

Children's Choirs.—Brandwood Street C.S. (Miss H. Booth).

Boys' Choirs.—Gorse Hill C.S. (Mr. John Corlett).

Junior Choirs.—Emmanuel Church (Mr. T. Entwistle).

Junior Choirs (Local).—Brandwood Street C. S. (Miss H. Booth).

Action-Songs.—St. Paul's School, Deansgate (Mr. J. S. Arkwright).

Church and Chapel Choirs.—King's Hall Choir (Mr. W. H. Bostock).

Male-Voice Choirs (Tenor lead).—Middleton Musical Society (Mr. John Kirkman).

Church or Chapel Choirs.—Altrincham Primitive Methodist (Mr. J. A. Hill).

Female-Voice Choirs.—Sale and District (Mr. Higson).

Mixed-Voice Choirs.—Sale and District (Mr. Higson).

The solo-singing classes were well supported, the entries in the four chief divisions totalling 127.

MIDLAND COMPETITION FESTIVAL, BIRMINGHAM.—May 19-23.

This is the third year of what has turned out to be by far the greatest competition Festival held in this country. On this occasion there were no fewer than 7,900 competitors. There were nearly 400 pianists, 50 violinists, 300 vocal soloists, over 60 school choirs, nearly 100 adult choirs, besides numerous other entries. But it is not by mere numbers that the importance of a festival can be fairly estimated. The real measure is the musical value of the tests submitted and the ability of competitors to interpret them. Here the Midland Festival could with confidence face any inquiry. We are unable this month to say all we should like to say regarding this colossal event. We have to be content to record its main results. One of the most memorable incidents was the performance by combined choirs of Bach's Motet for double choir, 'Sing ye to the Lord,' surely one of the most splendid examples of this composer's genius. Critics who cavil at the employment of fine choirs on musical miniatures should take note of the fact that this great piece of unaccompanied music was the only test which the highest choral classes had to prepare.

Another notable feature was the performance by 500 children of Mr. George Rathbone's attractive new cantata for children, a setting of Lowell's poem 'The singing leaves,' a sort of fairy story, the composer himself conducting. The children sang from memory extraordinarily well.

Below we give some of the chief results, and later we hope to make some further comments on the Festival.

The adjudicators were Dr. W. G. McNaught, Mr. J. A. Rodgers, Dr. Vaughan Thomas, Mr. Rawdon Briggs, Mr. Frederick Dawson, Mr. Dan Godfrey, Madame Edith Hands, and Mr. George H. Mercer. Mr. Harry Evans was prevented by illness from serving.

THE BACH MOTET, 'SING YE TO THE LORD.'

'S. L.,' writing in the Manchester Guardian, says:

'The immediate musical results of many Festivals have been more happy, for in a number of the competitions which we heard on Saturday the difficulty of the tests proved a disadvantage, though the educational results were probably on that account only the more far-reaching. In the highest competition for the choirs of sixty mixed voices everything was sacrificed to the desire to accomplish something notable in the singing of Bach's choral music, which has been proved again and again to present the greatest difficulties both of execution and combined interpretation. The choirs were asked to prepare his Motet for double chorus, "Sing to the Lord a new song," which surpasses both in grandeur and in difficulty every other composition ever written for unaccompanied voices. . . . Many of the singers sang from memory, and presumably had learned by heart the whole Motet. . . . We had to wait for the concluding performance by the massed voices of the seven leading choirs, under Dr. McNaught, for the music to reveal its greatness of character and for the singers to show their real mastery of it.

'In this performance the finished preparation and polish on the singing were first evident, and the 400 voices, singing without any admixture of harshness or discord, produced a most glorious effect. Dr. McNaught did not need to use any coercive methods, for the steadiness, breadth, and freedom of style and graphic expression, which had been lacking in the individual performances, now came of themselves from the sheer delight of the singers, who were now freed from their former anxieties. The peculiar difficulty of the work is that energy of a growing and developing kind is demanded most of all in the long passages of running notes which abound everywhere and are the life of the work. The composition is a supreme example of the greatness of music in its special field.'

TAUNTON.—April 23.

This Festival is in its second year. The children's classes were very well supported. The capacity of the Assembly Rooms was severely tested by the large audience and the numerous competitors. Folk-songs and dances were judged by Mr. Cecil Sharp, and the choral and other music by Dr. McNaught and Mr. Herbert Hunt.

The competition for village mixed school choirs for a banner produced a keen contest. There were four entries. Staplegrave won with 170 marks, Norton Fitzwarren gaining 164, Chipstable coming third.

In the class for country dances for girls under fifteen there were four competitors, and Central Girls' School, Taunton, was placed first.

For jigs for men and boys, Alcombe won.

For jigs for women and girls, St. Andrews (senior) was successful. Girls' School, Taunton, 70; St. Andrew's (junior), 65; Norton Fitzwarren, 60; Cothelstone, 55.

The other awards were (female voices) Taunton Ladies' Choir; choral Societies, Allerton. Solo-singing was a feature. An evening concert closed the proceedings.

ALDERLEY EDGE.—April 23, 24.

The growth of this Festival during the last four years has been remarkable, this year showing an increase of fifty competitors (making 700 in all) on last year's Festival, and there was also a marked improvement in the class of music.

The following choirs won the first-prizes in the chief choral competitions: Female-Voice Choirs (open)—Alderley Edge Ladies' Musical Society (Rev. E. A. Voysey). Male-Voice Choirs (open)—Congleton Male-Voice Choir (Mr. Frederick Green).

The principal prize-winners in the solo classes were: Mr. Frank Wolfendale (violin), Miss Dorothy Storey (vocal sight-reading), Miss Ella M. Beswick (soprano) (Miss Dorothy G. Cooper (contralto), Mr. H. Gasquoine (tenor), and Mr. William Elliott (baritone). A new and interesting feature was a class for pianoforte accompaniment, which attracted twelve entrants, each of whom had to accompany a professional lady vocalist in a Recitative and Aria by Mozart. The judge awarded the prize to Mr. Frederick Green (Congleton).

A strong quartet of judges was provided in Mr. R. H. Wilson, Dr. Thomas Keighley, Mr. Frank Greenwood, and Mrs. L. M. Tipping.

OSWESTRY.—April 24.

This is one of the oldest Festivals in the Kingdom. It was commenced so far back as 1880 by the late Mr. Henry Leslie. For some years it was abandoned, but five years ago it was re-started with every prospect of success. Seven school choirs sang Percy Fletcher's 'Song of the summer wind' and the old and very amusing 'cumulative' folk-song 'The tree in the wood' (Novello's Folk-song Series). Trefonen School (Miss Fulcher) were first. Many other of the classes had good entries, but in the village choral class only two choirs appeared, Weston Rhyn Choral Society (Mr. W. E. Frith) coming out first. Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson adjudicated.

OUNDLE (NORTH NORTHAMPTONSHIRE).

April 24, 25.

This very successful event is actively promoted by Lady Lilford. It was held in the great hall of Oundle School, a most convenient and handsome arena. Junior and adult solo-singing, violin and pianoforte solo, and choral classes are catered for. There were 22 entries in school choir classes. The school singing was pronounced by the adjudicator to be equal to that heard in the best centres elsewhere. Warmington Council School. Thrapston Church Choir, Burton Latimer, and Hemington were successful. Warmington won the Challenge Shield for the highest aggregate. There were 27 entries in adult choirs. Aldwinckle, Warmington, Raunds Wesleyan (specially commended), Oundle Choral Society (also specially commended), Cotterstock, Kettering Glee (a splendid male-voice choir) were winners. In the junior section sight-singing was by individuals; in the collective test for adult choirs Raunds Wesleyan secured full marks. Two first-rate concerts were given with the assistance of Miss Hilda Foster, Miss Ivy Angove (violin), and Mr. Thorpe Bates. Mr. Spurling at the organ greatly aided the combined choral performances. Dr. McNaught and Mr. W. McNaught adjudicated.

GREENOCK (THE RENFREWSHIRE)

COMPETITIONS.—April 25.

This new Festival produced an encouraging display of choral enthusiasm and activity in the Greenock district. There were twelve classes, covering the usual field of juvenile and adult choral singing, with over forty entries. Mr. Herbert Whittaker awarded the first-prizes as follows: Day School Choirs (Junior)—Belville Place, Greenock (Mr. J. B. Law). Day School Choirs (Senior)—Greenock Higher Grade (Mr. T. Sime). Juvenile Choirs—Hamilton U. F. Church, Port Glasgow (Mr. A. Gregory). Action-Songs—Greenock High School (Miss J. Macintyre). Mixed-Voice Quartets—Finnart Quartet (b). Male-Voice Quartet—Finnart Quartet. Female-Voice Choirs—Finnart (Mr. C. Forster). Male-Voice Choirs—Clydebank (Mr. T. H. Allwood). Church Choirs (B)—Union Street U. F.

Church (Mr. J. Mansbridge). Church Choirs, Psalmody—Gaelic Parish Church, Greenock (Mr. W. W. Kee)—Church Choirs (A) and Mixed-Voice Choirs—Sir Michael St. U. F. Church (Mr. J. Calder). The test in the last-mentioned class was Dudley Buck's 'Hymn to music.'

CORNWALL.

Though this is comparatively a new Festival, being now only in its fifth year, each annual event proves more conclusively that Lady Mary Trefusis's movement has tapped a wide district in Cornwall full of resources and possibilities. The material to be found here, especially for choral work, is rich and ample. Uncultured and uneducated it is, generally speaking, but quickly responsive, as has been evidenced by the numerous Societies which have come into existence in remote hamlets and villages as well as in the towns.

This year's Festival was held with more than customary success. The first events, for elementary scholars in the West section, were heard at the end of March; and the consecutive competitions lasted from April 25 to May 2, at Launceston, Camborne, St. Austell, and Truro. The adjudicator was Dr. Percy Buck. A new development was the inclusion of classes for folk-dancing, in which Mr. Cecil Sharp was the judge.

The number of competitors in the 158 entries was about 2,000. The distinction of having gained the highest percentage in the entire Festival was achieved by Truro St. Mary's Wesley Choir in madrigal singing with 86 per cent. A record was made by Camborne Ladies' Choir, who not only won the highest marks in the Festival for sight-reading (80 per cent.), but also carried off two first-class certificates in the same section. The silver medallion and bronze medals presented by Mrs. Argles (in memoriam Mary Wakefield) for the highest aggregate of marks for sight-reading and song-singing among village choral Societies and choirs were won by Launceston Wesley Choir (Mr. Stanley Parsonson). Among the Elementary Schools, the Trefusis banner was won by Boscastle, the Shilston shield by Padstow, the Williams shield by Launceston National School, the Daubuz banner by Fowey Boys' School, the Trefusis (No. 2) banner by Madron Daniel's Girls' School, and the Bolitho shield by St. Dennis Council School. In vocal and choral contests for small towns and villages, the Shilston shield for the highest aggregate was won by Bude Glee Society, and the challenge shield was won by Tuckingmill Girls' Choir in the West section. Among Secondary Schools, Penzance County School gained the Petherick Shield, Truro County School the Corfe shield, St. Austell County Schools the Vinter shield. The Basset shield was won by Camborne Women's Choir in the contest for choral-singing for large towns.

LEITH HILL.—April 28, 29.

It is gratifying to record the continued success of this Festival, which does a much-needed work in a district that would otherwise be chorally apathetic. Dr. Walford Davies, who adjudicated, made the following awards in the chief classes: Female-voice choirs—Brockham and Coldharbour; male-voices—Brockham and Westcott; mixed-voices—Brockham and Blackheath, and Shere; madrigal singing—The Holmwoods and Westcott. Under each of the above heads two competitions were heard. In a class for full choir, with a chorus from Mozart's 'O God, when Thou appearest' as test, the Holmwoods Choir won the first-prize. At two evening concerts a selection from Gluck's 'Orpheus' and Bach's 'The Lamb that was slain for us' were given under the direction of Dr. Vaughan Williams.

CHICHESTER (WEST SUSSEX).—April 30, May 1.

This Festival is promoted chiefly by the Duchess of Norfolk, with whom are associated many of the leading people, social and musical, of the district. Mr. F. J. W. Crowe (the Cathedral organist) is a very active supporter. This was the second year of the establishment of the Festival, and on every side there were evidences of progress. The city was gaily decked with bunting in honour of the occasion, and it is noteworthy that the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk were present throughout the two days.

The entries comprised two church and chapel choirs, four mixed-voice choirs, six male-voice choirs, twelve female-voice choirs, and eight choirs from large villages. Some were not able to appear for various reasons.

The chief results were as follows:

Mixed choirs—Arundel Choral Class, Horsham Musical Society.

Female-voice choirs (two sections).—Wisborough in one section and Horsham in another. Large villages—Wisborough; Small villages—Burpham and Poling.

The evening concert drew an overwhelming audience. The combined choirs, the Chichester Orchestral Society (Mr. Crowe), Mr. Gervase Elwes, Madame Ida Drummond, and the excellent Cathedral Male-Voice Quartet provided the programme.

Dr. McNaught adjudicated. There was much jubilation and genuine enjoyment throughout the two days.

BURY.—April 30, May 1 and 2.

Though situated in the heart of the competition district the Bury Festival maintains its magnitude and success. The most important class was that for male-voice choirs, which attracted nine entries. The tests were MacDowell's 'The Crusaders,' and Elgar's 'Feasting I watch.' Colne Orpheus Glee Union (Mr. L. Greenwood) won the first prize, Brierfield Wesleyan (Mr. G. Walmsley) the second. In other choral competitions the awards were as follows: Mixed-voice choirs—Sale and District (Mr. A. Higson). Female-voice choirs—Bury Ladies' Festival Choir (Miss Lilian Hayes). Church and chapel choirs—Lumb Baptist (Mr. John Parkinson). Children's choirs (under 17)—Bury Girls' Grammar School. Children's choirs (under 14)—Magdale Street C. S., Heywood. There were classes for Morris and country dancing, and children's violin classes, and the usual solo competition. Dr. R. R. Terry and, for the dancing, Miss MacCrindell, were the adjudicators.

GLASGOW.

The fourth annual Festival, which took place on May 1 and 2, again demonstrated a general advance in the standard of efficiency in the competing choirs, and a largely increased public interest in the Festival movement. The attendances were very good; indeed, at the closing session hundreds of supporters were unable to secure admission. The entries comprised eighty-nine choirs, eight quartets, and thirty-one solo vocalists, the competitors numbering over 3,000. The adjudicators were Dr. E. C. Bairstow and Mr. W. S. Nesbitt, the latter taking the place of Mr. Harry Evans, who, to the regret of the executive, was unable to be present through illness. The solo-singing competition, which had been in abeyance for two years, proved highly successful, and was the means of bringing forward some highly capable vocalists. The Glasgow Orpheus Choir was again an easy first in the open challenge class for mixed-voice choirs, but we understand they will not compete here next year, and will probably try their strength at an English Festival. The suggestion to make a sight-singing test obligatory in the juvenile and school choir classes, and to resume a string quartet class, will be considered by the executive. A notable feature of the Festival was the admirably-planned arrangements of the executive, which enabled the Festival to be carried through with perfect smoothness. Competitors owed very much to the artistic work of Mr. Wilfrid Senior, the official accompanist.

The following awards were made:

SOLO SINGING.

Soprano.—Tests: 'Dove sono' (Mozart); 'Kishmul's Galley' (Mrs. Kennedy-Fraser's 'Songs of the Hebrides'). Miss Lily Souter, Carlisle.

Contralto.—Tests: 'Softly awakes my heart' (Saint-Saëns); 'May night' (Brahms). Miss Jenny Black, Glasgow.

Tenor.—Tests: 'Onaway! Awake, beloved' (Coleridge-Taylor); 'Gentle zephyrs' (Jensen). Mr. Harry Temple, Carlisle.

Baritone and Bass.—Tests: 'Non più andrai' (Mozart); 'The promise of Spring' (Schubert). Mr. Harry Gold, Hamilton.

The winner of gold medal to competitor obtaining highest aggregate of marks in this class was Miss Jenny Black (contralto).

CHORAL SINGING.

Mixed-Voice Choirs (Scottish Challenge Class).—Tests: 'Summer is gone' (Coleridge-Taylor); 'Corydon, arise' (C. V. Stanford). 1st, Glasgow Socialist Glee Party; 2nd, Kilmarnock Glee and Madrigal Society.

Female-Voice Choirs (Open Challenge Class).—Tests: 'Song of the ermine' (César Franck); 'The fairies' (C. V. Stanford). 1st, Glasgow Orpheus Choir; 2nd, Paisley Provident Co-operative Choir.

Male-Voice Choirs (Scottish Challenge Class).—Tests: 'Battle song' (Schumann); 'The long day closes' (Sullivan). 1st, G. & S. W. Railway Male-Voice Choir, Kilmarnock; 2nd, Oakbank Male-Voice Choir, Glasgow.

Church Choirs (Challenge Class).—Tests: 'Judge me, O God' (Mendelssohn); 'Come and thank Him' (Bach). 1st, Union U.F. Church, Clydebank; 2nd, Queen's Cross Church Choir, Aberdeen.

Mixed-Voice Choirs (Industrial Class).—Tests: 'Awake, Æolian lyre' (Danby); 'In silent night' (Brahms). 1st, Stewart and McDonald's Harmonic Association.

Female-Voice Choirs (Industrial Class).—Tests: 'Fall on me like a silent dew' (Coleridge-Taylor); 'Violets' (F. H. Cowen). 1st, St. Andrew's Clubs' Choir, Edinburgh.

Male-Voice Choirs (Open Challenge Class).—Tests: 'The Assyrian came down' (Cyril Jenkins); 'Far beyond all mortal ken' (Schubert). 1st, Cleveland Harmonic Male-Voice Choir, Middlesbrough; 2nd, Clydebank Male-Voice Choir.

Mixed-Voice Choirs (Open Challenge Class).—Tests: 'Death in the Sierras' (Coleridge-Taylor); 'Fire, fire, my heart' (Morley); 1st, Glasgow Orpheus Choir; 2nd, Ayr Burgh and County Choir.

WORCESTERSHIRE (MALVERN).—May 4-7.

This was an important event lasting four days. It drew about 1,800 competitors, and large audiences. There were numerous classes, including instrumental and choral sections, but no solo-singing except for boys. The Moseley Musical Club (Mr. T. Henry Smith) supplied excellent string performances. Eleven school choirs came, Broadheath, St. John's Girls', and Cowleigh being among the best. A combined performance of 'The Mouse and the Lion' (Alfred Hollins) was given by 250 children. There were nearly 50 entries in the choral classes, Broadheath, Holly Mount, and Malvern Priory Church Choir gaining great praise. The Holy Trinity Girls' Club (Malvern), St. James' Musical Club (Kidderminster), Colwall Choral Society, Newland Choir Boys, Moseley Musical Club, Dudley Madrigal, Brierly Hill Male-Voice Choir, and Wribbenhall Choral Society were amongst the most successful. In the village choir section Hagley, Bushley, and Astley were winners.

A performance of Elgar's Choral Suite, 'From the Bavarian Highlands' was given by the combined village choirs, with full orchestra, under the baton of Mr. Ivor Atkins. Dr. Vaughan Williams, Dr. R. R. Terry, and Mr. W. H. Reed adjudicated.

DUBLIN ('FEIS CEOIL').—May 4 to 9.

The chief results were as follows:

Culwick Memorial Cup for Mixed-Voice Choirs—Donegall Square Church Choir, Belfast (Mr. Herbert T. Scott); Male-Voice Choirs (one entry)—Belfast Orpheus (Dr. Francis Koeller); Female-Voice Choirs—Dominican Convent Choral Society, Dublin (Mr. Robert O'Dwyer).

Division II., for Mixed-Voice, Male-Voice, and Female-Voice Choral Societies—Derry Temperance Choir (Mr. J. T. Frankland) and Æolian Glee Singers, Dublin (Mr. William McGouran) respectively.

Soprano Solo—Miss May Doyle; Mezzo-Soprano—Miss Julia Griffin; Contralto—Miss Joan Pourke; Tenor—Mr. G. W. Alderdice; Baritone—Mr. Frederic Craig; Bass—Mr. J. Litholder. Free tuition at the Royal College of Music, London—Miss Florence McWalters, Belfast.

BATH (MID-SOMERSET).—May 5-7.

The entries in this year's Festival constituted a record, and a heavy deficit was wiped out. The scheme was comprehensive, and entailed the services of five adjudicators—Dr. Brewer, Mr. A. J. Liddle, Mr. Denis Browne, Mr. Cecil Sharp, and Mr. W. McNaught. The following were the awards and winning competitors in the chief choral classes:

CHORAL COMPETITION (Open).

Tests: (a) 'Night watch' (Brahms).

(b) 'The lee shore' (Coleridge-Taylor).

1st. Shepton Mallet C.S.

CHORAL COMPETITION (Villages).

Test: 'O happy eyes' (Elgar).

1st. Nunney Delamere Choral Society.

CHORAL COMPETITION (Villages under 800).

Tests: (a) 'My bonnie lass' (German).

(b) 'Hallelujah chorus' (Beethoven).

1st. Huish Episcopi Choral Society.

CHORAL COMPETITION (Villages under 500).

Test: 'Gather ye rosebuds' (Lawes).

1st. Wanstrow Choral Society.

MADRIGAL (Open).

Test: 'Sweet honey-sucking bees' (Wilbye).

1st. Shepton Mallet Choral Society.

MADRIGAL (Villages).

Test: 'Thyrsis, sleepest thou' (Benet).

1st. Nunney Delamere Choral Society.

Prizes in female-voice choral competitions were won by Nunney Delamere Ladies' Choir and Doulling Three-Part Choir.

The Duck, Son & Pinker prize was won by the Shepton Mallet Choir for the highest aggregate marks in open classes.

There were several competitions for juvenile choirs. The challenge banner for the most successful was won outright by Bathwick Boys' School Choir. Folk-dance competitions drew 400 competitors and large audiences.

GAINSBOROUGH (WEST LINDSEY).—May 6, 7.

The features of the children's day at this Festival were the prominence of folk-songs among the test-pieces, and the combined singing of 500 competitors, under the Rev. Canon Scott's direction. The chief prizes in juvenile choral-singing were won by Ropery Road C.S., Lincoln Municipal Technical School, Berkingham Council School, and Gate Burton School. Gainsborough Holy Trinity and Saxilby (small village class) were the successful church choirs; Bishop Norton the best small village choral Society; Gate Burton and Marton the best female-voice choirs; Gainsborough St. John's the prize-winning male-voice choir. In the mixed-voice class Kettlethorpe and Saxilby were first in the singing of the test-pieces, Gainsborough Choral Society in sight-reading. A massed choir of 300 voices, with orchestral accompaniment, sang Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of praise,' under the direction of the adjudicator, Mr. Harry Evans.

LEAMINGTON.—May 7-9.

With twenty-eight classes and over three hundred competitors, two adjudicators—Mr. Plunket Greene and Mr. Granville Humphreys—were separately occupied for three days. There was not only an enlarged programme but a higher musical standard. For their performances of Wilbye's 'Lady, when I behold' and Garrett's 'O my love's like a red, red rose' Coventry Co-operative Choirs won the chief honours; Leamington Male-Voice Choir gave the best of six interpretations of Cornelius's 'Never can the teardrops tell thee' and Elgar's 'Yea, cast me from heights.' Other winning choirs were West Orchard Congregational Choir, Coventry, St. Margaret's, Whitnash, Eastlands Girls' School, Rugby, Wesleyan Day School, Leamington, and (for action-songs) Leicester Street Girls, Leamington. Seven open classes for solo-singing attracted 84 entries, and six confined to Warwickshire singers brought 60 entries.

AYR.—May 8, 9.

The third Festival of the series was held in the Town Hall with much success. It is promoted with much spirit. Fifty-seven choirs competed. The classes comprised adult and junior choirs variously constituted. In the school departments, Hamilton (Kilmarnock) were first in three divisions, and the Kilmarnock Academy, Ayr Academy, and Easton came to the front. Industrial choirs were a feature, the Newton Carpet Works and Glasgow Oakbank sending winners. In the other choral sections, Miss Boyd Steven's Ladies' Choir (Glasgow), the Glasgow and South Western Male-Voice Choir (Kilmarnock), the Ayr Burghs and County Choir, and the Clydebank Male-Voice Choir were winners. In the chief section there was a battle royal between the Ayr Burghs Choir and the Kilmarnock Glee and Madrigal Society. The tests were 'I wrestle and pray' (Bach), 'Autumn' (Brahms), and 'Fire, fire my heart' (Morley), the result being a victory by the former choir. Dr. A. H. Brewer adjudicated. The prizes were distributed by Mrs. Gordon Savile.

ABERDEEN.—May 9.

The progress of this Festival is being severely tried by the enforced inactivity of Prof. Sanford Terry. This year's scheme was restricted to schools and industrial and guild choirs. Twenty junior choirs sang, Buchanhaven Public School, Peterhead Burghs Central, and Mortlach Higher Grade, Crossroads, being amongst the successful. In the industrial choirs section, the Aberdeen Corporation Tramways Employees, Stoney Works, were winners. Lord Aberdeen was present as usual, and he made encouraging remarks. Prof. Terry was also present, although he took no active part. Dr. E. C. Bairstow adjudicated.

PONTEFRAC T.—May 12-14.

This Festival was remarkably successful. It drew many of the best neighbouring organizations, and provided much healthy activity for judges. There were no fewer than forty-two classes. In the school classes, Wakefield St. Michael's Boys and Felkirk were well to the front. On the 'Village' day, Darrington, Glass Houghton Wesleyan, and Wentbridge were winners. On the 'Open' day, Pontefract Primitive Methodist Church Choir, Pontefract Ladies' Choir, Tadcaster Choral Society, and Sandal were prize-winners. In the chief choral class there was some first-rate singing. The Normanton Society gained the first place. Dr. McNaught and Dr. Coward (deputising for Mr. Harry Evans) adjudicated.

HERTFORDSHIRE AND NORTH MIDDLESEX.

ALEXANDRA PALACE.—May 14-16.

The winning choirs in the numerous choral competitions were the following: Mixed voices—Mr. G. Day Winter's choir, Hertford Festival Choir (Mr. J. L. Gregory), Mill Hill Madrigal Society (Dr. Markham Lee), Hertingfordbury Choral Society (Mr. J. Kennerell), Bayford Choral Society, and Ware and District Choral Society (Mr. Nelson Govier). Male voices—East Finchley Brotherhood Choir (Mr. H. Wooding Monk) in two classes. Female voices—Wheatley Street Institute Choir (Mrs. Petty), Miss Florence Thorne's Ladies' Choir, and Bounds Green Ladies' Choir (Miss Dorothy Chapman). In the three ladies'-voice classes the entries totalled twenty-six. At the final concert massed choirs sang under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill.

The adjudicators were Dr. McNaught, Dr. R. R. Terry, Mr. Daniel Price, Mr. Arthur Fagge, Mr. J. St. O. Dykes, Mr. W. Frye Parker, Mr. W. E. Whitehouse, and Mr. G. D. Cunningham.

ILKLEY (WHARFEDALE).—May 14-16.

Dr. Walford Davies was occupied for three days in deciding the forty classes of this Festival, which continues to develop the musical resources of a well-favoured neighbourhood. Some superlative results were produced, both Nelson Arion Glee Union (Mr. Lawson Berry) and Holme Valley Male-Voice Choir (Mr. Irvine Silverwood) gaining full marks for their readings of Percy Fletcher's 'Lorraine, Lorraine, Lorree'; the latter choir, however, gained an advantage in Julius Harrison's 'Viking Song' and secured the challenge trophy. Bateson's 'Sister, awake,' and Dr. Davies's 'O England' were the chief tests for the mixed-voice choirs, among whom Bradford Vocal Union (Mr. John Barker) proved superior. There were six entries. Burley-in-Wharfedale Choral Society (Mr. F. J. P. Drake) was the best of four village choirs in both the mixed-voice and female-voice sections. There were various classes for juvenile choirs, in which the entries were not numerous. Better support was forthcoming in the solo-singing classes, for which tests of high quality were chosen. The winning competitors were Miss Phyllis Hope (soprano), Miss Florence Hudson (soprano), Miss Winifred Myers (contralto), Mr. Jack Thomas (tenor), Mr. Charles Pighills (bass), and Mr. Walter Overin (bass).

BUXTON.—May 14-16.

At the eighth annual Festival some interesting competitions were held before Dr. A. H. Brewer and Dr. E. C. Bairstow. Byrd's 'All hail, thou merry month of May,' and Mendelssohn's 'Come with torches,' were creditably sung by Sale and District Musical Society (Mr. Alfred Higson), Swadlincote Glee Singers (Mr. W. Jones), and Nottingham Philharmonic Society (Mr. W. Turner). The first-named gained the highest number of marks. Congleton Male-Voice Choir gave the best reading of Bantock's 'Address to the De'il,' and the ladies of the Sale Society were best in German's 'Beauteous morn.' In three classes for Public Elementary Schools, Edale, Burbage C. S., and Fairfield Endowed School were the successful competitors respectively. The programme included competitions in solo-singing, solo instrumental playing, and quartet-singing.

HULL.—May 15, 16.

The choral classes at this Festival produced some notable results, although entries were not numerous. Grimsby Co-operative Choral Society were alone in the singing of Wilbye's 'Sweet honey-sucking bees,' Dvorák's 'Thou whoart for ever blessed,' and Bantock's 'On Himalay.' Mr. S. H. Clark's Hull Male-Voice Choir were superior to Mr. Chignell's Hessele Church Choirmen, and Beverley (Miss Kathleen Mayer) were first in the female-voice section. Entries were plentiful in the juvenile classes. Hessele Church Choir, Hull Central Secondary School (Mr. F. R. Upton), and South Hiendley Junior Choir (Mr. E. H. Hoyland) won various first-prizes, and the successful action-song parties in two classes came from Wheeler Street School (Miss E. Kay) and Middleton Street School (Mrs. Christian). Dr. Henry Coward adjudicated.

SCARBOROUGH.—May 17.

A new Festival, promoted by the Scarborough Harmonic Male-Voice Choir, was held here with gratifying success. There was only one entry—York Cocoa Works Choral Society (Mr. E. Bean)—in the mixed-voice class, but five choirs competed in the male-voice section, Whitby Bohemian winning the first-prize. Wykeham Choral Society were the better of two village choirs, and Pickering Wesleyan Day School provided the best of four children's choirs. Prizes were won by Miss J. Riley (piano-forte), Miss M. G. Haw (soprano), and Mr. B. Newstead (bass). The adjudicator was Mr. H. A. Fricker.

HAUGHTON.—A choral competition was held here on May 16, covering the district within twelve miles of Haughton. In three classes open to choirs of fifty voices and under the successful competitors were Penkridge (mixed voices), Colwich (male voices and female voices). In three similar classes for choirs of not more than twenty-five voices Weston Choir was in each case successful. The adjudicator was Mr. Carl Oliver.

OTHER COMPETITIONS.

For the present at least the space at our disposal does not allow of more than a brief record of the Festivals held at numerous other centres, amongst which were:

(The names of adjudicators are given in parentheses.)

LEOMINSTER.—Easter Monday. Only one entry in chief choral class—the Leominster Choral Union. (Dr. Sinclair.)

TYNEDALE.—April 24, 25. Fourteen junior choirs—Haltwhistle first in large school class. Twenty adult choirs—Prudhoe Wesleyan, Prudhoe Gleemen, and Ovingham were first-prize winners. (Mr. Harry Evans.)

SPILSBY.—April 27, 28. Twelve junior choirs; ten adult choirs. Partney, Routhby, and Burgh were first in junior classes, and Gumley, Alford, and Spilsby in adult classes. (Mr. S. H. Nicholson.)

YORK.—April 28. Twenty-one villages sent choirs in eleven classes. Naburn first in large village class. The challenge cup was won by Healaugh. (Mr. Harry Evans.)

ESKDALE.—April 28, 29. Thirty-three classes. Whitby first in open mixed-voice class. Sleights and Great Ayton were also winners. (Dr. Sinclair and Mr. Arthur Wilson.)

TUNBRIDGE WELLS.—April 28, 29. Eight junior choirs—Hartfield first. Fourteen adult choirs—Wadhurst, Robertsbridge, Penbury, Chailey, and Rotherfield were first-prize winners. (Dr. H. P. Allen.)

GALLOWAY (NEWTON STEWART).—May 2. This is a new Scottish centre promoted by the Countess of Galloway. For a first occasion it was very successful. Included junior and adult choirs. No solos. Nineteen schools contributed choirs. Kells, Minnigaff, Stranraer Academy, Douglas High Schools and Kirkcowan were winners. Twenty-six entries for adult choral classes. Newton Stewart, Kirkcowan, Crossmichael, and Kirkcudbright won prizes. (Mr. J. A. Fuller-Maitland.)

RETTFORD, May 4, 5, 6, 9.—Includes vocal and instrumental solos and choral classes in numerous classification. A great speciality is made of folk- and sword-dancing, an expert, Mr. Hercy Denman, exercising much influence. Ranskill, Bawtry Wesleyan, Gringley Choral (exceptionally good), Ollerton, Mr. Ellis's Choir, and the Retford Amateur Musical Society were amongst the winners in adult classes. The children's choirs were much praised. Retford Council Girls and Retford Wesleyan were well to the front. (Dr. Walford Davies and Mr. Cecil Sharp.)

WEYMOUTH (Dorset Association).—May 5. Twenty-six choirs. Dorchester Madrigal, Sturminster Madrigal, and Charminster were first-prize winners. (Dr. Bairstow and Dr. Vaughan Thomas.)

CENTRAL AND EAST ESSEX, CHELMSFORD.—May 9-11. Nine adult choirs competed in various sections: mixed-voice, female-voice, male-voice. Challenge cups were won by Birch, Feering, Coggeshall, Wickham Bishops, Excelsior, and Broomfield. Sixteen school choirs. Banners were won by Shenfield, Marks Tey, Tolleshunt Major, and Trinity Road Boys. (Mr. E. J. Dent and Mr. F. Cunningham Woods.)

SOUTH SOMERSET, CHARD.—May 13, 14. Included junior and adult solos (vocal and instrumental), Morris-dancing, and choirs. Twenty-five classes. Yeovil Male-Voice Choir, Yeovil Choral Society, East Coker Village Choir, and Ilminster Girls' Grammar School were amongst those who were distinguished. Norton-sub-Hamdon Girls were excellent in the Morris dances. (Mr. G. G. Beale and the Rev. E. Capel Cure.)

THE FESTIVAL OF EMPIRE GIRLS' CHOIR.—This unique choir continues to grow steadily in popularity. Over two thousand singers have already been enrolled for the great concert to be held at the Crystal Palace on July 8; but inasmuch as this number represents less than half the number of schools connected with the organization, a much larger choir may be expected to appear on the day. The choir attracts schools from South Coast and other towns outside London: Brighton, Eastbourne, Folkestone, Herne Bay, Margate, Cambridge, Tunbridge Wells, and Farnham being among those represented by important educational establishments. The choral competitions organized in connection with the Festival will this year be judged by Dr. W. G. McNaught. Full particulars of the choir may be obtained from the secretary, Mr. Granville Humphreys, 85, Elms Road, Clapham, S.W.

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The following awards were made in the examinations for Scholarships and Exhibitions that were held in April: Scholarships to Miss Winifred Henrietta Regensburg (violin), Miss Marjorie Burdett Ennals and Miss Isobel Radford (singing), Miss Irene Grace Evans and Miss Lilian Goodfellow (pianoforte); Exhibitions to Miss Jessie Campbell Macdonald (composition), and—for three months—to Mr. Richard John Cherry (bassoon) and Mr. Cecil Laubach (violin). At a recent chamber-concert given by the School, the violin-playing of Miss Williams, and the pianoforte-playing of Master Richard Johnson, a young artist, and of Master Mayerl, a still younger artist, were among the notable features.

POPULAR CLASSICAL CONCERTS AT SWINDON:
AN EXPERIMENT IN MUSICAL EDUCATION.

On April 20 a concert in the Mechanics' Institute at Swindon brought to an end a most successful series of Classical Concerts which had been given there during the past winter at genuinely popular prices before a genuinely working-class audience. The concerts were organized by Mr. Felix Schuster, who gave a similar series two years ago, at the request of the Swindon branch of the Workers' Educational Association. Throughout the season the audiences have averaged from four to five hundred, and the sympathy and intelligent appreciation of the music shown by all who heard it have been quite remarkable. The programmes have included Violin sonatas by Beethoven, Handel, Tartini, César Franck, and Ludwig Thuille, Brahms's Pianoforte quartet in A major (Op. 26), Dvorák's Concerto for violoncello and his 'Dumka' Trio, and a Bach Concerto for two violins. Among the vocal items have been Arias by Mozart and Verdi, songs by Brahms, Schumann, Couperin, and Gluck, and Vaughan Williams's Song-cycle 'On Wenlock Edge.' Beethoven's Pianoforte sonata in A flat (Op. 110) met with a peculiarly enthusiastic reception. On March 9 Mr. Percy Such's String Orchestra played, and the programme consisted of Mozart's Eine Kleine Nachtmusik and Concerto for pianoforte in E flat (No. 9); Bach's Concerto for violin in E major; W. Richter's Abendgesang; and Percy Grainger's Mock Morris.

Besides Mr. and Mrs. Schuster, the performers who have generously given help in this series of concerts have included Miss Letty Maitland, Mr. and Mrs. Percy Such, Mr. Percy Sharman, Mr. Stuart Wilson, and Mr. A. P. Fachiri. Altogether the experiment has been most successful, and it is earnestly hoped that it will be repeated next year, and that the example of Swindon will be followed elsewhere.

THE L.C.C. CHORAL UNIONS.

These organizations, eight in number, drawn from the L.C.C. Evening Continuation Schools, held their Annual Festivals in April and May, and both in their choice of music and in their performances showed themselves to be a very real power in the musical life of London. The singing at each of the Festivals was notable for the admirable quality of the female voices. The sopranos attacked their high notes with a confidence and success not always to be found in choral Societies of established reputation. The tenors and basses were not only numerically the weakest parts of the choirs, but their singing was much less vital than that of the trebles and altos. Probably the attendance register might give some explanation of this. On the whole, however, the singing was excellent, and when it is borne in mind that the voices are not picked, and further that the personnel of the choir is to a considerable extent changing from year to year, one may quite fairly describe the results as surprisingly good. The orchestral department, for obvious reasons, is somewhat behind the choir. At only one Festival—that of the West London Choral Union—was the playing on a level with the singing; and here not only was the amateur section much above the average, but they had ample professional help. Amateur players learn so much from playing occasionally in good company, that we hope the various orchestras in this admirable movement will overcome any financial or other obstacles, and see that their local players have the advantage of professional leadership at their concerts. Well led, many a fair player is for the time being a good one; while the choir are much stimulated by a well-played orchestral accompaniment as they are intimidated by a halting one. Very satisfactory features of the Festivals were the obvious pleasure the singers took in their work, and the keen public interest shown in every case by large and enthusiastic audiences. (A more detailed report of the concerts appears in this month's issue of the School Music Review.)

London Concerts.

THE BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL.

Two concerts of this excellent series organized by Mr. Daniel Mayer were reported in our last issue. At the third concert, on the afternoon of April 22, the fourth and fifth Symphonies were given, Herr Max Pauer played the fourth Pianoforte concerto, and Mr. Paul Reimers gave the Song-cycle 'An die ferne Geliebte.' The next two Symphonies followed on the evening of April 23; Zimbalist played the Violin concerto and Herr van Rooy sang the Aria 'Mit Mädchen sich vertragen.' There is no need to extol the performances, which never descended below the highest artistic grade. The climax of the Festival was reached on the evening of April 25, when the Leeds Philharmonic Choir of 200 voices gave magnificent assistance in the Choral Symphony and the choral work 'A calm sea and prosperous voyage' (conducted by Mr. H. A. Fricker). Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Tilly Koenen, Mr. Reimers, and Herr van Rooy as soloists helped to sustain the vitality and attraction of the performance. The third Pianoforte concerto, with Mr. Arthur Rubinstein as soloist, and the eighth Symphony completed the programme. Mr. Henri Verbrugghe, whose life and work are dealt with in our leading article, conducted throughout the Festival with insight and masterly ability.

QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA.

The Symphony Concert given on April 25 was distinguished by the superb playing of Herr Kreisler in Brahms's Violin concerto, a work which he is perhaps better fitted to interpret than any other living violinist. The Symphony was Schubert's 'Unfinished,' of which Sir Henry Wood conducted an individual performance, exquisite in its tone-grading. Beethoven's 'Coriolan' Overture, and Bach's third 'Brandenburg' Concerto were also in the programme.

A programme of unusual character was chosen for the Endowment Fund Concert given by this Orchestra under Sir Henry Wood on May 9. It included 'Dance in the sun' by Arnold Bax, Percy Grainger's 'Shepherd's hey,' Debussy's 'L'Après-midi d'un Faune,' Stravinsky's 'Fireworks,' and Schumann's Pianoforte concerto, superbly played by Herr Dohnányi. The pianist also appeared as composer and conductor in his excellent Suite in F sharp minor, the best of last season's 'Promenade' novelties.

Herr Kreisler gave a concert with the assistance of Sir Henry Wood and his Orchestra, at Queen's Hall, on May 14. It was a keen pleasure to renew acquaintance with his beautiful interpretation of Elgar's Violin concerto. Both in this and in the Concerto of Beethoven he gave unbounded delight.

NEW SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony and Liszt's E flat Pianoforte concerto, with Mr. Mark Hambourg as soloist, supplied the chief popular interest at Queen's Hall on May 2, when this Orchestra gave a concert under the direction of Mr. Landon Ronald. The Symphony was played with brilliance and a wealth of fine tone. A novelty was introduced in the form of Glière's orchestral arrangement of a 'Tanz der Bocksfüßler' by Ilja Satz. Its glittering colours were interesting and amusing, but there was little music behind them.

The afternoon concert given at the Albert Hall on Sunday, May 3, by this Orchestra, under Mr. Landon Ronald, was distinguished by the presence of Madame Melba as soloist.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Wagner's music supplied the entire programme of the concert given on May 11 under Herr Mengelberg's direction. The chief number was the closing scene from 'Götterdämmerung,' which Miss Agnes Nicholls sang very finely.

THE ORPHEUS CHORAL SOCIETY.

This Society, though not powerful in numbers, is strong in spirit and enterprise. Under Mr. Claud Powell's guidance it has the energy to avoid the conventional, and to give its attention to British works. The concert at Portman Rooms on May 7, for instance, was given up to the performance of Dr. Walford Davies's 'Everyman,' and Dr. Ernest Walker's 'Ode to a nightingale,' two works that deserve more attention than they now receive. The attractive individuality of Dr. Davies's setting of the famous old morality play has long been fully recognised by musicians, and renewed description is unnecessary. Comment upon Dr. Walker's delicately emotional music to Keats's 'Ode' has already been made in these columns.

Both works had evidently appealed to the choral singers, for the performances were marked by a keen sense of appropriate expression and by confident execution. Mr. Powell conducted with judgment, and secured many good effects from choir and orchestra. The various solo parts were adequately sung by Miss Ada Forrest, Mrs. Harry Bedford, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Thorpe Bates. Mr. Mullings in particular made a deep impression with the beauty and expressiveness of his singing as Death in 'Everyman.'

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAS.

For their concert at Queen's Hall on April 22 the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society made the commendable choice of Sir Charles Stanford's seventh Symphony as the chief work in the programme. It is a work of distinguished quality with which it was a pleasure to renew acquaintance. The performance was conducted by the composer. A placid melodious piece for orchestra and organ by John Francis Barnett entitled 'Chant Séraphique,' was given for the first time. The Suite from Glazounov's Ballet 'Raymonda' formed part of a programme that was ably carried out under Mr. Arthur Payne's direction. The vocal soloists of the concert were Mr. Ivor Foster and Miss Phyllis Lett.

Familiar works were played at the Duke's Hall, Royal Academy of Music, on April 23, by the London and South-Western Bank Orchestral Society, a zealous organization under the direction of Mr. Herbert J. Rouse. Songs were given by Miss Aimée Kendall and Mr. John Prout, and flute solos by Mr. Albert Fransella.

A creditable performance of Schumann's 'Rhenish' Symphony, under Mr. Lennox Clayton's direction, was the distinguishing feature of the North London Orchestral Society's concert at Queen's Hall on April 24. The programme included Bach's Pianoforte concerto in D minor, with Mr. Claud Biggs as soloist, and the Overtures to 'Rienzi' and 'Hansel and Gretel.' Miss Ida Cooper gave songs.

A concert was given at Portman Rooms on April 28 by the London Shipping Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. Clive Parsons. Miss May Mukle played Max Bruch's 'Kol Nidrei' with orchestral accompaniment.

An admirable performance of Coleridge-Taylor's Trilogy, 'Hiawatha,' was given on May 2 by the Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society, under Mr. Allen Gill's inspiring direction. The solo parts were taken with equal effect by Miss Carrie Tubb, Mr. John Booth, and Mr. Bridge Peters.

A concert-performance of Edward German's 'Merrie England' was given with great success by the People's Palace Choral and Orchestral Societies on May 2. Mr. Frank Idle conducted, and the principal parts were taken by Miss Flora Mann, Miss Lillian Berger, Mr. Webster Millar, and Mr. Humphrey Bishop.

At the Hall of the Art Workers' Guild, Bloomsbury, on May 5, Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch gave the first of a new series of his admirable concerts of old music.

Willy Ferrero, the child conductor, who has aroused so much interest in musical circles on the Continent, appeared on May 6, 9, and 13 at the Royal Albert Hall, having under his baton the New Symphony Orchestra, augmented to ninety performers. Opinions may differ as to the advisability of public performances of a kind where the element of sensation is apt to belittle the music, but there can be no doubt that the child is exceptionally gifted, and his future career will be watched with interest.

The Central London Choral and Orchestral Society gave a miscellaneous concert at the Duke's Hall on May 7, under the direction of Mr. David J. Thomas. Coleridge-Taylor's 'The death of Minnehaha,' and a choral arrangement of Berlioz's 'Rakoczy' March were the most conspicuous numbers in a programme that was very creditably carried out. The soloists of the occasion were Miss Mary Lindsay and Mr. Ceredig Walters (vocalists), and Miss Ruby Blick (pianoforte).

The London Balalaika Orchestra gave a concert at Æolian Hall on May 8, Prince Tschagadaev conducting. Princess Alliata di Villafranca, an able vocalist, made her first appearance in London.

At the Albert Hall Sunday afternoon concert on May 10, Miss Maggie Teyte made a welcome reappearance, and in company with Herr Kreisler and Herr Backhaus took part in a programme that attracted and pleased a large audience.

Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' was chosen for performance by the Handel Society at Queen's Hall on May 12, and under Dr. Henschel's direction some attractive choral singing resulted. Miss Eleanore Osborne, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. Thomas Farmer were the soloists, and the organist was Mr. E. G. Croager.

A large audience attended the concert of the Wilhelm Sachse Orchestra at Queen's Hall on May 13, when Beethoven's Violin concerto, with Erna Schulz as soloist, was the chief feature of the programme. The vocalist was Mr. Walter Hyde, who had not been heard in London for a considerable time. The Orchestra played throughout with good tone and capability under Herr Sachse's direction.

Mr. E. Parlovitz (pianoforte), Miss Alys Bateman (vocalist), and Mr. M. Montagu-Nathan (violin) gave their second concert of Russian music at Steinway Hall on May 13, introducing works by Catoire, Gnessin, Akimenko, Medtner, and others.

A 'Concertstück' for violin and orchestra by Dr. Arthur Somervell, produced at Aachen last year, was heard in London for the first time on May 14, and proved a work of considerable individuality and interest. The violinist was Miss Jelly von Aranyi, who, with her sister Adila, also a violinist, and Miss Anna von Grondal (vocalist), gave a recital at Æolian Hall, assisted by Miss May Mukle (violoncello). A small orchestra was conducted by Mr. F. S. Kelly.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

A Trio for pianoforte, violin, and viola, by Arnold Bax, was the most important of a number of new works introduced at Mr. Holbrooke's third concert at the Arts Centre on April 24. Songs were given by Miss Linda Travers and Mr. Frederic Austin, and Messrs. Sammons, Petré, Tertis, and Withers played César Franck's String quartet.

An excellent concert was given at Æolian Hall on May 6 by the London Trio. It opened with the performance of 'Fantasiestücke,' by Rabl, and included Schubert's 'Trout' Quartet, played with the assistance of Mr. Ernest Tomlinson and Mr. Claude Hobday. The soloists were Madame Mackenzie Fairfax (vocalist) and M. Louis Pecsai, the violinist of the Trio.

A well-written String quartet, in C major, by C. Armstrong Gibbs, was produced at 237, King's Road, Chelsea, on May 7, by the Elderhorst String Quartet. An excellent group of English songs was sung by Mr. J. Steuart Wilson.

Madame Alma Haas and the London String Quartet played three Pianoforte quintets at Steinway Hall on May 8—those of Brahms (Op. 34), César Franck, and Schumann (Op. 44). Each of these masterpieces was adequately treated.

Three Pianoforte Quintets—those of Schumann in E flat, Arensky in D, and James Friskin in C minor,—were played by the British Chamber Music Players at Crosby Hall, Chelsea, on May 13.

The Société des Concerts Français introduced several new works of interest at Bechstein Hall on May 15. Vincent d'Indy's 'Suite dans le style ancien,' for trumpet, two flutes, and strings, had abundant vitality and individuality, and a spice of the national irresponsibility. The same composer's 'Lied' for violoncello and pianoforte was also heard, and a 'Suite Basque' for flute and string quartet, by Charles Bordes. The vocalist of the concert was Mlle. Hélène M. Luquiens.

A String quartet in C and a Pianoforte quintet in D were among the works of Percy Sherwood that were chosen to form a programme at Steinway Hall on May 20.

VOCAL RECITALS.

Miss Flora Woodman, a young soprano of exceptional capacity, was heard at Bechstein Hall on April 22. At the same hall on April 27 M. Theodore Byard repeated the programme of his previous recital, and again made good use of his unusual gifts.

Two recitals have been given recently by Miss Elena Gerhardt at Bechstein Hall. On both occasions (April 28 and May 9) the programmes consisted, as usual, of German Lieder, and the singing was of the quality associated with her name.

Dr. Henschel's farewell recital at Bechstein Hall on April 29 opened with the first song he sang before the British public (in 1877)—the Aria 'Sibillargl' angui'd Aletto,' and the programme ended with Loewe's ballad 'Archibald Douglas.' In between were many familiar things, sung and played in a way that accentuated the universal regret that this was to be Dr. Henschel's last recital.

Miss Ilva Hedmond, a young soprano singer whose father is the well-known tenor, Mr. E. C. Hedmond, achieved a remarkable success with her first vocal recital, which took place at Bechstein Hall on April 30.

Madame Mary Tracy engaged the services of Sir Henry Wood and members of the Queen's Hall Orchestra for her recital at Æolian Hall on May 4, and gave a number of songs with orchestral transcriptions of their pianoforte accompaniments. The effect was interesting but not always happy. Two pieces by Bartok entitled 'Portraits for orchestra' belonged to the very newest school of portraiture.

British music played an honourable part in the programme cleverly carried out by Mr. Ernest Groom at Æolian Hall on May 5.

Mr. John Coates was the central figure at a matinée recital given by Messrs. Boosey at Æolian Hall on May 8—the first of a series. He gave songs in English and other languages with memorable effect. The artists associated with him were Miss Jean Nolan and Sir Aubrey Dean Paul.

Madame Yvonne de St. André's versatility and natural gifts were put to good use at Bechstein Hall on May 12.

An intensely interesting Song-cycle by Moussorgsky entitled 'Lieder und Tänze des Todes' was given for the first time in London by Miss Eva Katharina Lissmann at Bechstein Hall on May 13.

Only British songs were chosen by Miss Kathleen Peck for her recital at Æolian Hall on May 12, and a programme full of interest was the result. It was carried out admirably both by the singer and by her accompanist, Mr. John Ivimey, whose share in the artistic value of the interpretations was conspicuous. Violin solos were contributed by Miss Ivy Angove.

Past and present pupils of Madame Agnes Larkcom gave an interesting concert at Æolian Hall on May 19. Conducted by Mr. Montague Phillips, ten ladies sang the opening scene of the third Act of 'Die Walküre.'

Vocal recitals were also given by Mr. Charles Copland (Steinway Hall, April 29), Mlle. Alexia Bassian (Claridge's Hotel, April 30), Miss Eva Rich (Bechstein Hall, April 30), Miss Malvina Shanklin (Æolian Hall, May 5), Madame King Clark (Bechstein Hall, May 6), Miss Mary Bruce-Brown (a farewell Scottish concert, Queen's Hall, May 6), Miss Nora Moon (a successful first appearance, Bechstein Hall, May 7), Miss Helga Petri (Bechstein Hall, May 8), Mr. Vernon Brown (Arts Centre, May 11), Mr. Patrick Kenny (Æolian Hall, May 12), Mr. Hubert Bromilow (Æolian Hall, May 13), Mrs. Harry Bedford (Steinway Hall, May 14), Miss Lily Fairney and Mr. Robert Pitt (Bechstein Hall, May 14), Miss Edith Elischer (Æolian Hall, May 18), Mr. Vernon d'Arnal (Bechstein Hall, May 18), Miss Eleanore Osborne and Mr. Thomas Farmer (Æolian Hall, May 20), Miss Bessie Griffiths (French songs 'in character,' Æolian Hall, May 20), Mr. Charles Gee (Steinway Hall, May 21).

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

Two of the most brilliant pupils of Mr. Matthey's teaching were heard in the closing days of April. On the 27th Miss Myra Hess gave admirable interpretations of Schumann's 'Etudes symphoniques' and Franck's 'Prelude, Variations, and Fugue,' at Bechstein Hall. Miss Irene Scharrer had the assistance of the New Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Landon Ronald, at Queen's Hall on the 28th, and was heard in Concertos by Schumann and Tchaikovsky (B flat minor). On the same day Miss Winifred Christie gave a display of her high powers at Bechstein Hall.

Madame Rose Koenig's Wagner programme at Leighton House on April 28 included an 'illustration' of the third Act of 'Parsifal.'

Pianoforte recitals were also given by Mr. Aurelio Giorni (Bechstein Hall, April 22), Miss Alice Jones (Steinway Hall, April 24), Mr. T. P. Fielden (Bechstein Hall, April 25), Mr. Victor Buesst (Bechstein Hall, April 29), Miss Hilda Bond (Queen's Small Hall, April 29), Miss Henriette Michelson (Æolian Hall, May 2), Miss Dorothy Grinstead (Bechstein Hall, May 2), Miss Winifred Purnell (Bechstein Hall, May 5), Mr. Arthur Rubinstein (Bechstein Hall, May 5), the Misses Una and Irene Truman (duets, Duke's Hall, May 6), Miss Marjorie Wigley (Æolian Hall, May 6), Miss Ruby Holland (Bechstein Hall, May 7), Miss Kathleen Thompson (Bechstein Hall, May 8), Herr Alexander Raab (Queen's Hall, May 12), Miss Maud Gay (Æolian Hall, May 13), Miss Lonie Basche (Steinway Hall, May 14), Miss Vera Brock (Æolian Hall, May 15), Mr. Frederic Lamond (Bechstein Hall, May 16), Miss Harriet Sasse (Steinway Hall, May 16), M. Leon Eustratiou (Bechstein Hall, May 18), Mr. Sydney Rosenbloom (Steinway Hall, May 20), Herr Max Pauer (Bechstein Hall, May 20).

OTHER RECITALS AND CONCERTS.

M. Louis Pecskaï (violin) and Herr von Dohnányi (pianoforte) were heard in a sonata-programme at Æolian Hall on April 22, and upheld their reputation as interpretative artists. Herr von Dohnányi's own Sonata in C sharp minor displayed a higher level of scholarship than of inspiration.

Miss Helen Sealy (violin) and Mr. Roland Jackson (vocalist) gave a joint recital at Æolian Hall on April 29. Mr. Jackson's pleasant tenor voice and expressive style were much admired.

Excellent ensemble and unflinching skill characterized the playing of Miss Ethel Hobday (pianoforte) and Mr. Albert Sammons (violin) at Æolian Hall on April 30. They were heard in Sonatas by Dohnányi (C sharp minor), Brahms (in G), and Richard Strauss (in E flat). Songs were given by Mr. Paul Draper.

The two gifted and deservedly famous sisters, Miss May Harrison (violin) and Miss Beatrice Harrison (violin), gave a recital at Bechstein Hall on May 1, and again earned an emphatic success. At the same hall in the evening M. Anton Maaskov played Busoni's Violin sonata.

M. Zacharewitsch opened a new series of six 'Concerts intimes' at his studio, 46, Berners Street, on May 4, and brought forward his interesting 'Phantasy of Life,' a setting of Omar for singer (Miss Sonya Ivanov), reciter (Miss Joan Saxby), violin (M. Zacharewitsch), and pianoforte (Mr. Lloyd-Powell).

A series of three pleasant, unassuming concerts was opened on May 5 at Leighton House by Miss Alice Mandeville (vocalist), assisted by Mr. Herbert Kinze (violin) and Miss Muriel Herbert (accompanist).

A recital of quite exceptional value was given at Æolian Hall, on May 7, by Herr Dohnányi (pianoforte) and M. Mainardi (violin). Each is an artist of the front rank, and their ensemble was perfect.

Miss Johanna Heymann (pianoforte), assisted by Miss Rita Varian (vocalist), and M. Marcel Bonnemain (violin), opened a series of subscription concerts at Steinway Hall on May 18.

Recitals were given by Miss Phyllis Enid Kidner, a violoncellist not previously heard (Æolian Hall, April 28); Miss Felicia Borelle, violinist (Æolian Hall, April 28); Miss Phyllis Nash, violinist, Miss Dorothy Nash, pianist and composer, and Miss Clarice Mills, vocalist (Steinway Hall, April 30); Mr. Sascha Culbertson, violinist (Bechstein Hall, May 4); Miss Leila Doubleday, violinist (Bechstein Hall, May 4); Miss Monique Poole, violinist (Steinway Hall, May 12); M. Nikolai Sokolov, violinist (Bechstein Hall, May 12); Mlle. Yvonne Astruc, violinist (Æolian Hall, May 14); Mlle. Kontorovitch, violinist (Bechstein Hall, May 14); Miss Ilonka von Pathy, pianist, and Miss Lottie Erica Bachmeyer, vocalist (Steinway Hall, May 15); Miss Edith Abraham, violinist (Æolian Hall, May 16); Herr Zimbalist, violinist (Queen's Hall, May 16); Herr Willy Lehmann, violoncellist (Æolian Hall, May 18).

The fifty-seventh popular concert at the Wesleyan Central Hall, Westminster, brought the season to a close on April 25, when a number of popular artists appeared. It is gratifying to record that the series has been attended with success.

Suburban Concerts.

The Finchley Musical Society brought their fourteenth season to a successful close on April 23, at the King Edward Hall, Church End, with performances of 'A tale of Old Japan' (Coleridge-Taylor), and 'The Deacon's Masterpiece' (Percy E. Fletcher). The soloists were Mrs. William Hollis, Mrs. Albert Williams, Mr. Samuel Masters, and Mr. Charles Martin. Mr. Herbert Baggs conducted. The programme also included the Andante and Finale from Mendelssohn's Violin concerto, Mr. Kenneth Sullens giving a finished performance of the solo part.

An excellent programme was performed with notable artistic finish by the Phillis Mason (Vocal) Quartet at the Small Public Hall, Croydon, on May 2. The Quartet, which consists of Miss Idwen Thomas, Miss Phillis Mason, Mr. Walter Dennis, and Mr. D. Stuart Coleby, displayed abilities of a high order both in ensemble and in individual powers. The concerted numbers included Lane Wilson's 'Flora's holiday,' Brahms's 'Heimat' and 'Der Abend,' Walford Davies's 'Eight Nursery Rhymes,' and Quartets by Walthew, Stanford, and Sullivan. Songs were given by members of the Quartet, and Miss Doris Collar accompanied.

On April 30 the choir of Fulham Baptist Church, under the direction of Mr. Herbert Wellman, gave a musical evening, unique in many respects, having the title of 'The music of our fathers.' Each member of the choir was suitably attired to represent some period within the last five centuries, and the audience had the pleasure of listening to some of the best of our old English ballads, madrigals, and rondos.

The Ealing Choral and Orchestral Society gave their last concert of the season on May 5, when Elgar's 'The dream of Gerontius' and 'Sea-pictures' (with Miss Alice Lakin as soloist), and Beethoven's 'Leonore' Overture, No. 3, were given before a crowded audience. The soloists besides Miss Lakin were Mr. Alfred Heather and Mr. Joseph Ireland. Mr. H. Goss Custard was the organist. This was the first performance of Elgar's great work given by the Society, and in the event it thoroughly justified a creditable ambition.

Sir Edward Elgar's Cantata, 'The banner of St. George,' was sung by the St. John the Divine Choral Society in the Parochial Hall, Vassall Road, Brixton, on Tuesday, April 28. Part-songs were given, and Miss Edith Causton, Mr. R. B. Webster, and Mr. Charles Cureton gave songs. Mr. Warren Tear conducted. At the conclusion of the concert handsome presentations were handed to Mr. Morris (accompanist) and Mr. Tear by the Rev. Canon Deedes on behalf of the Society.

The Central Croydon Choral Society closed their eighteenth season with an excellent performance of 'The Golden Legend' that was of high quality in all respects. The soloists were Miss Leah Felissa, Miss Mabel Aves, Mr. John Booth, Mr. Charles Tree, and Mr. Norman Ingall. The orchestra was led by Miss Frances G. Ison, and Mr. Roland Richards conducted as usual. The Cantata was preceded by Coleridge-Taylor's eight-part Rhapsody for unaccompanied voices, 'Sea drift,' which was well interpreted, and received with great favour.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BIRMINGHAM.

A concert was given at the Midland Institute on May 6 by pupils of Madame Marie Fromm and Mr. Willy Lehmann's Pianoforte and Violoncello Classes, in aid of the 'School of Music Free Studentships' fund. The artists who appeared were Miss Brenda Sichel (violin), and Miss Margaret Russell, Miss Olive James, Miss Lucy Smith, Miss Mildred Moon, Miss Ethel Cobban, Miss Ridley Bailey, and Mr. W. J. Harris (pianoforte).

A newly-formed local musical organization, the Birmingham Strings Club, founded by Miss Christine Ratcliff, Mr. Clarence Raybould, and Mr. Clifford Roberts, gave their first concert at the new rooms of the Birmingham Royal Society of Artists on May 2. Principally composed of amateurs, the Club has been especially formed for the practice of chamber music in all its branches, with a view to giving occasional concerts in private circles. The only concerted piece given on this occasion was César Franck's Quintet for pianoforte and strings, performed by Miss Christine Ratcliff, Miss Edser, Miss Taylor, Miss Brenda Sichel, and Mr. Clarence Raybould. Much care had been bestowed on its preparation, the outcome being a vivid and technically excellent performance. The vocalist was Miss Tanner, who contributed six Lieder by Brahms, Hugo Wolf, and Strauss.

The customary annual concert given by the students of the Midland Institute School of Music attending the orchestral and choral classes, took place in the Town Hall on May 13, under the direction of Prof. Granville Bantock. The programme was long and varied, prominence being given to choral singing. Mr. T. Appleby Matthews conducted the choral music, which comprised Morley's Madrigal, 'Whither away so fast,' Brahms's Motet, 'Queen of Heaven,' Op. 27, No. 3, Sibelius's Impromptu, Op. 19, and four of G. von Holst's Choral Hymns from the 'Rig Veda,' for female voices. In addition to the above, Mr. Franklyn Mountford conducted his newly-published part-song, 'Seagulls,' also for female voices, a composition of the modern school which one would like to hear again. Solos were given by Mrs. Raymond Gough (violin), Miss Cecilia Franklin (pianoforte), Miss Brenda Sichel (violin), and Mr. A. C. Clutterbuck (vocalist). An orchestral tone-poem by William J. Fenney, conducted by the composer, revealed unmistakable creative gifts.

An account of the important Midland Musical Competition Festival held at Birmingham on May 19 to 24 inclusive, will be found in the Competition Festival Record.

The customary three weeks' season of Promenade Concerts at the Theatre Royal, to be given under the direction of Mr. Max Mossel, and to be conducted by Mr. Landon Ronald, begins on June 8 and terminates Saturday, June 27.

The Midland Adult School Union's fifth annual Musical Competition Festival took place in the Town Hall on May 16, the adjudicators being Mr. Alan K. Blackall, Mr. Briscoe, and Mr. T. Johnson.

BOURNEMOUTH.

The celebrations attendant upon the 'Coming of Age' of the Bournemouth Municipal Orchestra, which were worthily carried out on Thursday, May 21, were an outward and visible sign of a notable achievement that in some respects has never been equalled—at any rate in this country. The unique character of Bournemouth's magnificent musical record can be gauged from the following short summary of salient details. No other permanent municipal orchestra in England has existed for anything like so long a period; the total number of works performed, particularly in the British section, has never been exceeded by any established orchestra; few similar organizations can boast of such a satisfactory financial condition, the Bournemouth concerts being practically self-supporting; the conductor, Mr. Dan Godfrey, and two or three of the instrumentalists, have been connected with the undertaking from the very commencement. These are noteworthy facts, and the credit accruing from them must be apportioned equally between the Corporation of Bournemouth, whose foresight made these musical exploits possible, and Mr. Godfrey and his instrumentalists, who have fulfilled their task in so admirable a manner.

The celebration itself was a striking testimony to the extraordinary success of the enterprise, the presence of such eminent musicians as Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Sir Hubert Parry, Mr. Edward German, and Dr. Vaughan Williams, raising the occasion from a mere local ceremony to the dignity of an almost national demonstration. Preceding the afternoon concert was a civic luncheon, the Mayor presiding, at which congratulatory speeches were interchanged between the distinguished guests and the town's representatives. The concert consisted of the following items: 'Academic Festival' overture (Brahms); 'Song of Thanksgiving' (Mackenzie); 'Valse Gracieuse' (German); 'Norfolk Rhapsody' (Vaughan Williams); two songs with orchestral accompaniment by Bantock, sung with much dramatic fervour by Mr. Frank Mullings; 'L'Après-midi d'un Faune' (Debussy); Overture and Minuet, 'The Little Pigs,' from 'The Acharnians of Aristophanes' (Parry); and Stravinsky's 'Fireworks.' The visiting conductors must have been very gratified at the first-rate performances that their works received at the hands of the really splendid orchestra, and Mr. Godfrey, who was accorded an enthusiastic welcome, delighted the huge audience with his splendid interpretations of the remaining pieces. Finally the Mayor made valuable presentations to Mr. and Mrs. Godfrey, and commemorative medals were given to the members of the Orchestra, the speeches of the Mayor and Sir Alexander Mackenzie being in eulogistic vein, Mr. Godfrey responding with a most felicitous reply. In the audience were to be seen Dr. Charles Maclean and Dr. Mackenzie Rogan, together with some of the leading London musical critics. At the evening concert, Mr. Dan Godfrey, jun., who by a happy coincidence was also celebrating his majority, conducted one of the items. Irish songs were given by Mr. Denis O'Neil. A little brochure, containing a record of the past twenty-one years, has been compiled by Mr. Hadley Watkins as a souvenir of this important musical event.

A fitting wind-up to the past season was forthcoming in a series of concerts which provided musical fare to suite all tastes. A recital by Miss Marie Hall, for instance, proved a potent attraction. Once more has the Russian Ballet filled a three days' bill, but nothing was added to its previous repertoire. Miss Nora Read and Mr. Tom Brown, two highly popular local singers, were heard to satisfaction in a familiar programme. On April 25 a fine array of artists assisted at Mr. Dan Godfrey's Benefit Concerts, Miss Caroline Hatchard, Mr. Plunket Greene, Miss Isolde Menges, and Mr. Mark Hambourg giving of their very best. The first performance here of Stravinsky's fantastic and cleverly conceived 'Fireworks' added to the lustre of the occasion. Zimbalist's reappearance on May 2, after a long absence, confirmed our earlier impressions as to the genuine artistry of this rapidly maturing violinist; and the second recital within a few weeks by Miss Elena Gerhardt was a combination of glorious music and wonderful singing. A special concert of British music on May 9, in conjunction with the visit of members of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, was rather uneven in quality, although probably it would have been difficult to draw up a programme more directly representative of the Society's creative musicians; Madame Gleeson-White sang tastefully, and Dr. Charles Maclean conducted one of his own works. A violin and pianoforte recital by Miss Daisy Kennedy and Mr. Vernon Warner on May 16 was thoroughly enjoyable.

The concert-version of 'Tom Jones' (Edward German) was the work chosen for the final concert of the season by the Municipal Choir and Orchestra. The music made no great demands upon either Choir or Orchestra, and an energetic performance resulted, under the direction of the composer, the very competent soloists being Miss Agnes Christa, Miss Florence Barrow, Mr. Reginald Herbert, and Mr. Ivor Foster. At the conclusion of the season, Dr. Holloway resigned his position as chorus-master, a step which has occasioned much regret, this excellent musician being exceedingly popular and most difficult to replace.

Mr. Godfrey procured some capital performances at the closing Symphony Concerts, and enjoyment was assured in the perusal of such works as Rimsky-Korsakov's bright 'Fantasia on Serbian themes' (first performance at these concerts); Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony; Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony and 'In der Natur' Overture; Sir Charles Stanford's delightful D minor Symphony and his impressive new Irish Rhapsody (No. 4); Arthur Somervell's melodious 'Thalassa' Symphony; Clarence Raybould's effective Variations; and Richard Strauss's 'Don Juan.' Stanford's Rhapsody and the Somervell Symphony received their first performances at these concerts, and they satisfied us as being the two finest British novelties of the season. Together with the Raybould Variations (also given for the first time at these concerts, conducted by the composer) they are well able to bear comparison with numberless much-advertised foreign productions. The soloists have been M. Anton Maaskov, Mr. Eric Leftwich, Miss Lilian Crow (a clever local violinist), and Miss Craigie Ross, one of Bournemouth's few first-class concert-pianists.

The last three Monday 'Pops.' retained the varied characteristics of the series, the chief details of the programmes being as follows: April 20, Favourite movements from popular Symphonies; songs contributed by Mr. Manitto Klitgaard. April 27, 'Mendelssohn' programme, with Miss Ivy Gray as solo-pianist. May 4, 'Shakespearean' programme: Coronation March and Hymn, 'Henry VIII.,' by German; 'Romeo and Juliet' Overture, by Tchaikovsky; Masquerade, 'The Merchant of Venice,' by Sullivan; 'Twelfth Night' Overture, by A. C. Mackenzie; 'The Merry Wives of Windsor' Overture, by Nicolai. The only chamber-music item was a Violoncello and pianoforte sonata by Rubinstein, which was very effectively performed at the final concert by Mr. H. Wolters and Mr. Montague Birch, members of the orchestra.

Bournemouth has this year been the venue of the Music Trades Convention, and from May 7 to May 12 inclusive a very busy and an extremely enjoyable time was spent in a pleasant amalgam of work and play. It is understood that much material good resulted from the various discussions on burning questions of the day; as for the social side, we can vouch for the enjoyment derived from the special concert of British music given at the Winter Gardens by Mr. Godfrey and his orchestra in honour of the visit of the Convention, followed by a reception given by the Mayor of Bournemouth. Another convivial occasion was the President of the Convention's reception and concert, which took place at the Royal Bath Hotel, and at which the Mayor and members of the Corporation were present.

The Loughton Operatic Society has just finished its twentieth year of Gilbert and Sullivan opera with three performances of 'H.M.S. Pinafore' and of 'Trial by Jury.' Mr. Henry Riding, the musical director, has conducted every performance during that period.

BRISTOL.

There was a large attendance at the Victoria Rooms on April 21 when the Clifton Male-Voice Choir held their ninth annual concert, under the direction of Mr. Walter P. Price. In addition to excellent part-singing there were songs by Miss Ina Hill, violin solos by Miss Marjorie Evans, and pianoforte solos by Mr. Arthur J. Baynon. The accompanist was Mr. Stanley O. Pearson.

Bristol New Philharmonic Society brought their thirteenth season to a close on April 22 with a concert at the Victoria Rooms, and with an unfamiliar programme, given under the direction of Mr. Arnold Barter, afforded as usual much gratification. Miss Marjorie Lockett and Mr. Frederick Ranalow were the principal vocalists, and Mr. Harold Bernard was leader. Hamilton Harty's 'The Mystic Trumpeter' and Grieg's Pianoforte concerto in A minor were well interpreted. Mr. Percy Grainger was at the solo instrument in the Concerto, and two of his compositions were played, viz., 'Irish Tune' for strings and horns, which he conducted, and 'Shepherd's Hey' for full orchestra, in which he was at the pianoforte. Among other features of the concert were two Tone-poems for small orchestra by Frederick Delius.

On April 25 West Bristol Choral Society, at the Victoria Rooms performed Hamish MacCunn's 'The Lay of the last Minstrel,' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'The departure of Hiawatha.' The soloists were Miss Hilda Blake, Miss Marion Elles, Mr. H. Partridge, and Mr. Herbert V. Spiller. Both works were creditably given, Mr. Charles Read conducting, and Mr. P. Hodgson leading.

St. Nicholas Choral Society gave a concert at the Vestry Hall, Pennywell Road, on May 5, in aid of the funds of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul. The conductor was Mr. H. S. Pennington, and the accompanist Mr. E. J. Pennington. An interesting programme was presented and well interpreted.

The third concert for the season of the Bristol Symphony Orchestra at the Victoria Rooms on May 6, met with the support which its merits deserved. Mr. Otto Milani conducted, and Mr. F. Gardner was leader. The greatest interest seemed manifested in Borodin's Symphony (No. 2) in B minor, which had not before been heard locally. Two Wagner Preludes, a Serenade by Mozart, Grainger's 'Mock Morris,' and the Overture to 'Oberon' were other instrumental features. The vocalist was Mr. C. E. Goulding, who delivered the Preislied from 'Die Meistersinger' and 'Lohengrin's farewell.'

The Broad Plain House Choir at their sixteenth annual concert on May 12 gave a commendable performance of Romberg's 'Lay of the bell' and a miscellaneous selection from the works of Sullivan: Miss Elsie Browning, Miss Madge Thomas, Mr. C. E. Goulding, and Mr. W. Irving Gass were the soloists, and there was a small but efficient orchestra under the leadership of Mr. H. H. Dennis. The conductor was Mr. W. Vaughan Jenkins.

The Clevedon Philharmonic Society on April 28 at the Public Hall gave their spring concert, under the direction of Mr. Edward Cook. 'The May Queen' (Sterndale Bennett) was performed, with Miss Hilda Blake, Miss Florence Yond, Mr. Arthur E. Gough, and Mr. Herbert V. Spiller as soloists. Afterwards there was a miscellaneous selection. The accompaniments were played on the pianoforte by Mr. G. W. Ryder.

On May 14, Weston-super-Mare Philharmonic Society held a concert at Knightstone Pavilion, the programme containing 'A tale of Old Japan' (Coleridge-Taylor) and a miscellaneous second part. Mr. Edward Cook conducted, and Mr. Frank Gardner was leader. The principal vocalists were Miss Mabel Manson, Miss Marian Neale, Mr. R. Hoare Byers, and Mr. Robert Charlesworth. An excellent interpretation of the Cantata was afforded, and the large audience warmly applauded the performance. In the second part the choir gave the following pieces by Coleridge-Taylor: 'The Evening Star,' 'Whispers of Summer,' and 'Viking Song.'

Dr. Basil Harwood has been elected president of the Bristol Madrigal Society in place of Mr. P. Napier Miles, who resigned through ill-health.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

An excellent performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' was given by Dr. Weekes's Choral Society at Plymouth on April 22, the only noticeable defect being that caused by a shortage of male voices. This choir shows high accomplishment in refinement and delicacy, their pianissimos being quite beautiful, and their unaccompanied singing of part-songs was particularly charming. Mr. Walter Weekes conducted, Mr. Alfred Searle led the band, and the principal singers were Misses Ethel Pascho and Gladys Jeffery, and Messrs. Alfred Heather and Julien Henry. Patient and judicious training by their hon. conductor, Mr. Arthur Faull, has brought the Sherwell Choir to a high standard of unaccompanied singing. They proved to be remarkably sure in intonation and in notes, on April 23, when they sang several difficult pieces, including Mackenzie's eight-part 'My soul would drink those echoes,' Elgar's six-part 'Go, song of mine,' a charming song by Bantock, 'Evening has lost her throne,' a six-part Serenade, by the conductor, and other pieces by Cowen and H. Thurn. The G.W.R. Male Choir, conducted by Mr. Bailey, contributed to a sacred concert at Plymouth on April 22.

A dramatic and musical event at Plymouth, on April 21, was the occasion of a visit of Miss Maria Yelland, and other contributors included Miss Mary Wills, Mrs. Arthur Picken, and Mr. J. J. Shepherd.

Mr. T. W. Luger, organist of St. Jude's, Plymouth, lectured on 'Music' on April 22, illustrations being excellently sung by his well-trained and efficient choir.

A rare opportunity of hearing the orchestral combination of the R.G.A. Band at Plymouth was enjoyed to superlative degree on April 21, when, under the auspices of the officers' mess, they played an attractive programme to a large audience. Mr. R. G. Evans, an interpretative musician of keen instinct and enlightened understanding, gave interesting readings of a 'Lohengrin' Fantasia, Weingartner's version of Weber's 'L'Invitation à la valse,' a suite in three movements, 'Les Erinnyes,' by Massenet, and other works.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

'Walpurgis Night' (Mendelssohn) and 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' (Coleridge-Taylor) were the works selected for the spring concert, on April 20, by the Barnstaple Musical Festival Society, conducted by Dr. H. J. Edwards. In the latter work particularly the tone of the choir was pure and full of vitality in all gradations of sound, and their emotional expression was good. The principals were Miss Eva Pickard and Messrs. Alfred Heather and S. J. Bishop. Mr. Percy Parish led the band. A most decided note of progress was heard in the work of the Exeter Oratorio Society (with which is amalgamated the Western Counties Musical Association) when they sang 'King Olaf,' on April 22. After various vicissitudes and drawbacks incident on change, this Society seems now to have got fairly on its feet with its vision outwards. The singers have set themselves to work conscientiously, and their singing of the Elgar work and of 'Elijah' showed them to be better acquainted with what was required of them than they have appeared to be for many festivals. Their performance was not perfect, but it was attained on right lines, and revealed a knowledge and training which should lead to big things in the future. Indeed, we have heard a definite statement that immediate preparation is to be undertaken for a performance of 'The dream of Gerontius' next season. Mr. Allan Allen conducted 'King Olaf,' and Dr. H. J. Edwards 'Elijah.' Stoke Climsland Choral Society gave a part-song concert on April 28, and another on May 14, conducted by the Rev. C. B. Walters. 'The banner of St. George' was sung by Dawlish Choral Society on April 24, with a band led by Mr. S. Harris, and conducted by Mr. J. F. King. The choir of Collaton Saint Mary sang part-songs on May 6, conducted by Mrs. Fletcher-Watson; and Exeter Male Choir, conducted by Mr. F. J. Pinn, gave their annual concert, also on May 6, with vocal solo assistance from Miss Elsie Chambers. On May 13, after a silence of several seasons, enforced by lack of support, Ashburton Choral Society gave performances of the first part of 'The Creation,' and Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' in the Parish Church. The singing was assured, d highly-pleasing. The onus of the arrangements, musical or otherwise, fell on Mr. Harold O. Jones, the effort involving self-sacrifice in more than one direction. The principals were Miss Mabel Manson and Messrs. Frank Webster and S. Bishop. Exmouth Male Choir's concert on May 14 was successful, Mr. Edgar Creedy conducting.

A chamber-concert of high artistic standard was given at Exeter on April 24 by Miss Enid Knight-Bruce (violin) and Mr. Henry G. Ley (pianoforte), who collaborated in Brahms's Sonata in A, Op. 100.

Miss Elena Gerhardt gave a recital of Lieder in the Torquay Pavilion on April 25; and at a ballad concert in another part of the town on the same date in aid of Boy Scouts' funds Miss Ethel Hook, Messrs. Hastings Wilson and Hugh Peyton (vocalists), and Miss Isabel Hirschfeld (pianoforte) were the performers. This party also appeared at Seaton on April 28 in aid of another charity.

The programme played by Teignmouth Orchestral Society on April 23 included Beethoven's eighth Symphony. Mr. J. James conducted, and the vocalist was Miss Kate Stock. On the occasion of the Benefit of Mr. Basil Indenberg, conductor of the Torquay Municipal Orchestra, Mr. Henry Wood visited the Pavilion on April 30 and conducted works by Tchaikovsky, Schubert, and Wagner. Mr. Josef Holbrooke played the solo part of his Poem for pianoforte and orchestra, 'Gwyn-ap-Nudd,' and conducted his Suite 'Dreamland.' Mr. Harold Bonarius, leader of the orchestra, was the soloist in Max Bruch's Concerto, and the vocalists were Miss Carrie Tubb and Miss Ethel Toms.

Madame Blanche Newcombe gave two recitals of German and English song at Exeter on May 1, when she was assisted by Mr. Charles Fry and Miss Maude Dixon.

The Exeter Orchestral Society scored a big success at their concert on May 5, conducted by Dr. Wood. Mrs. Kenyon (Miss Dorothy Wood) was the soloist in a Mendelssohn pianoforte concerto, and the band played some interesting pieces by Debussy, Hamish MacCunn, Elgar, and Glinka. Mr. Sutton Jones was the vocalist. Plympton Wesleyan Orchestra, conducted by Mr. W. M. Wickett, gave a concert on May 6, when a Trio was played by Mr. Wyatt (clarinet), Mr. Long (flute), and Miss Chubb (pianoforte). On May 13 Mr. H. Watt-Smyrk conducted a concert of the Ilfracombe Orchestral Society, a band of thirty performers led by Miss A. Clark.

A Society has been formed at Exeter for the production of old English music, and at the second of their two concerts for their first season on May 14 the instrumental pieces included Violoncello and Pianoforte sonata by Buononcini (Miss Vera Petherick and the Rev. C. W. Smith); Bach's Sonata in F for violin (Miss Ruby Davy) and pianoforte; and Purcell's olden Sonata for violins, violoncello and pianoforte. Songs and glees by Arne, Dowland, Purcell, Bishop, and Thomas Tomkins were included. Much interest in folk-singing has been aroused in Devon and Cornwall recently, and Mr. Cecil Sharp lectured on the subject to a newly-formed Society at Exeter on April 29, illustrations being given by members.

CORNWALL.

Under the efficient guidance of their hon. conductor, the Rev. Canon E. C. Corfe, Falmouth Philharmonic Society on April 17 sang with expressive taste and accuracy the first two sections of the 'Hiawatha' trilogy. Apart from some indefinite soprano tone the choral singing was excellent, the contraltos and basses calling for special commendation. The band was led by Miss Treweeke. At St. Austell, on April 23, the Madrigal Society of fifty-six voices, trained by Mr. C. L. Forrester, sang Cowen's 'The Rose Maiden,' and Pelynt United Choirs sang the sacred Cantata, 'The Captive Maid of Israel' at Polperro, on April 29, conducted by Mr. J. Cossentine. On April 29, Mr. Crosby Smith obtained from Newquay Choral and Orchestral Society a satisfactory concert-performance of the opera 'Martha.' Part-songs were sung by Marazion Ladies' Choir on April 22, conducted by Mr. Alan Thorne, and the sacred Cantata, 'Mary Magdalene,' was sung by Camborne North Parade Methodist Choir, conducted by Mr. M. Curtis, on April 23. Glees were sung by Gorran Glee Club, on April 23. A notable event for St. Austell and district was the performance on May 7, by Tywardreath Choral Society of the 'Hiawatha' trilogy. Mr. W. Brennand Smith conducted.

On May 4 Penzance Orchestral Society, a capable body with artistic aims, played Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony and Beethoven's 'Egmont' Overture. Mr. Walter Barnes conducted the forty players, who were led by Miss May Stewart.

DUBLIN.

With the third concert given on April 6 by the Dublin Orchestral Society the serious music for the winter season came to a close. The programme, given under Dr. Esposito's direction, included César Franck's Symphony in D minor, Mendelssohn's 'Fingal's Cave,' the Adagio from Mozart's 'Divertimento' in D, the Gavotte from 'Idomeneo,' and the 'Rhine Maidens' music from 'Götterdämmerung.'

The College Choral Society gave a performance of Cowen's 'St. John's Eve' under Dr. Marchant's direction. The solos were all taken by members of the Society. In connection with the Feis Ceoil an interesting pianoforte and song recital was given by Mr. Frederick Dawson and Mr. Gordon Cleather on May 5. Mr. Cleather (who was for several years resident at Dublin) sang with great refinement and artistic feeling. Mr. C. W. Wilson was the accompanist.

On Sunday, May 10, Dr. Esposito started a summer series of orchestral concerts at Woodbrook Concert Hall, at which all Beethoven's Symphonies will be performed in order. Signor Simonetti played Mendelssohn's Violin concerto extremely well, and the orchestra showed to great advantage in the accompaniment. On May 17, besides the second Symphony, the programme included Wagner's 'Waldweben' and the 'Meistersinger' Overture. Miss Nita Edwards, who has just returned to Dublin from a tour round the world with the Quinlan Opera Company, was the solo vocalist, and sang with great success.

The Feis Ceoil have just published a collection of 'Irish Airs' (eighty-five in number), edited by Arthur Darley and P. J. McCall. They consist of a selection from the large number contributed from time to time at the Festivals held since 1897, and are understood to be hitherto unpublished. They should prove of much interest.

LIVERPOOL.

The Walton Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. Albert Orton, deserves honourable mention for the performance of Cowen's 'Sleeping Beauty,' which closed the Society's fifth season on April 22. The tuneful work affords grateful opportunities for an intelligent choir, and the singing was generally marked by precision and expression. The vocal soloists were Miss Margaret Hadfield, Miss Helen Strain, Mr. Lloyd Moore, and Mr. J. C. Brien. By a wise provision, six first-class string-players and a timpanist assisted Dr. Stanley Dale as pianist, so that the orchestral scope of the accompaniments was very usefully suggested. With the aid of this small orchestra an admirable performance of Mozart's E flat major Pianoforte concerto was also given, with Mr. Orton as solo player.

Another estimable local organization, whose aims are instrumental rather than choral, is the Anfield Orchestral Society. Under the direction of Mr. William Faulkes the Society continues to prosper, and the programmes no less than the performances have reflected credit on all concerned. At the closing concert of the sixth season, on April 29, orchestral movements by Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Weber were played; also Beethoven's Pianoforte concerto in E flat, Op. 73, in which the soloist was Mr. E. K. Harrison. The vocalist was Mrs. Howard Stephens.

On April 18, a number of local singers and entertainers combined in a performance, given in Hope Hall on April 18, in aid of the widow and daughter of the late Mr. John Henry, who was especially well-known in the Welsh community and had long been resident in this city as a singer and teacher of singing.

The pianoforte recital given by Miss Ruby Holland, in the Rushworth Hall on May 2, revealed considerable executive powers and a perceptive intelligence.

Prospective events next season include a concert-performance of Wagner's 'Parsifal,' on November 21, by the Welsh Choral Union, who will also sing 'The Messiah' on December 19. For the Christmas concert of the Philharmonic Society, M. Gabriel Pierné's choral work, 'The Children's Crusade,' has been selected for performance. It is described as a 'Musical legend' in four parts, and although as yet unknown in this country, it has earned popularity on the Continent and in America.

At the annual meeting of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society on May 18, a highly-successful financial report was presented to the proprietors and subscribers. It was stated that the debit balance of £1,315 shown in the last annual report had been reduced by £576. The debt incurred by the extensive structural alterations and new roof now stands at £739, as against £2,650 in April, 1910. The committee considered the experiment of having guest-conductors as no doubt largely responsible for the increased interest shown in the concerts. To this might have been added an acknowledgment of the improvement effected in the choral department. Mr. Harry Evans has been reappointed choral conductor, Mr. Branscombe retaining the position of organist and accompanist at choral rehearsals. The conductors engaged for the ensuing season of twelve concerts include Busoni, Albert Coates, Harry Evans, Mlynarski, Gabriel Pierné, Landon Ronald, Safonov, and Sir Henry Wood (three concerts).

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

The annual meetings of the Gentlemen's and Hallé Concerts were appointed for May 25 and 28, too late for comment in this issue, but it is feared that the financial aspect in each case will hardly be as favourable as all desire.

The same remark holds good of the Promenade Concerts of the Manchester Orchestra Ltd. This being the case, one may surmise that Mr. Brand Lane, working along similar lines, but on a more ambitious scale and at slightly higher rates of subscription, cannot have experienced Utopian results; but he has also a fine series of miscellaneous concerts which probably help in the aggregate result, and he is reported as being thoroughly satisfied with the position up to date.

It might have been thought that the Denhof Operatic débâcle last autumn would have deterred other companies on the road from trying their luck here, but actually in the last seven months we have had more opera at Manchester than ever before—Denhof, Carl Rosa, Moody-Manners, O'Mara, and Castellano. The last two companies have each been here a fortnight during April and May; the O'Mara people performed in our Gaiety Theatre—the home of the far-famed Miss Horniman Repertory. Everything about Mr. O'Mara's production was good, but on a small scale, and in this particular theatre the perspective was quite ideal; transferred across the road to the Theatre Royal or the New Theatre, we should have been more fully conscious that it was really grand opera on a bijou scale. In the Castellano productions it appeared to be thought that if only the singing was good, nobody cared a rap what sort of playing accompanied it, and at times the contrast was very painful to sensitive ears. Mr. O'Mara has a rare tenor singer in Mr. Thompson, and in Signora Dirigis of the Castellano company there is a prima donna destined for Covent Garden.

There is on foot a movement to establish a new amateur orchestra at Manchester, in which Mr. Walter H. Mudie is interesting himself. This can only flourish provided a sufficiently exacting standard is fixed for testing aspirants to membership, and if something more than the mere spending of a pleasurable evening in rehearsal be sought.

We understand that the conductorship of the Bury Choral Society has been undertaken by Mr. Charles Risegari, his duties commencing next autumn.

None of the smaller choirs of the Manchester district were in evidence at the Morecambe Festival; at the Bolton, Bury, and Buxton meetings, Mr. Alfred Higson's Sale and District Choir gained several distinctions.

A pianoforte duet recital by Mr. and Mrs. Merrick on May 19 was a further trial of the wisdom or unwisdom of depriving the audience of any certain knowledge of the identity of the composers whose works are given. This plan appears to have little to recommend it in a general way although one can imagine circumstances where the absence of information might lead to a more unprejudiced judgment, or, say, some new work.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

The first concert of the new Gainsborough Orchestra Society took place on April 16, and proved a decided success. The programme contained Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, Sibelius's 'Finlandia,' Nicolai's 'Merry Wife of Windsor' Overture, Percy Grainger's 'Mock Morris,' and Wagner excerpts. Miss Eva Rich was an acceptable soloist, and Mr. Collin Smith, the conductor, contributed two movements from Goltermann's Concerto in A minor for the violoncello.

At the Albert Hall, Nottingham, the students of the University College gave their annual concert on April 2 under the direction of Prof. A. Henderson. With vocal and instrumental resources of 250 performers Mr. Henderson was enabled to present a very interesting programme, and in introducing Coleridge-Taylor's 'Kubla Khan' to the audience placed them under a decided obligation to his choir and orchestra. That the work was greatly appreciated was quite evident from the applause and from the opinions expressed on all sides.

The soloists were Miss Kathleen Murphy (who took the solos in the Cantata), Miss Dorothy Foulds, and Miss Elfrida Ewen. The choir gave works by Wagner, Gibbons, Benet, Mendelssohn, and Elgar, and the orchestra opened the concert with Enna's Overture 'The match girl.'

The pianoforte accompaniments were supplied by Miss Elsie Johnson and Mr. H. G. Hamilton.

The programme of the Sacred Harmonic Society for next season (1914-15) has already been issued. It is as follows:

- Nov. 5. 'The Flying Dutchman.'
- Dec. 2. Orchestral Concert: Elgar's 'Dream Children,' Mendelssohn's 'Italian' Symphony, and a Wagner Selection.
- Dec. 26. 'The Messiah.'
- Feb. 4. 'A tale of Old Japan,' Hubert Bath's 'The Wake of O'Connor.'
- March 3. Orchestral Concert: Organ Concerto by Guilmant, Goring Thomas's 'Suite de Ballet,' Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite.
- March 18. 'The Dream of Gerontius,' 'Blest Pair of Sirens.'

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

A new departure marked the Spring Concert of the Sheffield Amateur Musical Society. In electing to give a concert-performance of 'Lohengrin' (Acts 1 and 3) determining factors were the dramatic aptitude of the fine choir of the Society and the well-known Wagnerian sympathies of the conductor, Mr. J. A. Rodgers. The choir sang with more than ordinary versatility, revealing a thorough knowledge of the work. The climaxes obtained in the three great choral ensembles of Act 1, could hardly have been surpassed, and a hitch at the beginning of the first was the only flaw in a performance of high merit. The female voices came out in full effectiveness in the newly-published 'Spinning Chorus' Scene from 'The Flying Dutchman.' Balfour Gardiner's dramatic ballad, 'News from Whydah,' ended a successful concert. Miss Eva Rich (Elsa), Mr. Frank Mullings (Lohengrin), Mr. Julien Henry (the King), Mrs. J. A. Rodgers (Ortrud), Mr. E. B. Unwin (Telramund), and Mr. W. A. Hamer (the Herald) made up a happily chosen cast of soloists. Miss Daisie Evans also sang with point and beautiful tone. A large orchestra led by Mr. A. Catterall completed the musical forces. Their playing was distinguished by both precision and alert sympathy.

The Sheffield Choral Union, one of the oldest organizations in the district, has undergone an astonishing revival during the past year. From an almost moribund state it has been converted into a busy and prosperous concert Society. The energy of the officials, together with Lieut. Suckley's appointment as conductor, has brought about this satisfactory change. The improved fortunes were demonstrated in an excellent performance of Haydn's 'The seasons,' when the singing of the choir was marked by part precision and a realisation of expressive effects. The Moral Union has been engaged by the Parks Committee to give some open-air concerts during the summer, in association with the Band (military) of the Royal Irish Fusiliers.

The University Musical Society is fortunate in possessing Mr. Coward as director. The material, drawn mainly from students, is not so favourable as if recruited from a wider field. The power of training, however, showed itself in a well-rehearsed and generally artistic performance of Gluck's 'Orpheus,' given in the Mappin Hall on May 2. The hall, otherwise fine building, does not favour solo-singing, and parent defects of diction were no doubt due to its markedly resonant acoustic properties. The solo parts were intelligently sung by members of the Society, and a small orchestra contributed to a capital ensemble.

The Victoria Hall Choral Society, owing to its connection with a large Wesleyan Mission concern, is sometimes tactically at a disadvantage in the matter of choice of works, and in other respects. When, however, a concert pure and simple is given by this zealously-trained choir, the results are worthy of encouragement. Such was found in a performance, directed by Mr. H. C. Jackson, of Costa's 'Eli.' The work was not the most suitable for engaging public interest, mere being only a small audience. The choir sang with an improved sense of beauty of tone, and the orchestra was thoroughly competent. Mr. Harry Jackson was organist.

The Sheffield Grand Opera Society boldly challenged fortune in deciding to engage the Theatre Royal for a week and give performances of Nicolai's 'Merry Wives of Windsor' and Gounod's 'Faust.' The ability of the soloists was shown in the capable filling of all the solo parts, important and small; for though the capacity of these amateur performers naturally varied, nearly all the members of the cast revealed an effective sense of the stage and such vocal ability. The mounting and dressing were thoroughly done. Mr. J. Duffell, who was responsible for the entire production, conducted.

The generally high level of vocal training in the suburban and district Choral Societies was heard in concerts given by the Wincobank and Blackburn Sacred Harmonic Society; Handel's 'Samson,' Mr. J. R. Garner, (conductor); the St. John's Abbeydale Society (Parts 1 and 2 of Hiawatha), Mr. G. A. Seed, (conductor); and the Preston Musical Society (Gade's 'Spring's message,' Mr. Edwin Presswood, conductor).

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents. Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

ABERDEEN.—At the concert given by the Madrigal Choir on April 25, a programme was presented noteworthy at a point both of material and standard of performance. The principal number was Dr. Charles Wood's 'Dirge for two veterans,' the solo part in this being sung by Mr. D. Taylor. Madrigals by Marenzio, Palestrina, and Morley were sung, and also Part-songs by Brahms, Reger, Bruch, Lyon, Dunhill, and others. There was a large and enthusiastic audience. Mr. Arthur Collingwood conducted.

ASPATRIA.—Gaul's 'Joan of Arc' was performed on April 17 at the annual concert of the Aspatia and District Choral Society under the direction of Mr. James Cobb, to whom great credit is due for the standard of efficiency shown by the choir. The solo artists of the occasion were Miss Grice, Mrs. C. W. Lowther, Mr. A. Hunter, and Mr. G. Thompson (vocalists), and Mrs. Harris (violin).

BRANDON.—Handel's 'Samson' was performed by Brandon and Byshotles Co-operative Musical Union on April 22, under the direction of Mr. C. A. Vincent Jones. The soloists were Miss Gertie Hibbs, Miss Ada Elliot, Mr. J. D. Jones, and Mr. W. Peacock.

BUILTH WELLS (BRECONSHIRE).—The Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. A. P. Morgan, performed Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' in the English version by F. J. W. Crowe at their concert on April 29. The programme also included Bach's Cantata 'The Lord is my Shepherd,' and the conductor's setting of the 'Te Deum.' The soloists were Miss Edith Jones, Miss Morfydd Williams, Mr. David Ellis, and Mr. David Hughes. There was an efficient orchestra led by Mr. Walter Whitaker, and the performances were in every way successful. The conductor is warmly to be commended for his efforts in the cause of good music each season.

BURNHAM (SOMERSET).—Selections from 'Elijah' were sung at the Baptist Church on April 22 by a choir of thirty-six voices, whose work reflected credit on the conductor, Mr. John T. Crowther. The principals were Miss Florence Herridge, Miss Lloyd, Mrs. W. Monk, Mrs. R. Marsh, Mr. J. T. Crowther, and Mr. Kenneth Bale.

CALNE (WILTS).—'Elijah' was given at the Parish Church on May 13 by a choir and orchestra of one hundred performers, under Mr. W. R. Pulein's direction. The soloists were Miss Bilsland, Miss Winchester, Mr. Watson, and Mr. John Prout.

CANTERBURY.—A very successful concert was given on May 5 by the St. Lawrence and East Kent Orchestral Society. Creditable interpretations were given of the 'Pomp and Circumstance' March by Elgar, an Intermezzo by Coates, Weber's 'Der Freischütz' Overture, and Mr. Percy Godfrey's Prize 'Coronation March.' The principal artists were the Misses Honeyball (violin) and Miss Marie Houghton (vocalist), and the duties of conductor were shared by Mr. Percy Godfrey and Mr. W. T. Harvey.

COALVILLE.—At the first open rehearsal given by the Coalville Philharmonic Society, their conductor, Mr. Frank Storer, delivered his lecture on 'Interpretation as applied to choral music.' The members of Loughborough Choral Society assisted in singing the illustrations, which were taken from 'The Messiah,' 'St. Paul,' 'The Music Makers,' and 'King Olaf.'

CROMER.—On May 14 the Cromer Amateur Operatic Society produced 'Margery Deane,' a musical comedy especially written and composed for the Society by Mr. Graham Bennett and the musical director, Mr. Alfred Heath.

CROWBOROUGH.—On May 5 and 6 at the Oddfellows' Hall, the Crowborough and Jarvis Brook Amateur Musical Society, under the conductorship of Mr. E. Grimm, gave a performance of Handel's 'Messiah' that afforded great pleasure to full houses of appreciative listeners. The orchestra, reinforced for the occasion, fully upheld its reputation. The solo artists were Miss Alice Hare, Miss May Peters, Mr. Arthur Kellet, and Mr. R. E. Miles.

ELY.—The Musical Festival took place on Tuesday, May 19. Bach's 'Wachet auf' and Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens' were performed in the morning, and Parry's 'Job' and Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' in the afternoon. Sir Hubert Parry conducted his own works and Dr. Wilson the remainder. The choir of two hundred voices came from Ely, Cambridge, Huntingdon, Newmarket, and Woburn. The soloists were Miss Moger, Mr. Joseph Reed, Mr. Farrington, and Mr. Wykes. The 'Shepherd-boy's song' in 'Job' was sung by two of the Cathedral choirboys. The band was led by Mr. Haydn Inwards.

HUNSTANTON.—The Hunstanton Choral Society gave a highly successful performance of Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' in St. Edmund's Church on April 1. The work of both orchestra and choir did great credit to Mr. B. Roden Hilder as conductor. The soloists were Miss Emily Shepherd, Miss Evelyn Peell, Mr. Arthur Kellet, and Mr. Joseph Farrington. In the first part of the programme, which was miscellaneous, Miss Margaret Prior (violin) and Miss Mabel Cecil (violoncello) contributed solos, the latter, in combination with the orchestra and organ, playing the 'Solemn Melody' by Walford Davies. Mr. W. Steff Langston presided at the organ.

LETCHWORTH.—Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' was effectively performed by the Philharmonic Society on May 6 under Mr. H. Gomersall's direction. The solo parts were taken by Miss Maude Willby, Mr. Frank Webster, and Mr. Allen Engles. Miss Christine Hicks led the orchestra, and Mrs. Hugh Howard was at the pianoforte.

MILFORD-ON-SEA.—At a recent concert of the Choral Society the programme consisted of Stanford's 'Battle of the Baltic' and a MS. Cantata, 'From Isle to Isle,' by the conductor of the Society, Mr. C. F. Abdy Williams. Solos were played by Mr. Bertoncini, the leader of the orchestra, Mr. Coelho (violincello), and Miss Madge Bruce (pianoforte). Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Beesley, choirmaster and organist respectively of the Parish Church, brought a number of their choirboys, who rendered valuable assistance, and some of whom sang the solos in 'From Isle to Isle.'

NORWICH.—A varied and successful concert of much interest was given at the School of Music on May 14 by the Norwich Orchestral Union, a body that works to good purpose under the direction of Mr. Ernest Harcourt. The choral and orchestral sections of the Society were heard together in Italian operatic choruses and in Hugo Pierson's 'Ye mariners of England,' a number of solos were given, and a Phantasy-Trio by Mr. Harcourt was played by Mr. F. H. Bruff, Mr. W. Johnson, and the composer.

OKEHAMPTON.—The annual concert of the Choral Society took place on May 6. Sterndale Bennett's 'May Queen' was capitally performed, the soloists being Miss Elsie Ackland, Miss Tozer, Mr. Will Foster, and Mr. Harry Smith, all of Plymouth. The great success of the evening however, was Fletcher's humorous ballad for chorus, 'The Deacon's Masterpiece,' which was performed for the first time in the West of England. The choir thoroughly entered into the spirit of the work, and sang with great verve. Mr. Sydenham Janes conducted. The accompaniments were played by a professional quintet of strings from Plymouth, Miss Olive Beard being at the pianoforte. Songs were given by the soloists and violincello solos by Mr. C. G. Pike. The Society is to be congratulated on a great success.

ROWSLEY (DERBYSHIRE).—On Sunday afternoon, April 26, the Rowsley and District Choral Society gave a short but interesting concert under the direction of Mrs. Ford, who secured creditable interpretations of Stainer's 'Sing a song of praise,' Purcell's 'Light of the World,' Gounod's 'By Babylon's wave,' and Handel's 'Let their celestial concerts all unite.' Songs were given by Mr. and Mrs. Cockerton and Mr. R. A. Scase, and Miss Louie Dawson accompanied.

SIDMOUTH.—The annual concert of the Choral and Orchestral Society took place on April 21, when Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and the concert-version of German's 'Merrie England' were performed with full orchestra and choir, under the direction of Mr. J. A. Bellamy. The principals were Miss Gertrude Blomfield, Miss Gertrude Winchester, Mr. R. Ripley, and Mr. Frederick Ranauld.

SITTINGBOURNE.—A visit by Sir Frederick Bridge gave distinction to the concert of the Sittingbourne and District Musical Society on May 6. He conducted three of his works: 'The flag of England,' 'Rock of Ages,' and 'Crossing the bar,' and won a great personal success. The choral singers threw themselves into their work with great spirit, and gave very creditable interpretations. The programme also included Rossini's 'William Tell' Overture, and other orchestral numbers, given under the direction of Mr. W. J. Keech, Grieg's F major Sonata for violin and pianoforte, played by Miss Elsie Dudding and Miss Marjorie Brooke Wills, and songs contributed by Miss Coral Peachey and Mr. Graham Smart.

STOKE-ON-TRENT.—The fifth of Mr. John Cope's season of concerts took place on April 25, and provided an excellent miscellaneous programme. The choir of St. Paul's Church, Burslem, sang Mendelssohn's 'Festival song,' Elgar's 'As torrents in summer,' and Lohr's 'A slumber song.' Mr. Cope gave organ solos, Mr. Fredric Fradkin violin solos, Mr. Webster Millar songs, and Mr. John Ivimey accompanied.

STRATHAVEN.—Robert Machardy's latest opéra-comique, 'The palace of delight,' was performed with success to an appreciative audience on May 12.

VANCOUVER (B.C.).—What was originally a competitive meeting for children's choirs has now become a full choral Festival. For the first time in its new form the Vancouver Musical Festival was held on April 16 and 17. The competitive section was retained, and its decision was followed by a juvenile concert at which a choir and orchestra of 1,000 voices was heard under the direction of Mr. G. P. Hicks. On April 17 two concerts were given by the Vancouver Musical Society. At the first, part-songs were interpreted by the choir, and various solo numbers were given; at the second, Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' was performed, preceded by a miscellaneous programme. Mr. G. P. Hicks conducted throughout, and secured excellent results.

WOKINGHAM.—On April 27 the Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' that was in every way successful, the choruses being creditably sung, and the audience being large and enthusiastic. Mr. G. N. Durbridge conducted, and the solo parts were taken by Miss Mary Anderson, Miss Ethel Stevens, Mr. H. L. Whittaker, and Mr. Norman Cree.

WORCESTER.—Smart's 'The Bride of Dunkerron' was given for the first time at Worcester on April 21, the executants being Worcester Musical Society, under the direction of Mr. W. Mann Dyson. The performance was marked throughout by spirit and attractive tone. Miss May Eaves, Mr. Walter J. Ottey, and Mr. Lightowler sang the solos.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

M. Alfred Bachelet's 'Scémo' has been produced with success at the Opéra. The cast comprises Mlle. Yvonne Gall, MM. Altchensky, Gresse, and Lestelly. M. Messenger conducts. The score has been unanimously commended.

At the Opéra-Comique M. Henri Rabaud's 'Marouf, savelier du Caire,' founded on one of the tales of the 'Arabian Nights,' has been received with favour. It is a pleasing work, somewhat academic in character, but unaffected and recreative. It is sung by Mlles. Davelli and Tiphaine, MM. Jean Périer, Vieuille, Vigneau, Azéma, Delvoye, and others. M. Ruhlmann conducts.

At the Gaité-Lyrique have been produced two works by M. Jean Nougues—an opera 'La Vendetta,' and the ballet 'Narkiss.'

The Russian season has begun at the Opéra. The first programme comprised, besides 'Shéhérazade' and a small ballet 'Papillons' to Schumann's music, not very appropriately orchestrated, Dr. Strauss's 'La Légende de Joseph.' That work has given rise to much discussion. A majority of critics object to the spirit in which the authors have dealt with the subject, and consider that the music does not belong to the best of Dr. Strauss's output. On the first night, however, the success was great. The composer, who conducted, was called upon the platform, and warmly applauded.

Dr. Strauss has received from the French Government the Cross of Officer of the Legion of Honour.

The second programme of the Russian season consisted of M. Igor Stravinsky's 'Petrushka' and of Rimsky-Korsakov's Opera, 'The Golden Cockerel,' a delightful work of humorous character and, from the musical point of view, one of the composer's raciest and best. In the principal parts appeared Mesdames Dobrovol'skaia, Petrenko, Nicolaieva, MM. Altchensky and Andréier. M. Cooper conducted the latter work, M. Monteux the former.

The fifth Congress of the International Musical Society will open on June 2. The first week will be devoted to work, then will come three days devoted to entertainments, including a concert of ancient music at the palace of Versailles. On June 9 will be given a banquet, and on June 10 an orchestral concert and reception are to take place at the house of The Princess de Polignac. Among the British members who have promised to read papers are Mrs. Kennedy-Fraser ('Hebridean Songs'), Mr. J. A. Fuller-Maitland ('Ancient keyboards and their repertory'), Mr. H. Antcliffe ‘Emotion and representation in music’), Mr. Hamilton McDougall (‘Helpful suggestions as to the teaching of harmony drawn from the methods of language study’).

The Anglo-American season given at the Théâtre des Champs Elysées under the joint management of Messrs. Russel and Higgins, is proceeding with fair success. The only actual novelty produced was M. Montemezzi’s ‘L’amore dei Tre Re,’ an opera whose subject is of common, sensational kind, but whose carefully written score lacks neither style nor efficiency. The cast comprised Mlle. Edvina, MM. Marcoux, Ferrari-Fontani, Cigada. The other works given were M. Puccini’s ‘Manon Lescaut,’ with Madame Kouznetsov and M. Crimi, ‘Otello,’ ‘Un Ballo di Maschera,’ and ‘Tristan und Isolde.’

At its fifth monthly concert, which was conducted by M. Vincent d’Indy, the Schola Cantorum has produced with great success ‘Orfeo,’ and other works by Monteverde.

The orchestral concert of the Société Nationale took place on Sunday, May 10. The programme—except for M. Albéric Magnard’s fourth Symphony, produced the foregoing month by another association—consisted entirely of novelties by young French composers: MM. Marcel Labey, Jean Poueigh, Henri Woollett, de Lioncourt, Desrez, Henri Mulet, Marcel Orban. None of the numbers proved particularly interesting.

The Société des Concerts du Conservatoire has closed its season with two performances of Bach’s ‘Johannes Passion.’

At her song recital given on May 11, Madame Vallin Hekking has introduced interesting numbers by E. Grassi and Roland Manuel.

M. Robert Schmitz has given on May 12, a most interesting pianoforte recital, devoted to modern French and Russian music.

The last concert of the Société Musicale Indépendante comprised interesting numbers by contemporary Spanish composers, and Greek songs by Emile Riadis.

Albert Roussel’s ‘Evocations,’ Paul le Fleur’s ‘Crépuscules d’Armor,’ a ‘Symphonic Suite’ by Darius Milhaud, and a ‘Madrigal lyrique’ by O. Klemperer were given at the fifteenth concert of the Association des Concerts Schmitz.

Foreign Notes.

BERLIN.

Under the direction of Madame Heyman-Engel a French opéra-buffe evening was given at the Hochschule für Musik. The duet from ‘Der Kapellmeister’ (Paër) and Massé’s one-act operetta ‘Les Noces de Jeanette’ were the principal features of the evening.—The Karg-Elert evening recently given at the Harmonium Hall proved a great success.—An interesting meeting of the Society for the Protection of Art was held recently. The first part of the programme consisted of an address by Herr Metzler on the disfiguration of master-works of the 17th and 18th century violin music by unstylish modern arrangements. A concert of chamber music from the 16th to the 18th century followed.

FRANKFORT-ON-MAIN.

A highly interesting concert of French music was recently given at the Palmgarten. Works by Aubert, Dubois, Bizet, Massenet, Saint-Saëns, Thomas, and Bourgeois were heard.

HAMBURG.

The third great Festival of the German Brahms Society will be held at Hamburg (Brahms’s birthplace) on June 4-8, 1915. The first two Brahms Festivals took place respectively in 1909 at Munich and 1912 at Wiesbaden.

JENA.

The recently discovered Variations by Beethoven for two oboes and English horn (or two violins and viola) will shortly be published by the fortunate finder, Prof. Fritz Stein, who discovered also the ‘Jena’ Symphony. The Variations, which are on a theme from Mozart’s ‘Don Juan,’ seem to have been written about 1795, when Beethoven composed the well-known Trio (Op. 95) for the same instruments.

LEIPSIC.

A very successful concert was given at the International Exhibition of the book trade and printing industry. The soloists were Herr Sigfrid Karg-Elert (pianoforte, organ, and harmonium), Herr Wolschke (violin), and Fräulein Meta Steinbrück (vocalist).

MAGDEBURG.

The sacred oratorio ‘Jairus’ by Fritz Zierau has been given here for the first time with great success.

MEININGEN.

It is stated that Max Reger, in consideration of his health, has asked to be released of his functions as General-Musik-Direktor of the Court-Orchester. The Duke has accepted his resignation. Reger will leave his position on July 1 next.

NAPLES.

Caciria, a ‘cinema-opera’ by Gabriel d’Annunzio, with music by Pizzetti, will be performed shortly at the Théâtre Mercadante.

ST. PETERSBURG.

The Douma having refused the financial assistance asked for by the famous ‘Andreef-Balalaika’ orchestra, the Czar has intervened personally and granted a yearly subsidy of £2,500.—M. W. M. Afanassjev, the celebrated critic, has succeeded in collecting some most important documents relating to the life of Glinka and Anton Rubinstein. These valuable memoirs have been placed in one of the concert halls of the Conservatoire. It is now proposed to enlarge the collection by manuscripts, letters, and portraits of other prominent national composers, particularly any matter concerning Balakirev, Rimsky-Korsakov, Tchaikovsky, Borodin, and Arensky.

ROTTERDAM.

An interesting series of organ recitals by Henri de Vries, in which English music plays a prominent part, is in progress at the Cathedral. On May 15 the programme included ‘Cathedral Music in E’ by Herbert Wareing and John E. West’s ‘Finale Jubilante.’ No fewer than nine British works are down for performance.

VIENNA.

At the Volks-Oper the first performance in German of Weiss’s ‘Der Sturm auf die Mühle’ (after Zola) has been given.—Under the chairmanship of Richard Count Coudenhove-Kalergi, a committee has been formed for the establishment of a ‘Home’ for the cultivation of the national folk-lore and especially of the works of the great national composers. This ‘Schuberteum’ (the most appropriate name for this institution) is expected to become the centre of the musical movement in the Austrian empire.

Miscellaneous.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The Sterndale Bennett Scholarship (for any branch of music) has been awarded to Lionel Wyndham Down for composition. The Parepa-Rosa Scholarship (singing) has been awarded to Kathleen Deering Wells, Streatham. The Thalberg Scholarship (pianoforte) has been awarded to Marjorie Ivy McTavish, Bath.

The following candidates gained the Gold and Silver Medals offered by the Associated Board for the highest and second highest Honours marks, respectively, in the Advanced and Intermediate Grades of the Local Centre Examinations in March-April last, the competition being open to all candidates in the British Isles. Advanced Grade Gold Medal—Miss Dora Grossé, Chester (pianoforte); Advanced Grade Silver Medal—Miss Dorothy Chalmers, Aberdeen (violin); Intermediate Grade Gold Medal—Miss Eileen W. L. Gerwin, Weston-super-Mare (pianoforte); Intermediate Grade Silver Medal—Miss Ena L. Maley, Douglas (singing).

In connection with the two hundredth Gluck anniversary to be celebrated at Leipsic on July 2 next, the Gluck Society has asked Herr Erich Müller to prepare a collection of Christoph Willibald Gluck's letters. Herr Müller asks all Gluck enthusiasts and especially those who possess Gluck autographs and letters to communicate with him and to entrust to him such autographs or letters (or photographs of them) for a short time. All communications should be addressed: An die Geschäftsstelle der Gluck Gesellschaft, Leipzig, Nürnbergerstrasse 36.

On April 22, at a rehearsal of the Crystal Palace Choir, Sir Frederic Cowen handed a presentation gold watch to Mr. W. W. Hedgcock on behalf of the Choir, who thus expressed their high esteem and gratitude for Mr. Hedgcock's admirable work as their conductor. It is common knowledge that the Crystal Palace Choir, whose very existence was once at stake, was saved from probable dissolution by Mr. Hedgcock's appointment and his enthusiastic efforts, and that he has now brought the Society to a high level of efficiency and artistic power.

Mr. Thomas Dunhill announces an eighth series of chamber concerts to take place at Steinway Hall on June 9, 16, and 23. The following works will receive their first performance: Trio for pianoforte, clarinet, and violoncello by John Ireland, Suite for clarinet and pianoforte by C. H. Lloyd, String quartet in G by R. O. Morris, String quartet in E flat by Charles Wood, and Phantasy Trio for violin, viola, and violoncello by A. von Ahn Carse.

H. I. M. The Tsar has paid a tribute to Sir Joseph Beecham's interest in Russian art, particularly music and ballet, by decorating him with the Order of St. Stanislaus—the highest Order which can be conferred upon a civilian in the Russian Empire. Sir Joseph Beecham is the first Englishman to receive this Order. H. M. The King has given permission to Sir Joseph to wear the Insignia of the Order.

On May 6 occurred the hundredth anniversary of the death of a great theorist, organist, and composer, Georg Joseph Vogler, known as 'Abbe Vogler,' born at Würzburg, June 15, 1749. Vogler visited London on several occasions as concert-organist with a simplified, portable organ of his own construction. The most distinguished of Vogler's numerous pupils were Weber and Meyerbeer.

As the remains of the late Duke of Argyll were conveyed from Kent House, East Cowes, en route for London, the procession was accompanied by the Band of the Royal Marine Light Infantry, who played, among other works, the 'Solemn March' by their bandmaster, Lieut. George Miller.

The North Staffordshire District Choral Society is to be congratulated on securing Mr. Harry Evans as conductor, for there is no better master of choral training and choral interpretation. The artistic reputation of the choir will be safe in his hands. Mr. George Clarke is chorus-master.

The sum of £75,000 has been given to University College, Aberystwyth, as an endowment for the establishment of a School of Music. It is understood that the donors are Mr. David Davies, M.P., and his family.

The collections at forty organ recitals given during the last two winters by Mr. Frederick Chubb, at Christ Church, Vancouver, have realised over $2,000 (£400), single collections ranging from $20 to $100.

Mr. C. J. Bishenden gave a concert-lecture on 'Henry Purcell and singers of his time' at 25, Guilford Street on May 12. Illustrations were sung by Mr. and Mrs. Bishenden and pupils of the former.

A second Beethoven Festival has been arranged by Mr. Daniel Mayer, to open on April 19 next year, with works by Bach and Brahms in the programme.

A 'History of Russian music' by Mr. M. Montagu-Nathan is announced for immediate publication by Messrs. Reeves.

It is announced that Dr. Richard Strauss will conduct the concert to be given by the Queen's Hall Orchestra on June 26.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The first production of 'The Cricket on the Hearth,' an opera in three Acts, the libretto by the late Julian Sturgis (author of Sullivan's 'Ivanhoe'), will take place at the Duke Hall, R.A.M., on June 6, at 2.30. Subsequent performances will be given (all with orchestra) on the evenings of June 8, 9, 10, and 12, and at a matinée on June 11. The members of the R.A.M. Operatic Class are the performers, and the production is under the direction of Mr. Cairns James, and Mr. Edgardo Lévi (the conductor of the class). There will be a double cast of the characters which will be employed alternately, and the composer will conduct one or two of the performances.

Answers to Correspondents.

NEWMAN.—The soft pedal should not be used. The accompaniment to the Moderato cantabile is grouped in threes. The grace notes come in the first half of the bar, the F being played on the beat.

DICKIE.—'Sleepers, wake' (Bach); 'Bide with us' (Bach); 'The darkest hour' (Harold Moore); 'Lauda Sion' (Mendelssohn).

A. J.—The practice differs among the best singers. Either 'pardon'd' or 'pardoned' is acceptable.

TECHNIQUE AND EXPRESSION

IN

BY FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or, briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cetera.

THE MUSIC BY JOHN FRANCIS BARNETT.

PRICE TWO SHILLINGS AND SIXPENCE.

Paper Boards, 3s.; Cloth, gilt, 4s. 6d.

Vocal Parts, 1s. each.

(Tonic Sol-fa in the Press).

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

The vocal writing is always admirably smooth and fluent, the music abounds in graceful passages, both vocal and orchestral, and there is something refreshing in its complete freedom from affectation. . . . "The Eve of St. Agnes" is bound to find favour with choral societies in search of an unpretentious, straightforward, and eminently singable work.

MORNING POST.

Mr. Barnett, like Verdi, moves with the times in notable fashion. His cantata is designed on the modern continuous plan, and his music itself is of to-day in its freedom of utterance and in the vividness and richness of orchestral colour. He seems to revel in the freedom allowed, and does not hesitate to take advantage of every opening. Yet with it all there is the touch of the experienced craftsman who understands the voice and can write gratefully and well for it singly and in groups.

SUNDAY TIMES.

His music is written in continuous plan, and his orchestration has often a modern richness of colour. The chief characteristics of his work are the facile flow and suavity of his melodies and the clear and refined technique.

MONTHLY MUSICAL RECORD.

There is no reason why this work should not have as wide a popularity as the same composer's "Ancient Mariner," for it repeats the same characteristics of tunefulness and unpretentious workmanship.

THE GLOBE.

It is still, as it has always been, impossible for Mr. Barnett to write anything that is not suave, mellifluous, and musicianly.

ADDITIONAL HYMNS WITH TUNES

FOR USE WITH

HYMNS ANCIENT AND MODERN OR ANY OTHER CHURCH HYMNAL.

272 pages, Imperial 16mo. Cloth Boards, price Two Shillings and Sixpence.

Tonic Sol-fa Edition, Two Shillings and Sixpence.

Hymns only, Imperial 32mo, Cloth Boards, One Shilling.

Hymns only, medium 32mo, diamond type, cloth, 4d.; paper, 3d.

Complete edition, bound with HYMNS ANCIENT AND MODERN (Quarto), 6s. 6d. net.

As its name implies, this book is designed for use with, and not in place of, other Church Hymnals.For this reason the Hymns are numbered from 801, so that the numbers may not interfere with the use of any other hymn book, no other Church hymn book having as many as even seven hundred hymns. Each hymn has its own distinctive tune, and no hymn or tune in this work is found in Hymns Ancient and Modern (Old Edition), so that with the two books no duplication occurs.

A PRACTICAL GUIDE TO THE THEORY OF MUSIC

CONTAINING

NUMEROUS TEST-QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS.

BY

JULIA A. O'NEILL

Composer of "EXERCISES FOR THE WEAKER FINGERS" (Progressive Studies, Edited by FRANKLIN TAYLOR, Book 53) and of "MELODIOUS TECHNIQUE."

Price One Shilling. Paper Boards, 1s. 6d.

THE TIMES.

It is in its clear statement of facts, both in writing and by the use of simple diagrams, that Miss Julia O'Neill's book excels.

THE MORNING POST.

Her manner of putting down the facts is concise and clear. An immense amount of ground is covered in logical sequence, and the book is one of the most helpful publications as yet made. It is satisfactory to note that ear-cultivation is touched upon.

MUSICAL OPINION.

It is really surprising the amount of useful matter that Julia A. O'Neill has managed to compress within the covers of her primer, "A Practical Guide to the Theory of Music." Teachers who wish to keep abreast of the times in an educational sense will find this well-written guide calculated to help them to a knowledge of the latest and most accepted method of elementary theoretical instruction. We are pleased to note that the all-important subject of ear-culture has not been neglected in the present primer.

THE LADY.

Is a thoroughly praiseworthy attempt to present the cardinal facts of musical theory in a plain and straightforward manner to the beginner. Wholly admirable is the way the gradual formation of our present-day clefs is explained.

A

HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS
IN MUSIC

CONTAINING

600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS

BY

ERNEST A. DICKS,

FELLOW OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

The scope of this book covers the whole ground of theoretical examinations in music. It supplies an invaluable equipment to candidates entering for the various Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge held periodically throughout the country, and it will be found extremely useful to those who are preparing for the higher grades of Diploma and Degree Examinations.

The book is therefore very comprehensive. Its range includes questions and answers in Theory, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form, Fugue, Acoustics, Musical History, Organ Construction, and Choir Training.

By no means the least valuable part of the volume is that section, consisting of upwards of one hundred pages, which contains reprints of past examination papers set by the Associated Board, Trinity College, and the Incorporated Society of Musicians; the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, London, Dublin, Durham, and Edinburgh, and the Victoria University; The Royal Academy of Music, The Royal College of Music, and The Royal College of Organists. The advantage of having so many specimens of these actual examination papers within one cover is too obvious to need further comment or commendation.

PREFACE TO THE NINTH EDITION.

The author desires to acknowledge his great indebtedness to the authorities of the London University; the Royal Academy of Music; the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music; The Royal College of Organists; Trinity College of Music, London; and the Incorporated Society of Musicians, for their kindness in allowing him to incorporate copies of their latest Examination Papers in Parts II. and III. of his Handbook, in order that he might present their latest examination requirements.

THE ORGAN

BY

WALTER G. ALCOCK,

M.V.O.,

Mus. Doc. Dunelm., A.R.C.M., F.R.C.O.

Organist and Composer to His Majesty's Chapels Royal and Assistant-Organist of Westminster Abbey.

Published as a Net Book.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS NET.

THE ATHENÆUM.

fine work . . . and is admirable at all points.

YORKSHIRE POST.

The name of Dr. Walter G. Alcock is in itself a sufficient guarantee of the sound teaching of organ-playing, and his book, "The Organ," more than sustains his reputation. . . . There are many useful exercises on various technical points, and some short original pieces which serve as further illustrations of the author's teaching. It is very handsomely printed on good, stout paper, and from every point of view is a valuable book.

THE SCOTSMAN.

The work is a distinctly useful addition to books of musical instruction.

THE BRISTOL TIMES AND MIRROR.

Although many books of instruction about the organ have been published, the latest is among the best. Its merits are sundry. . . . The book is thoroughly mastered no other one is needed for the purpose of tuition, for it is the key to everything that has been written about the king of instruments. The print is exceedingly clear, and the book itself neat and attractive.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS.

This is not an "instruction" book in the ordinary use of the term, for its scope is too wide, and the information given is so largely the result of personal experiment and experience that those who have already advanced in the art of organ playing will find many hints and suggestions which will prove of practical service. The book is admirably divided into sections dealing with the elements of organ art; and a very important chapter is that on hymn-playing.

THE SUNDAY TIMES.

Every young organ student will find himself greatly helped by "The Organ," a new manual of the instrument by Dr. Alcock.

THE CHOIR.

We congratulate Dr. Alcock on having produced a work which will rank with the best of its kind.

THE MUSIC STUDENT.

The work is up-to-date in every way, it is well arranged and graduated, and begins at the beginning. . . . One must look a long way to find a work which unites as much sound instruction with so much good music of all grades, all under one cover.

THE BOOKSELLER.

Dr. Alcock has produced a very helpful and useful book which the ambitious player will do well to study with great care and attention; he who follows the directions here given will undoubtedly find his work as an organist very materially assisted.

CHURCH FAMILY NEWSPAPER.

Written by a master of his subject, "The Organ" makes an immediate appeal to organists of all descriptions, for the matter contained in the book embraces all that is necessary from simple pedal exercises—called by some "first steps"—up to pieces requiring all the resources of modern organ technique.

The first performance of this work was given on November 29, 1913, by the Crystal Palace Orchestral and Choral Society. The following are a few extracts from the Press notices:—

"The Crystal Palace Choral Society launched the new concert-version of 'Tom Jones' on what promises to be a very successful career. Mr. German has never written fresher, brighter, or more characteristically English music."—Daily Telegraph.

"The first performance was given with immense success."—Dewsbury Weekly.

"Complete success attended the entire representation."—Norwood Review.

"The well-directed enterprise of the Crystal Palace Society in giving the concert-performance of Mr. Edward German's much-appreciated comic opera, 'Tom Jones,' cannot be too highly commended. The performance was excellent. It may be strongly recommended to all musical societies."—Morning Advertiser.

Learn to Play at Sight

In three months' time you will be able to play accurately at first sight compositions that now take hours of laborious practice to perfect—if you start now to study the Ehremayer System of Pianoforte Sight-Playing.

To the Pianist trained by the Ehremayer System, Sight-Playing becomes automatic—a habit: the fingers fall instinctively upon the correct keys without any conscious mental effort, thus leaving the mind free to give expression and individuality to the interpretation.

Student and Advanced Player alike derive great benefit from this course. If you have a technical knowledge of music and of the pianoforte you can become a proficient Sight-Player in the shortest time and with least trouble by studying the Ehremayer System of Pianoforte Sight-Playing. Moreover, you learn at home in your own time and at your convenience.

Write now for the interesting booklet, which fully explains the Ehremayer System and tells you how you can become an expert Sight-Reader.

PERFECT CONTROL

Arms, Hands, and Fingers

is of fundamental importance to every pianist. Unless every muscle in the fingers, hands, and arms is under perfect control, and will instantly and accurately respond to the nervous impulse delivered from the brain, many technical difficulties will for ever prove insuperable.

In three or four months you can accomplish more by the "From Brain to Keyboard" System than you could possibly achieve by three years' "practice." Not only can you quickly attain perfect control of your fingers, not only can you save yourself the tedium and hopelessness of daily keyboard drudgery, but experience with thousands of pupils has shown that gives permanent mastery over all difficulties in Technique

'From Brain to Keyboard'

MACDONALD SMITH'S SYSTEM OF PIANOFORTE TOUCH AND TECHNIQUE

There is no technical requirement of the pianist from beginner to the most advanced concert player, that this System cannot satisfy. It requires of your time but eight minutes twice a day, involves no fatigue, and requires no apparatus.

SIR FREDERICK BRIDGE, M.V.O.

lecturing at Gresham College on "Musical Training," strongly recommended this system, "the advantages of which," he said, "he could cordially endorse from his own personal experience," and the fact that I have taught, chiefly by correspondence nearly—is convincing evidence of the complete success of the "From Brain to Keyboard" System. These students live in all parts of the world, are of all ages from 16 to 70, and the results show that there is not a single technical difficulty even in the most advanced pianoforte work which cannot be overcome by the "From Brain to Keyboard" System.

Pupils of the System say: "The change in my playing (at a concert) was marvellous." "The first lesson has had a truly wonderful effect." "I have no difficulties worth noting." "Far beyond anything I ever expected." "I can play pieces hitherto undreamt of." "Worth twenty times the fee charged." "I have passed my examination with honours."

WRITE TO ME TO-DAY—tell me your age, state of health, your degree of proficiency, detail the difficulties that trouble you, and I will reply in full and explain how you can obtain permanent mastery over your difficulties through the "From Brain to Keyboard" System in three or four months. This will of course entail no obligation on your part to adopt the system. You will not do that until you are convinced that you will derive substantial benefit.

My book, "Light on Pianoforte Playing," which explains my System more fully, is sent free on request. Write to-day to TECHNIQUE AND EXPRESSION IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING BY FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, assisting me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, &c. &c.

JULY 1, 1914.

FEODOR IVANOVICH SHALIAPIN.

By ROSA NEWMARCH.

The art of Shaliapin, so subtle and searching, so simple and sincere, so finely poised between idealistic conception and realistic action, so full of terrible and splendid qualities that seem to echo the vigour of our Elizabethan age, tempered by a wonderful tenderness, needs a whole volume for its adequate discussion. At the utmost I can only gather in these pages a few impressions left upon me by his work and personality.

It is a matter for congratulation that fate has first made us acquainted with this great actor-singer on the stage of Drury Lane; a house so impregnated with memories and potent influences that engender a harmonious atmosphere for the actor's art. Shaliapin himself, I find, is sensible of these psychic energies which surround him: 'When I am alone for a moment in my dressing-room, or standing quietly behind the scenes, the thought of Kemble, Edmund Kean, Macready—all the great spirits who have been there before me—takes forcible possession of my spirit. I feel strangely and wonderfully uplifted as though I were in a church.' In speaking of Shaliapin as an actor-singer I deliberately put the singer second, for without disparagement to his rare qualities as a vocalist, it is the histrionic side of his impersonations of which we think first and last; moreover, if I am not mistaken, this is the order in which he himself most often thinks of his double faculty. The greatest of all his gifts is not the sensuous beauty of his voice, nor his vocal production, but his re-creative power of imagination. Few actors in our day have possessed in such a degree the sustained force of imagination that makes all he does seem real and inevitable. As Swinburne would put it, he convinces us 'that thus and not otherwise it was; that thus and not otherwise it must have been,' that these are the very words spoken, the very deeds enacted, by the historic characters, or the creatures of the poet's brain.

At the same time, though we are disposed to rank one side of Shaliapin's work rather higher than the other, partly because his serious conception of the actor's art is comparatively rare among operatic singers, yet we must acknowledge that the balance of his performances is very even; for if he is a superb actor he is also a great singer with 'a style that is the man,' a singer whose elocution is a thing of joy, and whose tone, timbre, and sense of rhythm are incomparable.

Although not wholly self-taught, Shaliapin never studied continuously in any particular vocal school.

He owes what he now is to habits of close observation and self-criticism rather than to systematic instruction. Born on February 1-13, 1873, Feodor Ivanovich Shaliapin is a true son of the people. His father was a peasant from the district of Viatka, and is said to have been a writer to the Zemstvo. In any case he seems to have been too poor to give his family any education. Feodor Ivanovich first saw the light in the old city of Kazan, on the Volga, the scene of Ivan the Terrible's great victory over the Mongols in 1552, now the centre of one of the chief Tatar settlements in Russia, and celebrated in many a legend and folk-song. The boy sang for a time in the archiepiscopal choir, and worked as a shoemaker's apprentice. In the poor street in which he lived he had for opposite neighbour Maxim Gorky, who was then employed in an underground bakery, which he afterwards described in his tale 'Twenty-six and one.' But it was not until much later that the two formed that strong tie of friendship which now unites them.

At seventeen Shaliapin joined a provincial opera company, in which his fine but immature voice and handsome presence soon procured for him a solo-part. He began with the rôle of the Stranger in Verstovsky's opera 'Askold's Tomb.' The company was by no means solvent; sometimes on 'treasury' nights no cash was forthcoming, and the lad was obliged to seek a livelihood as best he could. He is said to have been a luggage porter, a burlak or barge-hauler on the Volga, and a street-sweeper in turn. Black bread and pickled gherkins were often luxuries in those days, and he was more than once perilously near starvation. Later on, he travelled with a Malo-Russian company as singer and occasional dancer, visiting the Trans-Caspian district and the Caucasus. In 1892 he found himself at Tiflis, where he sang outside the cheaper restaurants and managed to pick up a poor living for a few weeks until someone was attracted by the unusual quality and volume of his voice, and brought him to the notice of Oussatov, a well-known operatic singer, who volunteered to teach the young man, and eventually procured him an engagement at the Tiflis Opera House. Here he made his début as Sousanin in Glinka's 'A life for the Tsar.' Oussatov did more than 'place' Shaliapin's voice and teach him to sing a scale smoothly, he laid the foundations of his artistic and general culture.

Guided by him, Shaliapin began from the first to discriminate between true gold and pinchbeck, and to grasp the great truth that tragic pathos to be grand must be impersonal. While working with Oussatov he first heard the scena in 'Boris Godounov' beginning 'I have attained to power,' in which the Tsar gradually lays bare the sufferings of his remorseful soul. How well that he was not a sophisticated academical student of nineteen, ready to join in the general depreciation of Moussorgsky as an untaught upstart! What he felt when Oussatov sang him the scena that he was afterwards to make so completely his own, was that Moussorgsky had fetched this music out of the soil which had given it birth; out of the innermost soul of his race. He felt, too, that in its unstudied simplicity it had a great objective quality, which has since been tried and proved; for it is not its racial element that moves us to awe and sympathy, but the conviction that it emanates from those profound depths of humanity where the whole world meets in kinship.

In the summer of 1894 Shaliapin sang at the Summer Theatre of the Aquarium at Petersburg and at the suburban Pavlovsky Theatre. He must have attracted the attention of some member of the official musical world, for he appeared on the stage of the Maryinsky Theatre, the Imperial Opera House of the capital, in the following season.

Although by this time the young man must have made astonishing progress in his art, the directors of the Imperial Opera seem to have been far from suspecting that they had already secured the legitimate successor of the great bass, Ossip Petrov (1807-78), who had created the part of Sousanin on the first performance of 'A life for the Tsar.' The press dealt hardly with Shaliapin, and it must have been about this time that Ivanov, the conventional and one-sided critic of the Novoe Vremya, pronounced judgment on his impersonation of 'Ivan the Terrible,' in Rimsky-Korsakov's opera 'The Maid of Pskov.' I have not the article at hand, but, as far as I can now remember, Ivanov was shocked by the natural quality of Shaliapin's 'business,' and condemned the whole performance for its ugly realism. Reading this diatribe on the following day, Shaliapin, who was only twenty-three at the time, felt his hopes considerably dashed. He sought Stassov at the Public Library in a state of profound dejection. Stassov, like the Khan in 'Prince Igor,' inquired, 'Why is my guest so sad, so lost in gloomy thoughts?' 'Have you read this?' asked Shaliapin, producing the newspaper from his pocket. 'Of course,' replied the irreverent Stassov, with a ringing laugh, 'and I was about to congratulate you upon it! Splendid! To make the "old camel" spit like this proves that your interpretation must have been annoyingly strong and fresh. Cheer up, and take your own way through life.' Shaliapin went away happier than he came, having learned a lesson of self-reliance which he never forgot. Many years later, when a party of disinterested friends at New York were offering him a dozen different suggestions as to the interpretation of a certain rôle, he is reported to have listened politely, and then crushed them with the following reply: 'Gentlemen, I have no doubt everyone of you is right; all the same, I shall play the part in my own way.'

Shaliapin, like most of his compatriots, regarded Italy as the Mecca of all singers. When he was able to visit Milan, he found that art is not to be picked up at certain traditional centres like an endemic disease. 'Of course I learnt something,' he says, 'one can always enlarge one's knowledge, and, with it, one's truth of expression by studying a new people.' He added Italian to the list of languages which he sings and speaks with ease, but I do not think he regards his visits to Italy as counting for much in his vocal efficiency.

The most important schooling of his life began in 1896, when Mamantov started the Moscow Private Opera Company, and paid the indemnity which freed Shaliapin from his contract with the Imperial Opera Houses, where his gifts had certainly been unduly neglected. For three years he was the leading figure in Mamantov's company. His voice was acquiring greater beauty day by day, and his artistic perception increased by leaps and bounds. One after another he created a series of inimitable and strikingly original parts: Boris in Moussorgsky's historic music-drama 'Ivan the Terrible' in Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Pskovianka,' the Miller in Dargomizsky's opera 'The Roussalka,' Salieri in Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Mozart and Salieri,' Mephistopheles in Gounod's 'Faust' were all illuminated by him with a degree of truth and conviction that impressed the public as it had never impressed the critics and official authorities. Shaliapin became the idol of the Muscovites. After 1899 he appeared as a star artist at the Imperial Opera, Moscow, and at the Maryinsky Theatre, St. Petersburg. From time to time he has added to his Russian repertory, and his readings of the title-rôle in Rubinstein's 'The Demon,' of Holofernes and Yeremka in Serov's operas 'Judith' and 'The Power of Evil,' must be added to those mentioned above.

Outside Russian opera, Shaliapin's finest work has been done in connection with Boito's 'Mefistofele' and Massenet's 'Don Quichotte.' In the former he made a furor at Milan, where he appeared in the part ten times during his first visit in 1901.

He has played 'Don Quichotte' at Monte Carlo and Brussels. Many people consider it his greatest achievement, and certainly as regards his make-up the illusion must be marvellously convincing.

There are two other parts which Shaliapin dearly loves to play, that of Don Basilio in Rossini's 'Barber of Seville' and Leporello in 'Don Giovanni.' Although we associate him with 'Rag and anguish, harrowing fear, heart-crazing crime,' he possesses a fund of gaiety and childlike drollery. He adores Mozart for the ease and geniality with which he conceals the seamy side of things. In tragedy Shaliapin is restrained, economical of gesture, prepared for every emergency, and careful to preserve due balance in all that he does; in humorous parts he 'lets himself go' in a freedom of gesture and in antics that scandalize the conventionally minded. It has been objected that as Don Basilio he blows his nose on his sleeve instead of on his pocket handkerchief! He enters with such enjoyment into the comic element that I believe he must often long to double the part of the roystering soldier-monk Varlaam with that of the conscience-smitten Tsar Boris.

Of all Shaliapin's rôles the one that leaves upon me the deepest impression of his mastery of tragic art is his Ivan the Terrible. He himself is also inclined to regard it as his masterpiece. The working-out of other parts was to some extent merely the filling-in and colouring of fairly definite outlines. The study of Ivan presented an emotional and intellectual problem. The interest of the opera is originally intended to centre round the figure of Olga, the Maid of Pskov. For various reasons, chiefly connected with the censorship, the figure of the Tsar had to be reduced to a nonentity in the earlier productions of the work. Before Shaliapin's time no one had discerned the latent possibilities which lay beneath the repellent exterior of Ivan. Instead of filling in a spacious outline he was content with the task of creating a striking character out of a somewhat nebulous and secondary part. He had to make Ivan live in a hundred details, and now he seems to me the most complete, the most subtly nuancé, of all my impersonations,' he once told me. He felt impelled to grasp this character and thrust it to the forefront of the stage. This he has done by sheer force of personality without taking unwarrantable liberties with the opera. One feels how quickly the figure of the Tsar would shrink back to secondary proportions in the hands of a lesser artist. The famous study of Ivan on his white barb, following the moral and physical abjection of the people, and the tension with which they await his appearance, might easily be reduced to a conventional operatic scene by the least mistake in deportment and gesture. Picture the effect produced by a self-centred, unimaginative vocalist, who would undoubtedly ride in triumphantly, and, taking a bravura Henri-Quatre attitude, receive the acclamations of the crowd with the self-satisfied smile of a theatrical king! Shaliapin's fallible imagination has suggested his pose of immobility; the quiescence of suspicion and inward tremor.

In all his parts we get such wonderful pauses. The subtle variety of his silences and stillnesses is a feature of his art. It is extraordinary how much of transitional emotion he can crowd into the briefest lull between two phases of passion. In this respect he complains that composers are often inconsiderate to the needs of the singer. It is true that a rest in the hands of an inferior actor is often a danger-point, but sufficient time should be given for the artist to send some telepathic warning to the audience of a complete change of sentiment.

Shaliapin occasionally talks of his art in characteristically forthright terms. There is nothing fitful or irregular in his impersonations. Speaking of the art which conceals—or should conceal—art, he says: 'We must all sweat to make our work perfect, but we must never let the public see us chopping our brows.' Complete self-control is the virtue which he estimates as being of primary importance in art. For a display of normal sensibility he feels the contempt of a strong, splendidly balanced temperament. Talking one day of a voix larmoyante which so often lessens the impressiveness of Tchaikovsky's emotional climaxes Shaliapin observed: 'At the crises of feeling there may be tears if you like, but in the eyes of the spectators; never in those of the actor. Art to be great must be almost purely objective, and the least attempt to read his own personal sufferings into the character he represents instantly decreases the actor's hypnotic power over his audience.'

Shaliapin does all his own 'making up.' Most Russian actors are traditionally clever at this work, and one rarely sees on the stage of Petersburg, or Moscow, such slipshod adjustment of wigs, or such plastered, immobile masks, as in many of the leading theatres of Western Europe. The 'make-up' must never be so heavy as to interfere with the free emotional play of the features beneath. He has also a wonderful practical knowledge in sartorial questions.

Wherever he is, Shaliapin soon creates around him the simple, serdechny (cordial) atmosphere of a Russian home. Photographs of his children are on every table. 'Such good friends of mine,' he calls them, and it is evident that their doings and their letters form one of the chief interests of his daily life. Being a Russian of the Russians, he has the true pilgrim spirit of the race, and fluctuates between irresistible impulses to rise up and go far afield, and yearnings to be back in his own land.

I should not be at all surprised to hear Shaliapin sing opera in English. He is picking up our language very quickly, so much so that when he signed for me the photograph which forms the frontispiece of this article, I inquired satirically how much longer he was going to sign his name in French. 'It is true,' he said, 'I must drop that habit in London, and adopt your form of transliteration. The other night I heard them distinctly calling from the gallery: "Charley Arpin! Charley Arpin! Charles Arpin!"' Shaliapin does not speak very willingly about the future of opera, so far as it concerns him personally. It is, however, clearly apparent to those who know him that he is by no means in sympathy with the latest developments in music. Futurism may be very sincere, and even necessary, to a nation like Italy, that has lived so long upon the riches of the past, and feels compelled to make a wild and desperate effort to create a new art; but Russia, which has hardly had time to make art traditions of her own, has not the same urgent need for novelty at any price. With the death of Rimsky-Korsakov, I think, he felt a perceptible slip of the solid musical earth beneath his feet, and that he hardly hopes to find again an opera so wholly congenial to his nature as 'Boris Godounov.' 'If only Moussorgsky were still alive,' he said to me one day, 'what glorious things we might now do together!' Then after a silence consecrated to the glories of the past, Shaliapin, with a smile, said: 'I'll tell you my opinions on the art of the present day in a skazka (tale or parable).'

THE PARABLE OF MODERN ART.

It happened in Russia (and perhaps also in other lands) that folk whispered through the town how a wonderful showman had arrived the night before with his mechanical dog. Everyone flocked to his entertainment. 'Ladies and gentlemen,' began the showman, 'you see this animal? It is just like a dog: but I made it myself. The most wonderful piece of mechanism in the world!' Then the entertainer told the dog to take three steps forward and three back, which it did. At his command it blinked its eyes, wagged its tail, and, marvel of marvels, yapped aloud! 'Isn't it astounding?' said the audience in pit and stall. 'And when one thinks that it is not a real dog! Extraordinary, incredible, prodigious! By-and-by the audience were all rolling away in cabs, carriages, and motor-cars. As a superb vehicle, full of enthusiasts, dashed down the street it ran over a dog in the bewildering traffic. He gave one shuddering, piteous cry, crept into the gutter, and died there. No one heard or heeded him. He was an ugly cur, and perhaps mangy into the bargain. But he was a real dog. God made him, therefore he was better made than the showman's machine. Yet nobody thought so. 'The world is growing too full of mechanical dogs,' Shaliapin commented regretfully, in his deepest and most vibrant tones.

HEART AND HEAD IN MUSIC.

By ERNEST NEWMAN.

People who believe that in the hour of artistic creation the poet's eye—and presumably also the composer's—is in a fine frenzy rolling, must have been considerably shocked by a recent declaration of Richard Strauss, à propos of his 'Joseph': 'I work very coolly, without agitation, without emotion even. One has to be thoroughly master of oneself to regulate that changing, moving, flowing chess-board—orchestration. The head that composed "Tristan" must have been as cold as marble.' This recalls the old controversy as to whether the actor feels, or ought to feel, his part as if it were real, or should merely 'act' it without allowing 'sensibility' to obtrude itself—a controversy made famous by Diderot, though he was by no means the beginner of it. Diderot's thesis, as developed in his 'Paradoxe sur le Comédien' (written 1770-73, but not published until 1830), was that the good actor does not become the character he is representing to anything like the extent that the ordinary man would imagine. He knows all the time that he is acting; he never confuses the people around him with the same kind of people in real life, nor does he ever lose the consciousness that the room or the forest in which he is playing his part is not a real room or forest, but merely so many square feet of board with such and such fore-appointed exits and entrances, and so on. Lekain is playing Ninias. After having cut his mother's throat, and while he is giving himself up to the remorse and horror engendered by his act, he sees a diamond that has fallen from an actress's ear. With his foot he pushes it towards the wings for safety—an action implying that Lekain is always conscious that he is Lekain, not Ninias. An actor is killed at the end of scene, and his body left on the boards as the curtain comes down. In his final struggle with the murderer he perceives that if he dies there, then the curtain will drop plump on his corpse; he edges his assailant further up the stage, and does not give up the ghost until he has found a spot where he can die in safety. Will you tell Diderot would say, that this actor has thoroughly identified himself with his part? It is of second- and third-rate actors, he contends, who depend absolutely upon feeling; the first-rate actor creates his illusion in his audience without himself being a victim of the illusion.

Diderot's anti-emotionalist theory, as it has been called, seems to have been in part a revolt against a previous emotionalist theory that had been pushed to absurd extremes. Rémond de Saint-Albine, for example, lays it down in his treatise on 'Le Comédien' (1747) that 'Gaiety absolutely necessary to comedians, whose business it is to make us laugh'; 'no one who has not an exalted soul of his own can represent a hero, and 'only persons born to love ought to have the privilege of playing lovers' parts.' Each of the two schools can claim plenty of adherents at the present day; but most people who have given a thought to the subject regard it as settled. Mr. William Archer in his brilliant and searching examination of Diderot's thesis, 'Masks or Faces? A study in the psychology of acting' (1888), Mr. Archer supported some clever à priori reasoning by the stories told of the great actors of the past, and by the reports given by leading actors to a comprehensive interrogatory that he addressed to them. And the result, as might have been expected, was to strike a balance between the two extremes; against the anti-emotionalists it can be proved that actors do feel the emotions of the characters they represent to the extent of being moved not only to tears but even to blushes and to pallor; while the emotionalists have the comfort of knowing that whatever emotion the player feels must be held in mastery by him, and played upon as if it were an instrument. The French actor Lambert père summed it all up in a phrase about the necessity of keeping the heart warm and the head cool. It is not an absolutely exhaustive summary, as a piece of shorthand it may serve.

It is some such process as this, presumably, that Strauss had in mind when he talked of 'working coolly,' and of Wagner's head being 'cold as marble' when he was writing 'Tristan.' But there is a touch of exaggeration in his way of expressing it, as indeed there is in Lambert's. It is impossible to separate head and heart in this matter. Coolness there must undoubtedly be; but it is a relative coolness—something comparatively short of the temperature of marble. Calculation certainly is not, but rather an unconscious, a swiftly-acting sense of proportion, and therefore much a function of the artistic imagination as the conception of the emotion itself. Several actors and actresses told Mr. Archer that the much more strongly affected by the tragedy of dramatic character in their private studies than the stage, or at all events that unbidden tears would flow and unbidden sobs would rise more easily in the study. This means that the mere use of being on the stage and having to convey emotion to the audience in all its fullness yet without inartistic over-fullness caused the actor to exercise a certain restraint upon himself. Tears and sobs that would cause him to lose command of his voice and deprive him of full control over his muscles in general would spoil his performance as a work of art. These excessive manifestations of grief would be natural enough in real life; on the stage they would mar that harmony of effect that differentiates the premeditated and bearable workings and catastrophes of art from the unpremeditated and intolerable ones of life. However deeply the actor may feel for the character he is representing, he has always to remember that there are certain things a character could naturally do in real life that he must not do on the stage. As Mr. Archer puts it, 'the mere sight of the footlights tends to beget a "temperance" on which Hamlet insists' (in his address to the players).

This control of an emotion by the semi-conscious, and the regulation of the emotion by technique, are the two formulæ for all artistic creation. I have always thought it a pity that neither Diderot nor Mr. Archer carried the inquiry beyond the limit of acting into that of dramatic singing. The result of such an inquiry would have been to strengthen the case for the 'anti-emotionalists'; the singer has to take even more care than the actor that he does not lose himself too completely in his part: he has to keep always on hand a considerable stock of what we may call secondary consciousness—the consciousness of Lekain as an actor, not as Ninias, and of the scene as a stage setting, not a piece of real life, that allowed him to recognise the diamond as belonging to the actress, not the fictitious character, and to take the prompt measures for ensuring its safety. Not only has the singer, like the actor, to guard against emotion becoming so overpowering as to affect his voice, but he has constantly to watch that he does not let dramatic passion distort his mouth in any way as to spoil his tone-production; and of course throughout the evening he has to keep a very considerable portion of his consciousness engaged from the character he is representing, as to make sure of taking up all his vocal cues at the right moment, striking awkward intervals correctly, and so on. The thought 'I am Tristan,' 'I am Wotan,' must be dogged from first to last; the thought 'I am a tenor; I am a bass; I must not only act well, but sing well; I must deploy confidently the notes on which I am sure of my performance; I must skilfully manipulate the notes of which I am not so sure.' Here again, then, we meet with the apparent paradox that the great dramatic actor can only convey the feeling of warmth to his audience by possessing in himself an extraordinary degree of coolness.

Nor can anyone doubt that it is so with the composer. Even in the writing of the smallest work there must be a certain amount of detachment on the composer's part from the emotion of it,—a certain cool, objective selection, rejection, and arrangement of material; while in works on a large scale there must be an enormous amount of this detachment. The artist may be a somnambulist, but he is a calculating somnambulist. The difference between the great artist and the little one is that the calculation itself is inspired, as well as the idea or the emotion. In one of his letters to Frau von Meck, Tchaikovsky has an interesting passage on his own method of writing. The germ of the work comes, he says, suddenly and unexpectedly. 'If the soil is ready—that is to say, if the disposition for work is there—it takes root with extraordinary force and rapidity, shoots up through the earth, puts forth branches, leaves, and, finally, blossoms.' His somnambulistic dream is broken in upon by domestic and other disturbances. 'Dreadful, indeed, are such interruptions. Sometimes they break the thread of inspiration for a considerable time, so that I have to seek it again—often in vain. In such cases cool head-work and technical knowledge have to come to my aid. Even in the works of the greatest masters we find such moments, when the organic sequence fails and a skilful join has to be made, so that the parts appear as a completely welded whole. But it cannot be avoided. If that condition of mind and soul which we call inspiration lasted long without intermission, no artist could survive it. The strings would break, and the instrument be shattered into fragments.' Once more we find the emotion being coolly and consciously manipulated by the artist. Without this double consciousness there can be no art.

One remark of Tchaikovsky's is open to misunderstanding. He admits that sometimes, when the 'inspiration' has lost a little of its heaven-guided urgency, the composer atones for the lack of it by making use of 'head-work.' It may be true, also, that a few of the bald patches in the works of the great masters are due to some process of this kind. But as a rule the mechanically-made passages in the really big men are the result of their having to fill a traditional form in a traditional rather than a personal way. The awkward moment of this order in the sonata and symphony is the commencement of the 'working-out' section. Brahms generally becomes mechanical here, as does even Beethoven now and then. This sort of writing may well be styled 'head-work' in a disparaging sense. But it must be remembered that no artist who ever lived, no artist whom we could imagine, could keep 'inspiration' going continuously from the first bar of a big work to the last. The composition of a 'Tristan' is necessarily the work of many months, perhaps years. The composer must often have to lay down his pen in the middle of a piece of emotional development, and take it up again after an interval of several days or weeks. How does he re-establish the connection here: how does he set the emotional engine steaming on again from the very point at which it had stopped, and at the same pace as before? Obviously by a sort of 'head-work,' though not precisely of the kind that Tchaikovsky means. The composer on these occasions must sit down at his desk in comparatively cold blood; but the mere act of setting his brain to work coolly soon generates the needed heat. He has to do, in fact, what the actor has to do—learn the art of 'striking twelve at once,' transporting himself into the skin of a character in the brief interval between leaving his dressing room and making his entry on the stage. Some actors have more capacity for this than others. 'It is reported of Kean and of Rachel,' says Mr. Archer, 'that they would at one moment be laughing and joking behind the scenes, and at the next moment, on the stage, raving with Lear or writhing with Phèdre.' Other actors have to induce the requisite auto-suggestion by more or less artificial means. 'Macready, as Shylock, used to shake a ladder violently before going on for the scene with Tubal, in order to get up to the proper state of white heat'; others have been known to work themselves into the proper fury for an agitated stage scene by insulting and cursing the 'hands' in the wings. A third class of actor can apparently never induce the desired state, do what he will. Have we not here the true parallel, which Tchaikovsky missed, with the 'head-work' or 'heart-work' of the composer? The poorest sort of musician can never develop auto-suggestion, and his music remains cold,—either cleverly cold or stupidly cold. Others,—or perhaps the same composer at different times—can pick up in a moment an emotional thread that has been dropped days before, or can find the thread by dint of a few moments' tentative work at their desk. And it is here that technique—in itself a cold-blooded matter—helps the composer to generate emotional heat, providing of course he has any to generate. Technique makes a clear road along which the impulses of the brain can realise themselves without let or hindrance. Many a good actor suffers agonies from nervousness for hours before the performance begins, but is at his ease in a few minutes after he has stepped on the stage; his technique carries him over the first difficulties, and then auto-suggestion comes into play. In the case of compositions that are put aside and taken up again a hundred times before they are finished, there must be a vast amount of cool 'head-work,' as Strauss has said. But, to repeat, as applied to the man of genius, be he composer, poet, actor, or singer, 'coolness' is a relative term. There is more heat in Wagner's marble than in the boiling oil of all the young composers who have enthusiasm without genius.

THE INFLUENCE OF WOMEN ON THE RUSSIAN SCHOOL.

By M. MONTAGU-NATHAN.

The student of Russian music will notice ere researches are far advanced that the development of Russian musical nationalism owes very much to the efforts of women. Financial assistance, technical or artistic aid in the spheres of transcription and interpretation, propaganda work—all have been forthcoming from women whose help, be it not as has been given for no other reason than to advance the cause of the art of music.

We are given to understand that the Empress Elizabeth received a suggestion from her favourite, Rasoumovsky, the uncle of the man immortalised by Beethoven, but we must award her no little personal credit for first instituting a national opera and giving encouragement which bore fruit in the shape of the first Russian musico-dramatic work, Volkov's 'Taniousha.' This monarch seems to have attached no little importance to the influence of music on her courtiers, if we are to believe the statement that those absenting themselves from specified performances of opera were mulcted in a fine of fifty roubles.

The wisdom of Catherine the Great's step in inviting several Italian masters to assist in the uplifting of native art may be open to question, but she is to be credited with having accorded very substantial patronage to Bortniansky 'Russian Palestrina,' who owed to his Queen the training he received from Galuppi. That she was responsible for the book of Sarti's opera 'Oleg'—a thoroughly national subject—is a fairly solid testimony to her enthusiasm.

In the domain of pure propaganda work, on her behalf, that is to say, of the nationalistic school, first honours must surely be awarded to the Countess Mercy-Argenteau, for it would seem as though to her we owe the appearance of Russian opera in England. It was the effort of this Belgian lady that first secured a hearing for certain symphonic and operatic works of Tchaikovsky in her own country and in France, and it seems hardly necessary to insist on the point that but for their presence at the Champs Elysées Theatre last spring the Russian Opera Company would not have been heard at our own Drury Lane.

The circumstances in which the Countess first made the acquaintance of the 'new' Russian school are sufficiently interesting to me to quote.

'In the autumn of 1882,' writes this lady in her monograph on César Cui, 'a young Belgian musician, M. Théodore Jadoul . . . brought me one day M. Napravnik's* "National Dance." We were rather struck with the flavour of the pieces, and M. Jadoul wrote to the composer director in order to gain particulars as to his other works, and respecting contemporary Russian masters. M. Napravnik's reply we found the require-formation in regard to his own works; but so far as concerned Russian composers he gave us to understand that he only knew of one whose talents were really remarkable—M. Tchaikovsky. We studied through several works of MM. Napravnik and Tchaikovsky; those of the first-named, the product of a worthy conductor, were not such as to strengthen our earlier impression, that formed by his "Dances." . . . As for the second, monotonous plaintiveness and effeminate grace most invariably left us cold. . . . But the latter did not end there. M. Jadoul was able afterwards to submit Borodin's symphonic sketch of the 'Steppes,' and a work for pianoforte by Cui. Deeply impressed with these, the Countess turned to the latter composer, who sent her a brochure 'Music in Russia,' in which she found that the prophet of the 'Five' had engaged Messrs. Napravnik and Tchaikovsky to the background. With subsequent discoveries her enthusiasm increased, and after learning the Russian tongue she made translations of three of his operas, Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Pskovitanka,' 'Snegourochka,' some fragments of Borodin's 'Prince Igor,' and a number of songs. Her visits to Russia at a later date brought her into personal contact with these musicians as well as with their friends. Her efforts on behalf of the new Russian school were gracefully acknowledged by Cui and Borodin, both of whom dedicated works to her. A fitting place under the heading of interpretative assistance must be given to the sisters Pourgold, one of whom became the wife of Rimsky-Korsakov. In M. Calvocoressi's delightful biography of Moussorgsky, we learn that this lady, Nadejda Pourgold, presided at the pianoforte at the formal gatherings devoted to the performance of 'The Match-maker,' of which but one Act was completed—the composer himself taking charge of the rôle, and Dargomizsky, who was mightily amused with a work which so closely imitated the picture of the 'Stone Guest,' another. Reference to the letters of Tchaikovsky affords evidence of the esteem in which she was held by other musicians than her husband. In 1871, Balakirev, giving advice to Tchaikovsky with reference to 'Romeo and Juliet' Overture, criticises 'those attenuated chords in the very last bars . . . Nadejda Nicholaevna has scratched out these chords,' he continues, 'with her own fair hands, and wants to make the pianoforte arrangement end in missimo.' The composer seems to have viewed this modification with favour.

In the same interesting volume may be read Tchaikovsky's account of how 'the whole party joyfully tore me to pieces' on the occasion of his conducting of the Malo-Russian Symphony at Rimsky-Korsakov's house, how Madame Korsakov explored him to arrange the Finale for four hands, and how (as projected in a letter to Stassov) she entrusted this work to Madame herself. In Habet's work on Borodin we are told how the composer thought fit to dedicate his first string quartet to Nadejda Nicholaevna—a tribute acknowledged later on by her work in assisting with the pianoforte reduction of the posthumous 'Prince Igor' and it does not surprise us at all to find her husband inscribing her name on the title-page of one of his operas.

As to her sister, Alexandra, a distinguished pupil of Dargomizsky, we are again indebted to M. Calvocoressi, who brings to light her share in the 'scratch' performances of the early version of 'Boris Godounov,' in which the feminine rôles—they were exceedingly slight—were rendered by her, and it is to this gifted exponent that many of the charming songs with which the 'Five' have enriched the Russian vocal treasury owe their first introduction.

This is a fitting moment to render homage to another vocal artist whose virtues can best be sung by mention of the circumstance that it was she, Madame Ohlenin d'Alheim, who not only gave the first performance at Paris of Moussorgsky's cycles 'Songs and dances of Death' and 'Without Sunlight,' but actually introduced them to Russia! Writing on the subject of the recital at Moscow, January 23, 1902, Simon Krouglikov, the Muscovite upholder of nationalism, thus expresses himself: 'I had always considered this work ["Without Sunlight"] as Moussorgsky's weakest. But I have learned otherwise. We have been waiting for an artistic interpretation . . . We are no longer without sunlight when such a talent illumines us.'

All the musical world knows what Madame von Meck did for Tchaikovsky, and some of us, like Balakirev, are inclined to the opinion that the payment made by this lady to secure a certain performance of the fourth Symphony was an act which may be considered as a misinterpretation of the function of patronage.

The Amazonian feats of Madame Eugenie Linev, who has shouldered her gramophone and shown how folk-songs are sung by tramping in out-of-the-way spots and taking down tunes from the lips of the peasant by means of the only efficient though somewhat weighty medium, have found a monument in her volumes, 'The peasant songs of Russia,' two of which have been done into English, and those who have hitherto relied upon the version presented in a single vocal line with harmonized pianoforte part, will find a pleasant and instructive surprise in perusing Madame Linev's work.

Apart from the examples mentioned, there are other cases of a different nature which may be cited to contribute to our list of feminine influences on the music of Russia. M. d'Alheim, in his work on Moussorgsky, devotes a little essay to a discussion of the Russian niania (nurse), a functionary with certain distinctive traits peculiar to the Russian variety. Springing from the soil and often born in slavery they were capable of an affection for their charges which could hardly be better described than by the narrative of the veteran Prince Kropotkin, who relates an incident which shows us clearly how devoted are Russian servants to their young masters. In earliest childhood, the germ of that vivid imagination, as well as his love of folk-lore, was instilled into the mind of the young Moussorgsky by his niania, and those acquainted with the songs forming the 'Nursery' cycle will hardly deny that his nurse must have exerted a subtle yet powerful influence upon the master's child-mind. It is interesting to note that Pushkin was similarly indebted. Moussorgsky, too, had a very strong affection for his mother, to whom he dedicated two of his works.

Madame Chestakov, the sister of Glinka and editor of his 'Memoirs,' filled a gap in the life of the Father of the Russian school caused by his wife's flighty and unsympathetic nature. She is also to be observed after his death in more or less close touch with the Koutchka.

It seems apposite before concluding this chronicle to recall that it fell to Borodin himself, a devoted husband, and 'father' of several adopted daughters, to make on behalf of Russian musicians a signal return for benefits received from womankind. It was he who founded the Petersburg School of Medicine for Women, a service which its students commemorated at the time of his death with a funeral wreath.

And in conclusion will it suffice to say that but for Mrs. Rosa Newmarch, whose gifts are so vividly reflected in her services to Russian music, literature, and art, this paper and many another could never have been written?

Occasional Notes.

As our advertisement columns indicate (see p. 429), applications from AN IMPORTANT Australasia, England, and the POST VACANT. tinent are being invited for the post of Director of the Conservatoire of Music at Sydney, a new institution under the control of the Minister of Education. The post carries a salary of £1,250, and is therefore likely to be eagerly sought for. We earnestly hope that the successful candidate will be an Englishman, and one well acquainted with educational conditions and processes. Such an appointment, we are sure, would give the greatest satisfaction both here and in the colony.

For the second time Mr. Josef MR. HOLBROOKE'S Holbrooke is to be congratulated 'DYLAN.' on the production of a grand opera. It will be remembered that his opera 'The children of Don' was given during Mr. Hammerstein's tenure of the London Opera House. It was not a lasting success, but drew the attention of the public to Mr. Holbrooke's fertility, facility, and resource as an orchestral writer. We now hear that Sir Joseph Beecham will shortly produce 'Dylan,' the second part of the trilogy that opens with 'The children of Don.' At the time of writing rehearsals are in progress, but no information is to hand as to the cast and conductor.

In 'Dylan, son of the wave,' we are still concerned with the three children of Don—Gwydion, Govannion, and Elan. The first part of the trilogy closes with Gwydion in ascendancy over Govannion, and young Dylan, the son of Elan, declared Gwydion's heir and successor. Dylan's father was Lyd, the sea-king, and the boy grows up amphibious, being as much at home swimming in the sea as walking on dry land. He delights in wild nature—the waves (who call him brother), the winds and the sea-fowl are his companion. Between the two operas he grows up alone, ignorant of his parentage. In the opening scene of 'Dylan' comes to Govannion and Elan, and strangely moves his mother with a song of praise to sea and wind. Govannion recognizes the young minstrel as his nephew, whom he hates for his coming power. He follows Dylan out and ruthlessly murders him. The sea-fowl watch the deed and track Govannion; he flees for refuge. They then come to the sea-king, whom they proclaim the murderer and the murderer brings news that Govannion is with Seithenin, guardian of the dykes for a king or lord named Gwyddn. Lyd invokes vengeance upon Govannion for the murder of his son, and summons all his furious tempests to overwhelm the murderer, who has added insult to injury by hiding upon land reclaimed from the sea-king's dominions. In the final scene sea and storm have burst the dykes, Govannion vainly cries for admittance into Gwyddn's castle, and perishes. The music has long been available in the form of a pianoforte score. A glance through it shows that Mr. Holbrooke has fitted apt music to this stern and wild subject. A large part of the score is occupied in rugged nature-description of the kind that Mr. Holbrooke can conceive with great power. Wave, wind, and sea-fowl are made characters in the drama, and some striking, elaborate choruses fall to the share. Those who have heard the Overture 'Dylan' will remember the splendid passage descriptive of the whirlings of the sea-birds. The subject of 'Dylan' is well suited to Mr. Holbrooke's gifts, and we hope to be able to speak highly of his music and its performance.

Two examples of munificence and generosity to the cause of music have to be placed on record. The late Mr. Samuel Heilbut, who died in April, has bequeathed £15,000 to the City Corporation for the advancement of musical education in connection with the Guildhall School of Music by the establishment of one or more Samuel Heilbut Scholarships for students of that School 'for proficiency in music, and in particular for the possession of the best-trained tenor voices, that is to say, tenor voices which shall best combine natural excellence with excellence derived from training.'

A few days after this announcement was made we learned that an anonymous donor had agreed to guarantee the sum of £3,000 per annum to the University College of Wales, Aberystwyth, for fifty years, to enable the College to found a school of instrumental music.

At the Court held at Buckingham Palace on June 11 Herr Gottlieb's Viennese Orchestra was in attendance and played the following selections of music:

March 'Eldorado' Richter
Overture 'Fingal's Cave' Mendelssohn
Waltz 'Kaiser Walzer' Strauss
Slavonic Dances 'Sylvia' Dvorák
Ballet Music 'Sylvia' Delibes
Song 'Mon Cœur s'ouvre à ta voix' Saint-Saëns Selection 'Fledermaus' Strauss
Waltz 'Night of love' Lincke
'Chant Élégiague' 'Joseph and his brethren' Tchaikovsky
Suite 'In the night' Schmitt
Intermezzo 'Madama Butterfly' Jean Gilbert
Selection 'Ein Albulblatt' Puccini
Morceau 'Im Buntum Rock' Wagner
March Jessel

This programme cannot be described as chauvinistic and it may be very well studied in connection with the article by Mr. Clutsam on 'Commercial music and the native composer' that appeared in our June issue.

MUSICAL NOTATION :

PRACTICAL WAYS OF EXPRESSING
DETAILS OF MUSICAL COMPOSITION.

BY H. ELLIOT BUTTON.

As musical compositions get more complicated, elaborate, and difficult of execution, it is increasingly incumbent upon the composer to present his meaning in a form that will help the performer to grasp that meaning with as little trouble as possible.

The object of these articles is to point out to composers, arrangers, and editors, the difficulties often unwittingly placed in the path of executants, and to suggest various means of obviating those difficulties.

PRELIMINARY HINTS.

Strive for clearness and consistency ;

Use no unnecessary or ambiguous signs ;

MS. intended for the printer should be written on one side of the paper only, and clefs and key-signatures should appear at least once on each page ;

Use groups to show beats, and slurs to show phrases ; and conversely

Do not use grouping as a means of showing phrasing, or slurs to show the beats in a bar.

SECTION I.—TIME-SIGNATURES, GROUPING OF NOTES, ETC.

By far the most convenient 'pulse' unit is the crotchet or the dotted crotchet, and the reason for this is not difficult to find. The adoption of this unit obviously gives less trouble to the writer of a manuscript, as a crotchet is more easily written than a minim. It also lends itself to concision in grouping, and can be so used as to keep the time-signature in the mind of the performer. Thus :

Te Deum in E.

CHARLES MACPHERSON.

looks like 6-4, but it is in reality 3-2. This would clearly be shown if written with the crotchet as unit, thus :

Again, the grouping of :

shows the double accent of the 6-8 bar, which is obscured when the dotted-minim-unit is used :

Such passages as :

are much simplified if written thus :

It will at once be seen that the same advantage obtains even to a greater extent in 9-8 and 12-8 time.

A century or so ago some composers wrote slow movements in quaver- or semiquaver-unit time, and fast movements in minim-unit time. In the slow movements this led to very long bars, in which it is extremely difficult to realise the 'beats' at sight. With the crotchet-unit such passages as the following are made far clearer and more easily read :

Slow quaver unit (8-8)

Sonata Pathétique (Op. 13), BEETHOVEN.

Crotchet-unit (4-4)

Fast minim-unit (2-2)

Here it may be contended that, by throwing two bars into one, the composer's intention has been violated. But is this so? Let us examine the result carefully. We find that the strong accent comes only half as often as in the original, that is, on the C's, and that the F's have only the medium accent. Is not this exactly what one's æsthetic sense dictates? And so throughout it will be found that by this method the true rhythm of the movement is made clear. That Beethoven intended this rhythm is conclusively proved by the fact that he added a silent bar at the end. When written in 4-4 (as in the example above), the necessity of this silent bar is at once obvious.

The signs C and C should, I venture to say, never be used. C has been made to represent 8-8 (as in the above example), 4-4, and 4-2, and C to show 2-2 and 4-2. It is difficult to see why signs so ambiguous have not been abandoned long ago, as the figure time-signatures are so perfectly clear in their meaning.

Care should be taken to group notes in such a manner as plainly to show the half-bar in 4-4 or 6-8 :

becomes more distinct when written thus :

because the bar is divided into its two halves :

Notes on a weak accent should never be dotted across a stronger accent. Two examples will suffice to show the advantage of using tied, instead of dotted, notes in such instances :

should be written thus :

Adagio, VI. II.

Quartet in A minor (Op. 132), BEETHOVEN

Should be written thus :

The advantage of this grouping is still more plainly shown when :

written :

where the accent and the whole character of the music become clear.

Such care in notation is particularly necessary when writing in compound time and with complicated cross rhythms.

When groups such as  occur now and then, intermingled with groups of  it is as well to emphasise the difference by dividing the former into beats. For instance :

&c.

could be more clearly expressed thus :

Similar splitting up of groups is also advisable when a scale-passage there are repeated notes. It tends to attract the eye to the fact that the scale-passage is not continuous. Compare, e.g. :

with :

In examples more complicated than the extremely simple ones given above, the advantage to be gained by careful division into groups is still more striking.

Where there are long groups of demisemiquavers, or shorter notes, their exact position as regards time can be made clear at a glance by a judicious splitting up into shorter groups.

The following passage from Basil Harwood's On May Morning :

is shown broken up into crotchet groups, quaver groups, and semiquaver groups. Note that only one line is needed at * and * because it connects quaver groups, whereas two lines are needed at † to connect semiquaver groups. But how extremely difficult to read would this passage have been if printed thus :

It is perhaps hardly necessary to say that plain notes and dotted notes should never be written on the same stem. When any difficulty occurs in giving the two notes separate stems it can usually be overcome by exercising a little ingenuity. The following phrase :

could be expressed with advantage in this way :

The beats can also be shown more clearly by a consistent use of rests; but these will be dealt with in a later section.

As an example of how simple passages may be made to look difficult by clumsy (but mathematically accurate) notation, the following may prove of interest :

"Penillion Song," (Welsh Melody.)

should have been written :

and

should be :

We now come to the question of the best system of notating such groups as triplets, duplets, &c. There would seem to be no recognised rule concerning these, but it is evident that readers of music would have reason to be grateful if publishers would only combine to adopt some logical, easily grasped plan. The simplest way of dealing with the matter is to remember that the dotted crotchet stands for the crotchet—that for all practical purposes these are equal. Such a passage as :

is exactly the same in effect as :

and the latter method of writing (the dotted crotchet-unit instead of the crotchet-unit) is adopted because it saves the use of the sign , and simplifies notation. Note here that a bracket, and not a slur, is used with the triplet-indicating figure 3 (see hint, 'Never use slurs to show beats'). No bracket, however, is necessary if the notes are bound as follows :

If, then, we want to write two notes of time value equal to the three quavers we express them thus :

still using quavers, and not crotchets, because two quavers are equal to the unit (♫). Similarly, if in writing 2-4 time we crush three notes into the space of two quavers we again use quavers :

as three quavers are equal to the unit (♫); but if we want to crush more notes into the unit value, we must always choose notes whose sum (without bracket and figure) exceeds the time of the note whose value they represent. The following tab will make this quite clear :

The excerpt from Beethoven's Choral Symphony quoted below as a crucial example of the advantage derived from using the crotchet- or dotted-crotchet unit, will form a fitting conclusion to this section :

Symphony No. 9 (Op. 125), BEETHOVEN.

Let this now be notated with the dotted-crotchet as the unit, and the composer's intentions are sharply silhouetted:

The rhythm is here made apparent; many accidentals are found to be redundant and are therefore eliminated; the fast single beat in a bar, difficult to follow and awkward in execution, is replaced by three (or four) ordinary beats; and lastly the necessity for Ritmo di, &c., is entirely avoided, and execution difficulties are considerably reduced.

Indeed, there can be little or no doubt that with very few exceptions the crotchet- or dotted-crotchet unit is the most suitable for all styles of music.

THE MELODIES OF LUTHER'S HYMNS.

By ARCHIBALD W. WILSON.

The chorales are the growth of many centuries. Gradually, during the Middle Ages, German sacred verses—the old Easter Kyrie-songs, translations of Latin hymns, metrical paraphrases of parts of the liturgy, and the Christmas cradle-songs of the Mystery Plays—won their way into the services of the Church. Thus at the German Reformation, a spiritual song in the popular tongue was already in being, a foundation on which the new hymnody might be built. 'I wish,' wrote Luther to his friend, Spalatin, in the year 1524, 'to make German psalms, that is to say, sacred hymns for the people, that the Word of God may dwell among them by means of song also.' He therefore set himself to revise many of the old spiritual songs, giving them a fresh poetic beauty and adapting them to the teaching of the Reformed Church. At the same time he carried on the work of the past in composing new hymns, some of which are translations and some are original. After the revision of the medieval texts came that of the melodies also, the latter often receiving more drastic treatment than the former. The melismata, or groups of notes set to one syllable, which are so characteristic of plain-song melodies, were simplified and the rhythm more clearly defined. In the musical part of his work Luther had the assistance of two eminent musicians, Conrad Rupff and Johann Walther. The latter has been called the 'Asap' or chief musician of the Reformation. He not only had a large share in the work of revising the medieval sacred songs, but also composed or arranged melodies for many of the new hymns. The first collections of texts and melodies—Walther's 'Gesangbuch' and the Erfurt Enchiridion*—were published in the year 1524.* Walther's hymn-book, of which only the separate parts were printed, was intended not for the congregation but for the trained choir. The melodies in the tenor, and serve as canti fermi in polyphonic settings of four or five parts. In the Enchiridion, which was meant for home use, the melodies appear in a simpler form. They alone are noted above the text. The melodies, as the early chorale-books have them, are in the old Church modes. Many of them, however, lost their modal characteristics in the 16th century, when modern tonality became established. Bach, in his chorale-preludes on 'Nun komm der Heiden Heiland,' uses both forms of the melody—one modal, the other in the minor key. Luther himself has defined his position with regard to the worship of the melodies. To Rupff and Walther, whom he summoned to Wittenberg as his guests, he said, 'You gentlemen understand your musica and your texts admirably: but as to what spirituality is and the word of God, on that point I think that I too may say a little word in.'

The composition of the polyphonic settings was left to the musicians. Luther concerned himself with the moulding of the melodies into the simple form which is found in the Enchiridion. Köstlin, in his essay on Luther as the father of the Evangelical church-song, depicts the three men at work: 'While Rupff and Walther,' he says, 'sat at the table with their music-books, Luther paced up and down trying over the tunes on his flute until he had established the melody in a rhythmically complete, well-rounded, strongly individual whole.'

The following melodies of hymns, the texts of which Luther arranged or composed, are found in Bach's chorale-preludes for the organ:

(A.) THE OLD MELODIES.

(1.) 'Christ lag in Todesbanden' ('Christ lay in the bonds of death,' V., No. 3; VI., Nos. 15 and 16†) Luther founded the text and Walther the melody on the basis of the old Easter hymn 'Christ ist erstanden' ('Christ is risen,' V., No. 4), which dates from the 12th century. The chorale‡ bears in the Erfurt Enchiridion the title 'Christ ist erstanden gebessert (improved).' Walther made two versions of the old melody. The second one—that of the Enchiridion—on fell out of use.

(2.) 'Nun komm der Heiden Heiland' ('Now come, Saviour of the Gentiles,' V., Nos. 42 and 43; VI., Nos. 45, 46 and 47). Both text and melody—one certainly, the other perhaps, the work of Luther—are based on the Latin hymn 'Veni redemptor Gentium.' Luther had acquired an intimate knowledge of plainsong in his youth, as a choirboy at Eisenach.

(3.) 'Dies sind die heil'gen zehn Gebot' ('These are the sacred Ten Commandments,' V., No. 12; VI., Nos. 19 and 20). In the Enchiridion the melody is stated to be that of the 13th century pilgrims' song 'In Gottes Namen fahren wir' ('In God's name go we forth'), which was sung before the battle of Assenbühl in the year 1298. As the editor—probably Luther's friend, Justus Jonas—thought it necessary also to print the notes, perhaps the tune was not well known and had undergone some alteration.

* Two Enchiridions were published simultaneously at Erfurt, the one by Trutebül, the other by Maler. The chief difference between them is in the arrangement of the order of the hymns. It is the Trutebül edition to which reference is made in this article.

† In this and each similar case reference is made to Bach's chorale-prelude on the melody. The Roman figures indicate the number of the volume in the Peters edition of Bach's organ works.

‡ The term 'chorale' was not used till later in the century. It is now applied to all the hymns of the Lutheran Church.

(4.) 'Vater unser in Himmelreich' (Luther's poetical version of the Pater noster, V., Nos. 47 and 48; VI., Nos. 52 and 53). Zelle* thinks that the well-known Dorian melody is Walther's adaptation of an old Alpine song.

(5.) 'Jesus Christus, unser Heiland der von uns den Gottes zorn wandt' ('Jesus Christus, our Saviour, who turned from us God's anger,' VI., Nos. 30-33). The chorale in the Erfurt Enchiridion bears the title 'Das Lied Sant Johannes Hus gebessert,' which shows that a translation of Huss's hymn 'Jesus Christus, nostra salus' was previously in use. Zelle thinks that Huss may have formed his melody out of an old Marienlied to which it bears some resemblance. At the Reformation it appears in two forms. That in Walther's hymn-book is probably the original one. For the Enchiridion the melody has been simplified.

(6.) 'Wir glauben all' an einen Gott' ('We all believe in one God,' VII., Nos. 60 and 61). This old Dorian melody, the original of which, set to a Latin paraphrase of the Credo, appears in a Breslau manuscript dated 1417, has undergone many changes. Walther's version was too elaborate for general use.

(7.) 'Gelobet seist du Jesus Christ' ('Praised be Thou, Jesus Christ,' V., Nos. 17 and 18). This beautiful mixolydian melody, which is found in Walther's hymn-book, was already well known at the Reformation. This accounts for the fact that all the Enchiridions which have the text, omit the noting of the melody as unnecessary.

(B.) THE NEW MELODIES.

(1.) 'Ein' feste Burg ist unser Gott' ('A strong tower is our God,' VI., No. 22). The origin of the melody of this famous chorale, which proved such a mighty force in the Reformation, has been the subject of much research and controversy. Bäümker has traced its component phrases to three sources: the Credos of the 'Missa de angelis,' the 'Missa in dupplicibus solemnioribus,' and the 'Missa in dupplicibus.' Köstlin on the other hand points out that Luther's melody differs in some important respects from these plainsong passages. At the end of his criticism of Bäümker's analysis, he adds, 'Could Luther, in fact, so laboriously have collected for his melody these small extracts out of three long Masses and put them together like pieces of mosaic? Let those who wish believe that of him!' Schweitzer, in his 'Life of Bach,' adopts the via media when he says that the melody is 'woven out of Gregorian reminiscences.'

(2.) 'Vom Himmel hoch da komm' ich her' ('From high heaven I come hither,' V., No. 49, and pp. 92-101; VII., Nos. 54 and 55). The chorale is first found in a book entitled 'Geistliche Lieder, aufs new gebessert, zu Wittenberg. Mar. Luth.,' which probably was published in 1528. The melody to which the text is there set is that of a popular riddle-song, 'Ich komm' aus fremden Landen her.' In a few years, however, this melody had to be ejected from the Church, as it still haunted every dancing-booth and every tavern. Its place was taken by the splendid tune—well-known owing to its prominence in Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio'—which has ever since been associated with the text. This appeared first in 1539. Zelle thinks that it may have been composed by Luther. The last line is almost identical with that of 'Ein' feste Burg.'

(3.) 'Aus tiefer Not schrei' ich zu dir' ('Out of deep need I cry to Thee,' VI., Nos. 13 and 14). This fine Phrygian melody, which appears both in Walther's hymn-book and in the Erfurt Enchiridion, is by some thought to be founded on that of a folk-song, 'Meins trauerns ist.' Zelle, however, points out that the resemblance lies only in the first three notes, and considers the chorale melody to be the composition of Walther. It has held a prominent place in organ music from the time of Bach to the present day.

(4) 'Mit Fried' und Freud' ich fahr' dahin' ('With peace and joy I thither fare,' V., No. 14). This beautiful Dorian melody, which was probably composed by Walther, first appeared in the second edition of Maler's Enchiridion, published in 1525. Its original varied rhythm, like that of many other chorale melodies, has in later times been simplified by the equalisation of the note-values.

(5) 'Christ, unser Herr, zum Jordan kam' ('Christ, our Lord, to Jordan came' VI., Nos. 17 and 18). The text and melody were first brought together in Klug's hymn-book, published in 1543, and have been associated ever since. Walther had composed the melody a few years earlier for another of Luther's hymns.

(6) 'Nun freut euch lieben Christen g'mein' ('Rejoice now together, dear Christians,' VII., No. 44).

This melody, which in English hymn-books is set to the hymn 'Great God, what do I see and hear,' is mostly attributed to Luther. More probably, however, as it is written in the secular (Ionian) mode, it came originally from folk-song. It is now more especially associated with the chorale 'Es ist gewisslich an der Zeit.'

Luther died in 1546, and Walther, his friend and colleague, in 1570. Their work is one of the most notable achievements in the history of music. For nearly two centuries after their deaths German poetry and German music were focussed on the chorale. The devotional fervour that glowed in the hymns of Herberger, Rinkart, Franck, and Gerhardt, found expression also in music. New melodies were written, and settings of those already in use were made by nearly all the 17th century masters of polyphony. The chorale was the great spiritual influence which guided the genius of Johann Sebastian Bach. From the chorale is derived 'that almost stern idealism in music which is met with in the creations of the specifically German composers, from Prætorius Heinrich Schütz, and Bach, to Johannes Brahms.'

* 'Christ lag in Todesbanden' (from WALTHER'S Gesangbuch. 1524).

'Aus tiefer Not' (from the Erfurt Enchiridion. 1524).

'Ein feste Burg' (from the Erfurt Gesangbuch. 1531).

'Mit Fried' und Freud' ich fahr' dahin' (from Bach's Church Cantata).

* The G clef is here used instead of the C clef of the original notation.

SIR ISIDORE GEORGE HENSCHEL.

It is a pleasure to record the conferring of a knighthood on the distinguished musician we have known so long as Dr. Henschel. No other artist in this country has earned a deeper respect for his wide attainments, especially as a singer. No doubt the fact that Sir George Henschel recently decided to retire from the concert-platform stimulated the powers-that-be who advise His Majesty King George in these matters, to take this opportunity of publicly recognising his long and devoted services to musical art in this country. In our issue for March, 1900, we gave a full sketch of the career of this accomplished composer, conductor, pianist, and singer. We need now only refer to the chief incidents of his very active life.

Isidore Georg (to adopt the original spelling Henschel was born at Breslau, on February 18, 1850. In 1862 he appeared as a pianist at Berlin, and when he was only sixteen he appeared as a bass singer at Hirschberg. He entered the Leipsic Conservatorium 1867, and while still a student he appeared as Hans Sachs in the production of 'Die Meistersinger' in Munich in 1868. In 1870 he joined the Royal conservatorium at Berlin, and in 1875 he sang the bass solos in Bach's 'Passion' music, under Brahms. He first appeared in England at a 'Monday Popular' concert, on February 19, 1877, and at once made a great reputation as a Lieder-singer. In 1881 he married Lillian Bailey, an American soprano, and in the same year he became the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a post he held for three years. In 1884 he returned to England, and in 1886 he was appointed to succeed Madame Lind-Goldschmidt as a professor of singing at the Royal College of Music. He then established the 'London Symphony Concerts,' which were maintained for eleven years. In 1890 he became a naturalised British subject, and from 1893 to 1895 he conducted the Scottish Orchestra. In 1894 his 'Stabat Mater' for soli, chorus, and orchestra was performed at the Birmingham Festival. A 'Requiem' (Op. 59) has been performed in many musical centres. His opera 'Nubia' was produced at Dresden in 1899. Mrs. Lillian Henschel died on November 4, 1901, and a few years later Sir George married his present wife (Amy Louis).

The following is the full programme of the farewell vocal recital he gave at the Bechstein Hall, London, on April 29 of this year :

(a) Aria from 'Rinaldo'	Handel
(b) Osmin's Song from 'Il Seraglio'	Mozart
(c) Crugantino's Song from Goethe's 'Claudine von Villa Bella' (1790)	Beethoven
(a) Der zürnende Barde	Schubert
(b) Lachen und Weinen
(c) Eifersucht und Stolz
(d) 'Dass der Ostwind Dülfe'
(e) Der Doppelgänger	Schumann
(f) Der Schmetterling
(a) Husaren-Abzug
(b) Two Venetian Boat-Songs
(c) Der Asra	Rubinstein
(d) Wie viele Zeit verlor ich	Hugo Wolf
(e) Am wilden Klippenstrande	Henschel

(g) Am grünen See von Nemi
Ballad—'Archibald Douglas'	Loewe

* Sir George Henschel's first song before an English audience, St. James's Hall, London, February 19, 1877.

A consummate artist in song, his absence from the concert-platform is a matter for regret. But it is gratifying to know that Sir George will continue to devote himself to teaching, and thus, it may be hoped, convey to another generation the fine traditions of style, technique, and interpretation he has created.

ARMY DIRECTORS OF MUSIC :

A NEW ARMY ORDER.

An Army Order recently issued provides for the appointment of directors of music. The conditions are as follows: 'A bandmaster under the age of fifty-five may be granted a commission as Director of Music with the honorary rank of lieutenant. On being so promoted he shall receive the same rates of regimental pay and allowances as a quartermaster of the regiment or corps to which he is gazetted. He shall retire from the Army at the age of sixty-five.'

This new Order-in-Council relating to Army Directors of Music (formerly bandmasters) is not to be confounded with any former regulation, in which Directors of Music are appointed to the Navy or Army Schools of Music at Eastney and Kneller Hall. It is entirely a new thing, a landmark in the history of British military bands. A few words on that history may not be unacceptable. There cannot be much to say, as it is only a mushroom subject.

Take away the valved instruments from any military band of to-day, and what remains! Nothing but a combination such as one reads of as forming the mediæval 'waits' or town bands. Yet of such was the military band of considerably less than a hundred years ago. The 'bandmaster' of the time was simply the chief musician, and was considered to be well rewarded for his services by the pay and rank of a sergeant. Then in the early days of Queen Victoria the inventions of Sax came into vogue. The potency of music as allied to warfare had already been insisted upon in the armies of Frederick the Great and of Napoleon, and the modern military band came into existence. For many years it was the fashion in England to employ a German bandmaster (a matter in which only the officers were concerned; they engaged and paid whom they liked). He was employed in addition to the old band-sergeant, who remained in disciplinary control, whilst the German or other 'bandmaster' was a civilian and looked after the æsthetic, musical side.

The march and spread of musical education in England in the latter half of the last century brought this state of things to an end. The British-made bandmaster proved himself quite equal to his foreign confrère musically, whilst he had the additional advantage of being eligible to take command in a military guise; so the offices of the ancient bandmaster-sergeant (so to speak) and the modern (civilian) bandmaster were merged in the Kneller Hall bandmaster. As was to be expected the 'new man' had a rough time of it, at first. Officers (the purchase system has only just been abolished) were dead against it, but as the saving of cost was great and undeniable, they had no 'case' and the home-made article won in the end. The promotion of Lieut. Dan Godfrey, in the Grenadier Guards, on the occasion of Queen Victoria's Jubilee, was a matter both of personal regard and as a compliment to the then senior bandmaster. It was not made the subject of an Order-in-Council, nor did it alter the regulations, and the retirement of Mr. Godfrey brought its end. But fifteen years ago a distinct advance was made by an order providing for a bona-fide commission to be granted to one bandmaster in each establishment—the Marines, the Guards, and the Artillery, the recipients being George Miller, Charles Godfrey, and Ladislau Zavertal, respectively. This was subsequently varied and slightly extended. The order was hailed with delight by bandmasters as a body, who all looked on it as the dawning of a fuller recognition of expert services which were growing beyond the measure of the rank and pay of a warrant officer. And the new order in creating the rank 'Director of Music,' and ordaining that it shall be that of an officer, is regarded as a further improvement. Hitherto a bandmaster on promotion to the direction of the Naval or the Military School of Music had to become a quartermaster, while a bandmaster who was promoted as a bandmaster had to become an executive officer. Now neither quartermaster nor executive officer (since the latter admitted of no possibility of promotion) exactly suited the case. Hence the pre-eminent workableness of the new order.

The next thing to hope for is that the number of commissioned bandmasters—that is, 'Directors of Music'—will be extended. The progressive promotion provided is a distinct encouragement, and the gradation of all bandmasters is a point which might well be considered as providing a further incentive. In the German service there are no commissioned bandmasters, and yet there are about six different grades, each most zealously guarded and suitably honoured.

Church and Organ Music.

THE COMPLEAT ORGANIST.

BY HARVEY GRACE.

VIII.—OF OLD ENGLISH ORGAN MUSIC.

Wishing to look up a point connected with English organ music, I recently took down Dr. Walker's 'History of music in England,' feeling sure that so popular an instrument and its composers would be adequately dealt with therein.

The index, however, while referring me to viols, virginals, and lute, was dumb as to the organ, and search through the volume brought no greater haul than a few passing and disparaging comments on organ music. Reference to the volume of lectures delivered at the Tercentenary of the Worshipful Company of Musicians, and published under the title 'English music (1604-1904),' brought me little more. The lecturers, among whom were occupants of august organ-lofts, dealt with the pianoforte, the water-organ of the ancients and the organ of to-day, old English songs, dances, string and wind instruments and their composers, and operas; but on the subject of organ music a decent silence was maintained. Even the lecture on the cathedral composers and their works contained no reference to their organ compositions. The one ewe lamb of organ music was provided at the lecture on 'Music in England in 1604,' when amongst the illustrations was played a little organ prelude by Coperario—a gentleman who, having studied in Italy for a space, ever after so miscalled himself, regarding it as an improvement on the rude and homely Cooper he was born. And yet between 1604 and 1904 some more than passable English organ music had been produced, though the most ardent patriot among us must admit that until recent years our instrumental output was not on the same level of excellence as our choral works. Our shortcomings in the matter of organ music in particular were due to a variety of circumstances. In the first place, the instrument bore a much more important part in the Roman and Lutheran services than in the English. Then the pedal organ was some three hundred years arriving hither from the Continent. Add to this the fact of our being about a century late in adopting equal temperament, and it is easy to understand why English organ music was so much behind that of the Continent,—how much behind can easily be seen by a glance at the works of some of the earlier Italian composers and some of the pre-Bach men in Germany.

Putting aside Buxtehude as the outstanding figure before Bach came on the scene, there were such remarkable men as Scheidt, Froberger, Hanff, Weckmann, and others, much of whose music is to-day almost as vital as that of Bach. When we consider how our Blows and Purcells were writing for manuals only, often with an eye to harpsichord performance as well, and then look at these opening and closing bars of a piece of German organ music written by one Franz Tunder, born in 1614—nearly a half-century before Purcell—we can see at a glance our handicap:

Ex. 1. Variations on 'Jesus Christus unser Heiland,'

Ped.

To the practical drawbacks mentioned above must be added the fact that our genius had always been vocal rather than instrumental. The very excellence of our polyphonic composers' choral-writing was against our instrumental progress. Men who were giants in vocal music came down with a run to some times less than ordinary stature when composing for instruments. The obsession of Handel, with his matchless choral technique and his sketchy instrumental methods, was a further blow from which we have only recently recovered.

But because we have produced no Bach or Rheinberger we need not therefore unduly belittle ourselves. The work of our early organ composers in spite of the drawbacks under which they laboured was often astonishingly good. Such men as Gibbons, Blow, and Lock were far too great to be entirely overcome by the deficiencies of the instruments of their day; so that, while we have never had any considerable bulk of good native organ music, we have always had some of which we need not be ashamed.

The flame has burned more or less steadily since the 16th century, flickering ominously at times (with occasional spurts when a Wesley came on the scene), but to-day a fire at which we may look with pride and even more hope. It needs but an increased desire on the part of our players to warm themselves thereat for the future to be wholly bright. This prejudice against the native composer is of course not confined to the organ loft, but it has always been no less strong there than elsewhere, and this also has been against English organ music. Hardly yet is the day past when for an Englishman to compose serious organ music is to invite the neglect of his colleagues who will cheerfully spend perspiring, shin-aching hours on a difficult foreign work or a complicated orchestral disarrangement. In such doings, however, so far from being daring innovators, they merely follow the custom of the 'good old times.' Drifting on a day into the office of Walker & Sons, the organ-builders I saw hung on the wall the programme of a recital given in the factory on March 27, 1848, 'at half-past two o'clock precisely,' by Thomas Adams. Now Adams, as we all know, was not only a fine player, was not he known as 'the Thalberg of the organ'? but a notable composer as well. One might have expected him to include a fair quantity of real organ music in his programme. Here, however, is his selection, and it needs but the substitution of Wagner and Tchaikovsky for Haydn and Handel, and the inclusion of some light organ pieces in place of three of the improvisations, to make it a typical programme for certain of our modern recitalists:

In regard to the extemporaneous numbers, I learn from the eldest Miss Walker—an organ pupil of hers, and now in her eighty-sixth year—that Adams, instead of practising before a recital, made use of his improvisations for the purpose of becoming acquainted with the details of the instrument. This explains the presence of four such items.

On behalf of the players of the last generation, it could be said that their neglect of English organ music was due largely to the fact that most of the older works existed only in manuscript, scattered about organ lofts and museums, while much of the later organ music was included in harpsichord books, being then written indifferently for either instrument. It is only during the past few years that we have been able to make anything like a fairly complete survey of the work of our native early organ writers. While a few pieces, notably some of Samuel Wesley, have been accessible in various collections for some time, the only systematic attempt to place this old music within our reach is the series known as 'Old English organ music.'*

There are two ways of undertaking a work of this kind. One is to publish the works simply as a contribution to the antiquarian and historical side of the art, giving us the dry bones, so to speak. The other is to treat them as music still possessing a claim to be considered from an artistic point of view. The latter method involves the adaptation to the modern organ, alternative suggestions in the doubtful passages that inevitably occur in old manuscripts, and the occasional filling in of what was often a skeleton obviously intended to be clothed by the performer in much the same way as he would harmonize a figured bass. The second of these two plans was the one adopted, and the responsible task of editing was undertaken by Mr. John E. West. So far thirty-six numbers have been published, and the collection is one that should interest every English organist. The period covered is from the middle of the 16th century to the middle of the 19th—the term 'old English' being thus more elastic than is its wont. The past seventy years, however, have seen such strides in every department of the organ and its music that we do not feel the adjective to be inappropriate.

Though the main object of this article is to draw attention to certain numbers that claim consideration as music quite apart from antiquarian, patriotic, or sentimental reasons, the historical side of the series is too interesting and important to be passed over. For this reason one looks with special curiosity at two 16th-century pieces (No. 24). Richard Alwood, the composer of the first, appears to have been a priest-organist, and to have flourished in the middle of the 16th century. The dates of his birth and death are unknown. He left, amongst other MS. works, seven organ pieces. John Redford, who wrote the second, is better known to us, mainly by virtue of the famous anthem which some present-day historians would have us believe was written by someone else. Both these pieces are vocal rather than instrumental in style, but in spite of their antiquity they are not unpleasing, being moreover so dignified and devotional that they well deserve use for preludial purposes. A notable advance, both in subject and treatment, is found in three 17th-century pieces (No. 14)—a Voluntary by Orlando Gibbons, a Voluntary for a double-organ* by Matthew Lock, and a Toccata by John Blow. The Gibbons piece, while showing the composer to have four voices rather than a keyboard at the back of his mind, 'hangs together' so well, and shows so much of Gibbons's power, that it is well worthy of performance. It is an ideal in-voluntary.

Both the Lock and Blow pieces make effective use of contrasted manuals, and show the composer to have entirely shaken off the choral tradition. The Lock Voluntary is an interesting attempt at a double fugue. After a couple of pages, however, both subjects disappear, and the remaining two pages deal with new matter. Much the same thing happens in the Blow Toccata, which sets out with the apparent intention of conducting itself as a respectable fugue. It soon goes the way of other instrumental music of the period, however, though there is a hint of the opening subject at the end of page 11. The final page gives us some harmony that probably brought on Blow's head denunciations as a 'futurist,' and there is a remarkably effective dominant pedal. These three pieces, apart from their interest as showing a great advance in appreciating the possibilities of the instrument, contain music that in spite of some structural looseness may still be listened to with pleasure. Other than antiquarian ears will appreciate the sweet gravity of much of this music, e.g., from Lock:

Ex. 2.

Ch. Gt. Ped. &c.

The two Voluntaries by Orlando Gibbons (No. 31) show the composer using an idiom more instrumental than in the piece published in No. 14, though he is here too discursive to be quite satisfactory, and his passage-work, like most of that of his contemporaries, gives us considerably less wool than cry. The two pieces are interesting as a landmark, and contain some curious rhythmical experiments, notably this hiccupping bass :

Dr. John Bull is represented by two pieces (No. 25), a solid and still effective treatment of a fragment of the plainsong 'Vexilla Regis,' and a Fantasia on a Flemish Chorale. The latter piece is one of the results of his holding office at Antwerp Cathedral, during which time he hobnobbed with that other virtuoso, Sweelinck. The work has a twofold interest, as a very early specimen of a choral prelude, and also by reason of its almost certainly being the first organ music by an Englishman to contain guides as to registration—the indications 'Cornet,' 'Cromhoren' (the Krummhorn of to-day), 'Cornet Aleen,' and 'Voll-register' being written in red ink.

The verse in C major of Dr. John Blow (No. 35) consists of a prelude in which continuity and interest are well maintained by means of suspensions (and in which the composer anticipates the free-and-easy methods of Handel by borrowing the first eighteen bars from a Toccata by Frescobaldi!), and a fugue wherein we say good-bye to the subject half-way on the journey, according to the custom of the period. Blow sticks much more closely to the matter in hand in his Voluntary in D minor, 'For ye single organ' (No. 34), this being a well-worked-out fugue on a chromatic subject. Both in its treatment of the subject and in its episodes this work shows Blow to have been a composer in advance of his time. His pupil, Henry Purcell, is represented by two pieces (No. 16), the first being too vague and loose in construction to interest a modern ear, which however often listens to less satisfactory organ music than the second—a Voluntary on the 'Old Hundredth' psalm tune. This, thanks to some judicious filling-in by the editor, is well worth playing to-day. We find Lock again represented in the second set of three 17th-century pieces (No. 20) by a Voluntary in F—a well-knit little piece in form of Introduction and Fughetta—and a Toccata in which the grave organ style of the commencement is forsaken at the end for some passage-work more suggestive of the harpsichord. As the piece occurs in a 'Choice collection of lessons for the harpsichord or organ of all sorts,' after the accommodating manner of the time, this is not surprising. The other piece in this set is of special interest as being an example of an anthem prelude. It is by Edward Gibbons, Orlando's elder brother, and the manuscript bears Dr. Tudway's superscription, 'A Prelude upon ye organ as was then usuall before ye Anthem.' It appears before Gibbons's 'How hath the city sate solitary,' but the prelude has no thematic connection with the anthem.

A set of Five short pieces (No. 27) is one of the most interesting and useful of the series, containing a little Prelude by Benjamin Rogers, an effective Largo by Samuel Wesley (an extract from a longer work), a charming Andante pastorale by Thomas Adams, a vigorous Finale by William Hine (1687-1730), and, best of all, an Allegro moderato by Thomas Roseingrave. Looked at apart from its date, this last is good organ music, full of interest and vitality. When we consider that its composer was born about 1685, we may go further and call it remarkable. The following quotation, showing an entry of the subject in the bass, will give some idea of its vigour and fluency :

Ex. 4.
Allegro moderato.

Roseingrave appears to have been a man of exceptional ability. He profited by study abroad, having been sent to Italy by the Dean and Chapter of St. Patrick's, Dublin, who ordered 'yt tenne guineas be by the Proctor of the said Canonry given him as a gift from the said Canonry towards bearing his charges.' He got good value for his 'tenne guineas,' spending a long time in admiring companionship the Scarlattis. He left some twenty other works for organ or harpsichord, and if any of them are as good as this specimen of his work, they should be published.

Of other composers born before 1700 we find represented William Croft and Maurice Greene. Croft's Voluntary in D major is a capital Fugue on two subjects, containing nothing startling, but good wholesome work. The Greene specimen is even better. An impressive Largo in C minor leads to a vigorous Allegro in the same key,—a movement so good and attractive that, looking at it, one regrets that our players when performing music of that period seem to find nothing else but the Concertos of Handel—works in which, except for a few movements, we find the great man so far below his best. This Allegro by Greene, together with other contemporary English works to be considered hereafter, might quite well relieve the 'Cuckoo and Nightingale' and similar strains never very fresh and long since threadbare. But there is a snobbishness in art, as in other things, and it must be confessed that such names as Handel, Buxtehude and Pachelbel look better on a programme than such and homely Greene, Blow, Bull, or Lock. Such composers are the highly-estimable poor relations of music for whom we have intense admiration in the abstract and cold shoulder in the concrete. In the works of the industrious and unknown Elizabethan who wrote 'Romeo and Juliet,' there is no bigger blunder than that implied in the question, 'What's in a name?'—a merely limited acquaintance with our profession would have shown him that in music the name often matters more than the notes.

An important addition to our knowledge of the history of hymnology appears in Reeves's latest catalogue of old music. The melody which in England is sung to the 'East hymn' has hitherto been traced back only to 1708, when it appears in the 'Lyra Davidica,' a collection foreign rather than English in sentiment. But now a volume is offered for sale, published at Bassa, in the Engadine, dated 1688, containing hymns and poems in the Romansch language of the Alps. Among them is a hymn for Ascension Day, with the tune in question. This discovery suggests a new source for melodies of uncertain origin.

The committee of the Nonconformist Choir Union offer a prize of five guineas for the best new anthem by a Free Church musician. Particulars are obtainable from the secretary, Mr. Arthur Berridge, 24, Wallingford Avenue, London, W.

Mr. Edgar Redgrave Doward, who was born at Worcester 1850, and has been an organist since 1862, went in 1870 to Canada, where, after occupying several posts, he became organist of St. Stephen's, Toronto, in 1902. At the boys' annual concert on May 8, he was the recipient of an honourable presentation that provides a trip for himself and his Doward to his birthplace.

We again put on record a remarkable recital of Russian red a cappella music, given by the Æolian Choir of Brooklyn. The recital took place at All Saints' Church on May 27, under the direction of Mr. N. Lindsay Norton. The newly-introduced works, which were sung to English texts, were the following:

Cherubim Song (five-part)	Bortnyansky
O Gladsome Light (five-part)	Arkhangel'sky
Easter Verses (eight-part)	Smolensky
'Salvation is created' (eight-part)	Tschesnokov
'The thief on the cross' (eight-part)	Tschesnokov
Cherubim Song (eight-part)	Musitchesky
Mercy of Peace; Sanctus (four-part)	Kastalsky
Cherubim Song (six-part)	Smirnov

The twenty-eighth annual Festival of the Exeter Diocesan Choral Association, on June 10, engaged, according to the triennial rote, choirs from the Barnstable, Southampton, and Exeter Archdeacons. They produced a total number of 715 singers. The anthem was Turlé's 'This is the day which the Lord hath made.' Dr. D. J. Wood was at the organ, and the sub-conductors were Messrs. Sidney Harper, father and son.

A northern newspaper announced recently that the service music at Lincoln Cathedral on a certain date would be 'Latin in F.' A new composer!

Reviews.

The teaching and accompaniment of plainsong. By Francis Burgess. [Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Mr. Burgess bases his book on two lectures delivered by him at the Royal College of Organists in 1912. Though the book, like the lectures, is addressed to the trained musician, and deals with a highly technical subject, the writer's style is so lucid that the layman may read without feeling out of his depth. In brief space a great deal of ground is covered. The very debatable question of the origin of plainsong gives Mr. Burgess an opportunity for upsetting some popular misconceptions. The notation of plainsong—so forbidding at first view—is shown to be after all no very difficult or mysterious matter. Rhythm—as the author says, the most important point of all—is dealt with very fully. Particularly useful are the remarks on the treatment of neumes, and those who regard these ornamentations as meaningless successions of notes, and sing them accordingly, will find food for thought on pages 23-26. The psalmic side of plainsong is perhaps that with which most choirmasters are concerned, and Mr. Burgess is a safe guide here. Those in charge of choirs should note well the dictum: 'The one way in which plainsong cannot be taught is by playing it over; it is so intensely vocal that it must be taught by someone who has at least a choirmaster's voice,'—the 'at least' being a shrewd thrust at a branch of the musical profession notorious for its vocal inefficiency. On the vexed question of plainsong accompaniment, Mr. Burgess gives good advice, helped out by examples of harmonies to psalm-tones, hymn-tunes, and a Kyrie from the Ordinary of the Mass. Purists, however, will part company with him when he says that 'we can actually secure everything that is meant by the term "modal accompaniment" by limiting the materials of our harmonies to the notes of the diatonic scale with the flat seventh as an additional note, and this simple household prescription will enormously simplify the mental labour involved in harmonizing the plainsong melodies when they are transposed either up or down to suit a particular set of voices.' But if, as is generally agreed, each mode has its characteristic colour, this diatonic 'short cut' is only less of a misfit than chromatic harmony. For example, the well-known third mode melody 'Pange lingua' may be harmonized throughout in the key of C. This would be diatonic, but the Phrygian flavour would be absent, and the situation is not saved by the simple expedient (suggested by Mr. Burgess) of treating the final note correctly. Most plainsongists, we fancy, will hardly grant Mr. Burgess his premises that 'in themselves the modes possess no harmonic significance whatever, and no sense of individual atmosphere,' setting against it Dr. Terry's dictum that 'each mode has its own distinctive tonality . . . it ought never to be possible for the listener to be in doubt as to the mode of the piece being played.' Bating this point, Mr. Burgess's book will be found of great use to the student of a branch of music fascinating in itself, and destined again to take an important part in the services of the Church.

Feis Ceoil Collection of Irish Airs (hitherto unpublished).
 Edited by Arthur Darley and P. J. McCall. Vol. i.
 [Feis Ceoil Association, Dublin, 1914.]

In the Introduction to the present collection it is stated that this is the first instalment of a large number of airs that had been selected by the editors (Arthur Darley and P. J. McCall) as 'hitherto unpublished.' From 1899 to 1913 three prizes have been awarded annually for the discovery of unpublished Irish airs, and, as may well be supposed, an enormous amount of material accumulated. However, after the publication of the 'Complete Petrie collection' (three vols.) and of Dr. Joyce's 'Old Irish folk-music' (1909), quite a large number of airs had to be set aside. As the net result of much sifting, eighty-five airs have been selected, and are now presented to the public. An Appendix gives a brief note stating the immediate source of each air.

From an examination of these eighty-five 'unpublished' airs, at least seventeen have been previously printed, while half-a-dozen others are pleasing variants. Let us go into detail.

No. 1 is a version of No. 4. A different setting of the latter under the same title ('The death of Staker Wallace') has been published in Roche's 'Collection of Irish music' (1911). No. 7 is a variant of 'Polly Oliver,' which, by the way, is of Irish provenance, although appearing in English collections. No. 10 has already been printed by Roche as 'The Suisheen Bawn.' No. 34 is a variant of 'The croppy boy.' No. 6, in a pleasing variant, will be found as No. 325 in Joyce, and No. 8 is also in Joyce, No. 573. No. 12, 'Gallagher's lament,' is merely a slow version of Joyce's 'Gallagher's frolic' (No. 350). No. 13 is a modern version of 'O'Donnell abu.' No. 25 has been printed by Joyce as 'Iri-h Hop Jig' (No. 840). No. 37 appears in O'Neill's Collection (No. 1488) under the title of 'O'Reilly's greyhound.' No. 42 is a second version of 'O'Donnell abu.' No. 49, 'Old Ireland, a long farewell,' is a corrupt version of 'Burns's farewell' as printed in 1797. No. 53, 'Peggy Levin,' has been printed by O'Neill (No. 140) as 'Margaret ni Labhain.' No. 57, 'Sheela O'Gara,' will be found in a purer form in Kane O'Hara's 'Midas' (1762). No. 61, 'Farewell to the cot on the mountain,' has been printed by Joyce (No. 665) under the title of 'Has sorrow thy young days shaded,' but correctly noted in $\frac{3}{4}$ rhythm instead of $\frac{6}{8}$. No. 65, 'Follow me down to Carlow,' has been printed as 'Follow me up to Carlow,' but there is grave doubt that the air goes back to the 16th century. No. 68, 'Drocketty's march,' is given by Joyce (No. 659) in a finer setting, under the title of 'The lark in the morning,' but he prints it in the key of D, whereas it is evidently A with the accidental seventh. No. 69, 'Nancy wants her own share,' was one of the marching tunes of the Irish Volunteers, in 1782, but it is an old 17th century Irish air, which wandered over to Scotland in the 45 period, and was printed in 1756. It is also known as 'Maggie Pickens' and as 'Whistle o'er the lave o' t.' No. 70, 'The Topsy House Reel,' is a variant of 'Templehouse Jig,' as printed by Levey in 1873, and by O'Neill. No. 76, 'The Toper's Double' is a variant of the well-known 'Kennedy's Jig,' printed in Joyce's 'Ancient Irish music' (No. 19) in 1873. No. 79 was printed in a slightly varied form in the Stanford-Petrie Collection (No. 478).

However, the present collection is very interesting; and certainly, the rescue from oblivion of many of the airs is distinctly to the credit of the Feis Ceoil. In particular, the airs taken down from the late Mr. John McCall are gems of their class. The editing has been well done, and the volume is most attractively produced by the Dublin University Press.

Lord of the world above. Anthem for Festival or general use. By John E. West.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

For the words of his anthem (composed for the Wellingborough and District Choral Festival) Mr. West has gone to a fine hymn of Isaac Watts. After a bold declamatory phrase associated throughout with the opening words, we have four melodious pages in which the imitative writing is notable for skill and absence of effort. A middle section, with suave passages for the voices and an admirably-written organ part, provides good contrast, and the close (più mosso) introduces some new material as well as dealing with some from the first section. The music throughout is vocal in character, and only moderately difficult. Its breadth makes the anthem an excellent work for choral Festival use. The organ part, it need hardly be said, is an effective feature.

Six Part-Songs. For mixed voices. By Edmondstown Duncan (Op. 120).

[The Walter Scott Publishing Co.]

It does not need the suggestion of the opus number of this collection to prompt the belief that Mr. Edmondstown Duncan is an experienced writer for choral voice. He scores with considerable freedom of movement while his texture and general outline remain simple. The search for an individual idea often makes for a tonal restlessness that does not seem to justify itself, but undoubtedly the individuality is achieved. The Mr. Duncan can conceive felicitous effect is shown by the expression of gentle contentment in 'Echoes' (Moore 'How sweet the answer Echo makes'), the piquant setting of the words 'There's fairy tulips in the East, the garden the sun' in 'O lady, leave thy silken thread,' and similar instances. The remaining part-songs are 'I sing the birth (Ben Jonson), 'O mistress mine,' 'The young May moon and 'Song of flight' (Christina Rossetti).

Impressions. Vocal Suite for soli and chorus of ladies' voices. By Gustave Ferrari. Poem by Tristan Klingsporf. English words by W. G. Rothery.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

M. Ferrari's Suite consists of five numbers: 'Springtime' (S.S.A.A.), 'The Beggar' (mezzo-soprano or baritone solo), 'The Sandman' (S.S.A.A. and soprano solo), 'The Fiddler' (soprano solo), and 'Marguerite at her wheel' (S.S.A.A. and soprano solo). The music is modern in style, with traces of present-day French influence in places. While not unduly difficult, it needs a capable body of voices to sing it with the requisite finish. All five numbers are charming, with the first and last perhaps as the best. The solos and the pianoforte part are rather difficult, but they give good result for the trouble. Schools and singing classes requiring work out of the beaten track will find it in this Suite.

The Pilgrims' Progress. Narrative tone-poem for organ. By Ernest Austin. Op. 41.

[J. H. Larway.]

This elaborate piece of programme music is in four parts (published separately). While many of the points are to be appreciated only by the aid of the analytical programme thoughtfully provided by the publisher, there is still much admirable music that makes its appeal quite apart from the story. The work is modern in style and only moderately difficult.

Correspondence.

PANAMA-PACIFIC INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION, 1915.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—Will you kindly permit me a little space in the columns of your much-esteemed paper to correct an expression which has appeared in several English papers to the effect that Mr. Edwin H. Lemare has been appointed special organist of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition? As a matter of fact, we are to have no official organist.

There are to be 287 organ recitals, as follows: 87 by Californian organists, 100 by other representative American organists, and 100 by Mr. Lemare.

In inviting your distinguished compatriot to play more in one-third of all our recitals we hope to show our appreciation of the high standard to which the art of organ playing has attained in England.

His reputation throughout America is so firmly established to make absolutely certain that the Lemare organ recitals will be among the most artistic and interesting features of the Exposition.—Very sincerely yours,

GEO. W. STEWART,

St. Ermins Hotel, London, Musical Director.
June 18, 1914.

VIOLONCELLOS ON THE RAILWAYS.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—I am anxious to inform your readers, particularly those who play the violoncello, that although the Board of Railway Managers recently declined to accede to a petition to have the rates for conveyance of their instrument polished or reduced, I have not, for my part, allowed the matter to rest. A full statement of the case has been made out and placed before the Royal Commission on Railways, which I have just received an acknowledgment with thanks. Several other matters have been brought before this important organization, which may be expected to continue its sittings for some time. It is much to be hoped that in due course a more fair adjustment of general railway Rates may be the result.—Yours obediently, FREDERICK FELLOWES.

Clarence House,
Connaught Road, Reading.
June 13, 1914.

P.S.—The fact that the few violoncello competitors at the recent Bucks and Oxon Musical Festival found other means of travelling than by rail, suggests that the railway companies may find this rigid imposition on violoncellists a loss to themselves rather than a gain.

A SWELL-BOX FOR THE TUBA.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—No sufficient reason has yet been advanced why the Tuba should be deprived of expression. Enclosed in a well-designed swell-box with sufficient shutter area, a powerful tuba becomes as useful as any other reed in an organ. It is, indeed, no exaggeration to say that a suitably-voiced enclosed tuba is ten times as useful as an unenclosed one, whether the building be large or small. Enclosure of the Tuba does not necessarily interfere with its dominating power of tone, for it was proved many years ago that by using increased wind-pressure we can not only maintain the power but actually and very considerably improve the tone-quality. I think that the 'traditional' Tuba tone—powerful, but lovely—has for ever gone out of favour in this country, though still held in esteem in Spain, and to some extent in Italy. The 'traditional' Tubas at York Minster no longer exist; the one at Birmingham has been re-voiced and authenticated by its original illustrious makers until not a trace of its 'traditional' tone-quality remains; and all the best tubas of to-day are made and voiced on entirely different lines from those of half-a-century ago.—Yours faithfully,

JOHN COMPTON.

It was stated by Mr. Lucius Burr in our last issue, under the above heading, that the Tuba in the organ of St. Alban's, Holborn, was enclosed in a swell-box. Messrs. Henry Willis & Son, makers of the organ, write to say that this statement is an error that has been prevalent for many years. They add:

'Of course there are several instances of enclosed Tubas in our organs, notably at St. Paul's Cathedral, the Albert Hall, and there will also be a family of these on the Solo department in the organ we are now building for Liverpool Cathedral. There is no doubt that with several stops of this character in an organ, at least one or more should be enclosed, but in an instrument containing only one stop of this class we should hesitate to risk sacrificing the dominating characteristics of the unenclosed tone in full effects for the mezzo-forte powers obtainable by enclosing it, and which can practically be obtained by the use of the enclosed reedwork of other departments.'

Obituary.

We regret to record the following deaths:

ERNEST WOOD, at Melbourne, Victoria, Australia, on May 9, in his fifty-third year. Mr. Wood was organist and director of the choir of St. Paul's Cathedral, Melbourne, since its consecration in 1891. He was born in Yorkshire, and at an early age articulated to the late Mr. J. M. W. Young, then organist of Lincoln Cathedral. On the expiry of his articles he proceeded to London to become organist of St. John's, Wilton Road, for some years, resigning in favour of the post he held until his death. A charming personality secured for him the respect of all classes of the community at Melbourne, where he was justly regarded as the foremost authority on all matters connected with church and organ music.

CHARLES THOMAS DANIELL CREWS, Past-Master of the Musicians' Company, of which he was a great benefactor, and a vice-president of the Madrigal Society, in his seventy-sixth year, after a long illness. Mr. Crews joined the Musicians' Company in 1880 and was Master in 1904-5 and 1907-8. He had a great love for the Art, and he was a generous sympathiser with many of its activities.

THE CONGRESS OF THE INTERNATIONAL MUSICAL SOCIETY.

The fifth Congress of the International Musical Society took place at Paris, and lasted from June 1 to 10. It was naturally very well supported by French musicians, who assembled in large numbers, but there were also many from Germany and Austria, besides representatives from other countries, including England and America. Considering how close this country is to France, it was to be regretted that more of our musicians were not present, but this was no doubt mainly due to the fact that the Congress had been brought little under their notice, and that information from the Paris office was both difficult to get and scanty in character. In addition, the extension from six days to eleven placed further obstacles in the way.

As is the invariable practice at these Congresses, a number of papers were arranged to be read. Compared with the London Congress these were considerably fewer, and on the whole less interesting; in fact, as one prominent American musician remarked, the list looked so dry that he did not propose to listen to one of them. By far the greater portion dealt with subjects of a more or less remote past, interesting enough in a way to specialists, and perhaps valuable to the historian, but not wildly exciting to others. Of the rest, we may mention as being more concerned with matters of to-day 'The psychological laws of musical composition,' by M. A. Gandillot; 'The problem of the libretto,' by Dr. E. Istel; 'The metrical foot in modern music,' by Dr. Ilmari Krohn; and 'Helpful suggestions as to teaching of harmony drawn from the methods of language-study,' by Mr. Hamilton M. Macdougall, of America. England was represented by papers on 'Lewis Grabu,' by the Rev. H. C. de Lafontaine; 'Emotion and representation in music,' by Mr. H. Antcliffe; 'The works of J. S. Bach transferred to the pianoforte,' by Mr. J. A. Fuller-Maitland; and 'Hebridean songs,' by Mrs. Kennedy-Fraser and others.

For the evening of June 1 (Whit-Monday) a reception was announced at the Salle des Fêtes d'Excelsior. The following morning the Congress was formally inaugurated at a meeting held at the Sorbonne and presided over by M. Louis Barthou, to whom fell the melancholy duty of announcing that only on the previous evening M. Henri Roujon, president of the general-committee, had passed away. M. J. Ecorcheville, in a brief speech, offered a warm welcome to the visitors, whether from home or abroad, to which Dr. Guido Adler, of Vienna, replied in French on behalf of the foreigners. M. Valentino, as representative of the French Government, offered some remarks, and M. Barthou wound up the meeting with a much appreciated speech.

Taking the various events in chronological order, the next thing to happen was a matinée at the Opéra-Comique, which took the form of a Glück-gala. Portions of 'Alceste,' 'Orphée,' and 'Iphigénie en Tauride' were presented in a really delightful manner, the staging being particularly good: in fact some of it was exquisite. The part of Alceste was sung by Madame Félia Litvinne, with great effect, and Mlle. Brohly as Orpheus was also good, though somewhat cold. As Iphigénie Madame Isnardon sang with warmth and passion.

The programme of the concert of Renaissance music, given at the Salle Gaveau on June 5 by the Schola de Saint-Louis, under M. Marc de Ranse, was made up of music written by French composers of that period, and consisting of madrigals and motets. The choir though small sang with good volume and admirable precision, albeit their renderings sounded somewhat hard to English ears. Instrumental pieces, Fantasies and Branles, were excellently performed by the Borrel Quartet, and M. J. Boulnois played organ pieces by Frescobaldi, Scheidt, and Sweelinck, with impeccable technique. On Saturday, June 6, the general meeting of the Society took place, the reports and resolutions were duly handed in, and the Congress formally came to an end after it had been decided that its next meeting should be at Berlin in 1916. Later in the same afternoon the Figaro gave a reception at its offices in the Rue Drouot.

Having got business off their mind by this time, the Congressists settled down to enjoy themselves without delay. On the Saturday evening a good many attended Vespers at the Armenian Church in the Rue Jean Goujon, where an unfamiliar kind of music and a strange ritual were followed with deep interest. Of a different type was the 'Messe des Congressistes,' presented the next morning (Sunday) at the Basilique Sainte-Clotilde, which was made up of pieces composed by contemporary French musicians, these being almost the only modern music heard during the Congress.

The concert of early French music on the morning of June 8 derived undoubted distinction by being given in La Sainte-Chapelle. In this ancient and very beautiful edifice—so highly prized by Parisians that during the siege of 1870 they encased it in a shell of wood protected with earth—were heard pieces of sacred music by Fulbert de Chartres (1028), King Robert the Pious (1031), Guiraut Riquier (1290), Dufay, and Tapissier, besides several by unknown composers. Many pieces were crude in their effects, but they were none the less interesting. The concerted music was very well performed by the choir of Saint-François Xavier, conducted by M. Drees, the solos being sung by Mlle. Barbaïan, M. Jouanneau, and M. Tremblay. Another very delightful venue was the Galérie des Glaces at Versailles, whither the Congressists journeyed the same afternoon in order to listen to a concert of ancient chamber music by composers of the 17th and 18th centuries.—Couperin, Daquin, Rameau, Campra, Martini, &c. It was a well-varied programme comprising pieces for various combinations of instruments, together with songs, all being delightful to hear. The performances were of high excellence, particularly the clavier playing by Mlle. Hélène Léon.

Tuesday, June 9, was a very busy day, with two concerts of sacred music and a banquet. The first concert, given in the Chapel of the Invalides, was really most interesting. It was devoted to composers of the 17th and 18th centuries, such as Depré, Marchand, Charpentier, Couperin de Lalande, and others. The outstanding item was a 'Miserere mei Deus' by Lully, laid out for a quartet of soloists and double choir, and finely performed by the choir of the Société G. F. Handel. Of the soloists the tenor, M. G. Paulet, distinguished himself here, as he did also in 'The denial of St. Peter,' by Charpentier. M. Joseph Bonnet, the organist of the Church of Saint-Eustache, played some ten pieces for the organ in masterly style.

Very different was the afternoon's experience. A concert of Huguenot music was given by the choir at the Protestant Church du Saint-Esprit, under the direction of M. J. Jemain, accompanied by some remarks from M. Henry Expert, the assistant-librarian of the Conservatoire. The greater part of the programme consisted of settings of the Psalms by Goudimel, with some by Le Jeune. The metrical version of the words was mainly by Clement Marot and Théodore de Bèze. Besides the Psalms there were a few spiritual songs by various composers. On the whole, this concert did not prove extremely enjoyable, and not everyone cared to sit it out. It is kinder to say no more.

At the banquet which took place in the evening, at the Grand Hotel, some 350 guests assembled. The hour announced was eight o'clock, but owing to various hindrances it was nearer nine o'clock before the repast began. It was originally intended that the chair should be taken by the Minister of Public Instruction and Fine Arts; but as fate willed it France had just been plunged into one of her innumerable political crises, and there was no such person being, so M. Barthou stepped into the breach. An excellent chairman he made, and the evening passed off very successfully. It was terminated in rather an unusual way by a presentation of Monsigny's opéra-comique, 'Les aveux indiscrets,' capably played by Mlles. Mathieu-Lutz and Marié de l'Isle, and MM. Francell, Alberti, and Vauris the orchestra being directed by M. Gabriel Grovlez. It was well put on, and the dancing was good, but the acoustic properties of the room were so poor that the performance did not afford the enjoyment that might have been expected.

A brilliant finale to the festivities of the Congress was the reception given by the Princesse de Polignac at her residence in the Avenue Henri Martin, on Wednesday, June 10. There was an orchestra conducted by M. Paul Vidal, which gave very good performances of music again taken from composers of the 18th century. M. Jacques Thibaud played with much charm a Concerto in B flat for violin and orchestra, by Leclair, and a movement from a Concerto in A minor by Gaviniés. Madame Wanda Landowska gave in her inimitable manner a group of pieces for the clavier by Couperin, Dandrieu, and Rameau, while M. Saint-Saëns once again proved his inexhaustible vitality by playing a couple of pianoforte pieces with great finish and verve. Songs were contributed by Madame Vallin-Pardo, Mlle. Bonnard, and Mlle. Marié de l'Isle. Altogether a charming programme, delightfully carried out.

It will be seen that very little modern French music was presented during the Congress, which was from some points of view to be regretted. There is a good deal of it which is little known outside France, and it might have been illuminating to foreign visitors, especially to Germans, to hear how it was performed in the land of its origin. It seems instead to have been the desire mainly to exhibit the course of French sacred music during some several hundred years, and no doubt much that was brought forward was far from being familiar to any of the Congressists, even to all the Frenchmen among them. The planning of these programmes, the point of view being accepted, reflected credit on whoever was responsible for them. The manner in which they were carried out was also admirable.

Unfortunately, it is not possible to apply the same term the official arrangements. It seems probable that the committee hardly foresaw the magnitude of the task they had undertaken, and they set about it later than was wise and with little system. There were, it is said, some unforeseen contretemps which greatly hampered them, but thanks largely to the enthusiastic and devoted labours of L. Henry Prunieres, these were sensibly minimised. Was the Congress a success? On the whole, it was.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS' FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY.

The jubilee of this useful and flourishing institution was made much of, as was only right. The proceedings opened with a luncheon at the Hotel Cecil, at which some 500 of the members attended. Dr. C. Harford Lloyd, the president, occupied the chair, and among his supporters were Sir Hubert Parry, Sir Walter Parratt, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Sir George and Lady Martin, Alderman Sir Edward Cooper, Prof. P. C. Buck, Dr. Bairstow, Dr. Alcock, Dr. Walford Davies, Dr. Allan Gray, Dr. L. H. Mann, Dr. G. R. Sinclair, Dr. C. H. Kitson, Dr. Charles Wood, Dr. C. W. Pearce (hon. treasurer), and Dr. H. A. Harding (hon. secretary).

Sir Alexander Mackenzie proposed 'success to the Royal College of Organists,' paying tribute to the splendid work of the College not only in improving the standard of music in the churches, and indirectly in other places as well, but in raising and fixing, he believed for all time, the social and artistic status of the organist. As to the College examinations, their searching nature might be gauged from the fact that during the past year only sixty-four candidates out of three hundred and thirty-five were successful. Sir Walter Parratt, in reply, expressed his opinion that to a very great extent the welfare of the music of the country depended upon the organist who was not an organist alone. In towns where there were no musical centres, the organist should be the centre. This was usually the case, and the College examinations were intended to fit men for the position, being wider in scope and more practical than in the earlier days of the College. The president proposed the health of the hon. secretary, and Dr. Harding, in response, expressed himself as being well rewarded by his knowledge of the College's progress.

The members attended Evensong in Westminster Abbey, when the Canticles were sung to Hopkins in F, and the Anthems were Wesley's 'Ascribe unto the Lord,' and Parry's 'I was glad.' Dr. Alcock gave a short recital, Rheinberger's Cantilene (Sonata XI.), Bach's Prelude and Fugue in A minor, Harwood's 'Requiem Æternam,' and Widor's 'Marche Pontificale' being finely played. Arcadelt's 'Ave Maria,' arranged for organ and carillon by Sir Frederick Bridge, was also performed, but the effect was not happy, owing to the prominence of the bell harmonics.

After the service the festivities were resumed at the University of London, where the president and council gave a reception and conversation. The band of the Grenadier Guards was in attendance, and played an admirably-chosen programme of good light music, conducted by Lieut. A. Williams, M.V.O.

Dr. H. W. Richards, in proposing a vote of thanks to Dr. Harding, said that by his astonishing industry, unflinching tact, and sacrifice of energy and time in a busy life, he had carried on the great work of his predecessors, Drs. Turpin and Sawyer, and added prestige to the College. The vote was carried by acclamation, and hearty thanks were accorded to Sir Frederick Bridge and Dr. Alcock for the special musical arrangements at the Abbey, and also to the President.

The reception was an enjoyable close to a highly successful celebration of an important landmark in the history of the College, and the council are to be congratulated on the very evident enthusiasm of the members. A feature of the occasion was the presence of a large number of members from the country, with the result that many pleasant reunions took place.

'THE APOSTLES' IN CANTERBURY CATHEDRAL.

The performance of Elgar's oratorio 'The Apostles' in Canterbury Cathedral on June 19 was a most notable event. The idea was originated by a well-known and generous musical amateur, a citizen of Leeds, who desired to do homage to the composer and at the same time enable the inhabitants of a district not too well favoured musically to become acquainted with a noble work, presented with the best resources obtainable in this country. To this end the services of the celebrated Leeds Musical Union, trained by the great choral expert Dr. Henry Coward, the New Symphony Orchestra (led by Mr. Saunders), which is one of the best equipped organizations of its kind in London, and the following solo cast: Madame Agnes Nicholls (the Blessed Virgin and the Angel); Miss Muriel Foster (Mary Magdalene); Mr. John Coates (St. John); Mr. Herbert Heyner (St. Peter); Mr. Robert Radford (Judas); Mr. Thorpe Bates (Jesus), had been secured.

Sir Edward Elgar himself conducted, and Mr. J. Groves was the organist. The choir consisted of 83 sopranos, 61 contraltos, 59 tenors, and 61 basses, total 264, and the orchestra of 103 performers. The ancient city rose to the occasion bravely, and gave a cordial welcome to its distinguished visitors. The choir arrived on the evening before the day of the performance, in order that on the morning of the 19th a full rehearsal could be held in the Cathedral. As long beforehand all the tickets for the performance had been sold, it was a thoughtful boon to a large number of persons that the rehearsal was made public. Thus the work was performed to two audiences, each of which filled the Cathedral. No more fit arena and surroundings can be imagined for the performance of a work dealing with the mysteries of the Christian faith and some of the most tragic incidents associated with its Founder, than the interior of a venerable and awe-inspiring Cathedral, with the 'frozen music' of its architecture. Surely it is in such environment that oratorio will find its natural home, no matter what its fate may be in the concert hall!

The performance was, as may be imagined, an event to remember. The choir sang most impressively. There were many subtle touches and some splendid climaxes, and the mood of the expression was always adequate. If the intonation in one or two places was not perfect (the day was hot and thundery, and calculated to make even a musical critic sing out of tune), the lapses were insignificant in comparison with achievement. The soloists lived up to their reputation. Madame Nicholls was in good voice and sang her two parts with rare chasteness of style. Miss Foster's interpretation of the part of Mary Magdalene was thrilling and sometimes intensely dramatic. No one present is likely ever to forget Mr. Radford's interpretation of the bitter anguish of Judas, when he realised the awfulness of his crime. Mr. Bates showed a good if not wholly adequate conception of the very difficult part of Jesus. Mr. Coates sang with his usual dignity and force, and Mr. Heyner was very impressive in his part. The Dawn scene, with its use of the shofar, created its due effect, and the Beatitudes section with its singular and pathetic comments of bystanders on the Saviour's immortal words, was an intensely interesting feature. The great Finale was, as it should be, an imposing and majestic climax.

The proceeds of the performance are to be devoted to the Cathedral reparation fund. Inasmuch as a substantial proportion of the expenses was defrayed by the aforesaid Leeds citizen, there should be a considerable balance for that desirable object.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN. THE FRENCH AND ITALIAN SEASON.

A full close having been put to the German season in the last week of May, the record of events since that date is to deal solely with French and Italian opera. The number of the latter has been increased by 'L'Amore dei Tre Re,' by Signor Montemezzi, a composer who has already achieved several operas if not fame. His work is interesting as showing the obvious fact that like a good many other people the Italian musician of to-day has made the mistake of fixing on Germany as the centre of musical inventiveness. Signor Montemezzi has been unpatriotic;

instead of attempting to improve on his countryman Puccini, just as that composer improved on Verdi, he has endeavoured to copy the methods of Dr. Strauss. Mannerisms are the result. The fact is to be regretted, for he certainly has ideas of his own, conveyed by some original orchestral effects—a difficult thing to devise nowadays—and he also can show a good command of mood. Unfortunately, the mood is all the same, the story being one of unrelieved lugubriousness. In accordance with the pleasing custom of medieval Italy and other countries, Fiora has been given in marriage to Manfredo, the conqueror of the barbarian stronghold. She still retains her affection for Avito, a local noble to whom she was originally 'engaged.' Her husband's frequent absence on campaign gives them every opportunity for meeting. They are shadowed by Manfredo's blind father Archibaldo, who suspects. He finds the lovers together, but failing to catch Avito does for Fiora by the simple and popular process of strangulation. Still, he has not found the lover, and he conceives the fiendish plan of putting poison on her dead lips so that he who gives her a farewell kiss will be caught. The lover comes, is caught, and falls dead in an out-of-the-way corner. Next the husband; and just as he is succumbing to the poison the blind father finds his way to the vault and lays hold of him only to find that he is the one man who had the right to take a last farewell. Such a theme does not call for light and fanciful treatment, and does not receive it. One would like to find Signor Montemezzi's talent expended on a brighter subject before saying finally whether he can or cannot write opera. The thing was very well done, with wonderful scenery and costumes more or less of the period—especially the architecture—and Madame Edvina as Fiora and Signor Adama Didur as the blind father distinguished themselves. The whole opera is largely a prolonged duet, a form opera is inclined to take nowadays, to which prompt objection should be made by operatic super-numeraries. Signor Moranzoni, a personal friend of the composer, conducted and was most loyal to his friend.

This has been the only novelty. But there was an element of freshness in the revival of Verdi's masterly work 'Otello,' thanks to the superb representation of the name-part by M. Paul Franz, given for the first time on any stage. It effaces memories of a good many famous exponents since the year of grace 1889, and is an achievement for this artist, who happily is realising everything that the knowing ones prophesied for him. Madame Melba was the Desdemona, and after she had taken her early departure, Signorina Muzio appeared in her stead with excellent results. Madame Melba's leave-taking was observed by an 'all star' performance of 'La Bohème,' in which the 'old guard,' Signori Caruso and Scotti, appeared yet once again. Signor Caruso himself has been winning golden opinions for his singing in Verdi's 'Un ballo in maschera,' which has been an immense success, as these works will ever be when properly sung. In 'Ballo' Mlle. Zepilli, a newcomer with a fascinating smile and fortunately a voice to match, did extremely well, and both Mynheer van Hulst and Signor Dinh Gilly have given versions of 'Eri tu' that brought down the house. Other newcomers have been Signorina Raisa, who sang 'Aida' very well, and Fräulein Claussen, who passed from German opera to 'Aida' (Amneris) with marked success. 'Samson et Dalila,' thanks to M. Franz and Madame Kirby Lunn, has maintained its hold; 'Louise' shows no signs of diminished favour, and Signorina Muzio, the Syndicate's 'discovery,' has shown us that she was a fortunate discovery indeed. Signor Polacco as sole conductor has performed wonders. Signor Panizza came to relieve him towards the close of the month.

'THE CRICKET ON THE HEARTH':

SIR A. C. MACKENZIE'S OPERA.

Music-lovers have had to wait a long time for a further example of the branch of musical art in which Sir Alexander Mackenzie excels. But to the intense gratification of those who are acquainted with his powers in this direction, he has at last broken silence. As a matter of fact the work in question, 'The cricket on the hearth,' has been written for some years—eighteen, to be exact—but at the time of its completion there was another 'Cricket on the hearth,' and the work was shelved. It is of course based on the famous—indeed, national—story of Charles Dickens, which was adapted for the stage with both skill and sympathy by the late Julian Sturgis. He approached his task in the true Dickens spirit and made a good version of the story, strengthening it by the materialisation of the fairies, by lyrics of appropriate spirit and refinement, and for his dialogue using the words of Dickens himself. The book clearly inspired Sir Alexander, who has written some of the best music this particular vein has produced, for it cannot be forgotten that the composer of 'Colomba,' 'The dream of Jubal,' and 'The Sun-God,' is a man of extraordinary versatility—to summarise briefly a mass of gifts that stand without equal in their richness and distinction. To find that Sir Alexander could command a light and fanciful style was no surprise to those who know his record, but in this instance he has surpassed himself by the skill with which he is grave and gay in turn, brings tears to our eyes or laughter to our lips. In both there is the delicacy of touch that shows the masterhand conscious of the exact degree to which he can sway his hearers. We have long been tantalised by the inviting character of the Overture which has been heard in the concert-room; and the work in full is no less pleasing and gratifying. It is truly remarkable for the way in which the composer has caught the Dickens spirit. Simply and homely though it be, it is nevertheless the English spirit. Those who have formed mental musical pictures of the well-known characters will find them exactly realised by Sir Alexander Mackenzie. Edward Plummer's songs are just what we should expect them to be; Caleb trolls out a ditty that fits him exactly; John Peerybingle roars a rollicking song, and poor blind Bertha sings to us with a wistful plaintiveness that but increases the amount of our sympathy she always possessed; and all the others—including even the Fairies—do just what we expected them to do. Last, but not least, Tilly Slowboy's lullaby to the Baby, 'Did Ums,' is just the quaint and original thing we should imagine that whole-hearted creature to sing. The entire score meets our views exactly; and we represent the views of the many who attended the six performances given of the work. These took place at the Royal Academy of Music on June 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12. The frank melodiousness of the music, its scholarly treatment, and its well-pointed orchestration delighted everyone who heard it. It will be to our everlasting shame as a musical nation if such a masterpiece is allowed to pass into oblivion; for apart from the fact that it is a setting of a national story known and loved wherever the English language is understood, the music has an abiding quality of being as national as the story and as full of life as the characters it so well illustrates. The performances given by the students of the operatic class of the Academy were uncommonly good. The piece brought out unsuspected qualities in the young exponents, thereby showing its good. Two casts were employed, and the members of both showed the same quality—enthusiasm. The composer conducted the first performance, and afterwards shared the duty with Mr. Edgardo Lévi, the director of the operatic class. Mr. Cairns James was the producer. For purposes of record the casts may be given:

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The Stainer Exhibition for organ-playing (an anonymous gift to the Academy) will be awarded to the best organ-student of either sex admitted at the entrance examination on September 17.

The following scholarships are open for competition: The John Thomas Welsh Scholarship, for vocalists and instrumentalists of Welsh parentage; the Henry Smart Scholarship, for British lady organists and composers; the Dove Scholarship, for violinists under the age of eighteen; the Ada Lewis Scholarships (five), for vocalists of either sex, and pianists, violinists, viola-players, and violoncellists (male); the Maud Mary Gooch Scholarship, for organists. The competitions will be held about the middle of September.

The Charles Rube Prize for ensemble playing has been awarded to Wolfe Wolfsohn, Ewart Shadwick, Herbert J. Brine, and Giovanni B. Barbirolli.

A chamber concert was given by students of the Academy at the Duke's Hall on May 25, when Bemberg's 'La Ballade du Désespéré,' with Miss Katherine Dyer as vocalist, was a feature of interest. Concerted music by Bach, Beethoven, Tanéïev, and Arensky was played, and solo works were given by Miss Gertrude Cotter and Miss Hilda Klein (pianoforte), and Master Wolfe Wolfsohn (violin). The vocalists were Miss Eleanor Evans, Miss Evelyn Langston, Mr. Gerald Harris, and Mr. Darrell Fancourt. A string orchestra took part under Mr. Spencer Dyke's direction.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The programme of the chamber-concert given on May 28 included Beethoven's String quartet in F major, Op. 135; Dohnányi's C sharp minor Violin and pianoforte sonata (Mr. S. C. de Villiers and Mr. Francis P. Warren), songs (Miss Eva Bagley, Miss Gladys Thomas, and Miss Charlotte Cunningham), pianoforte solos (Miss Kathleen Long), and an organ solo (Mr. Harold E. Wylde).

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

In accordance with the sensible plan adopted at this institution, students have been put during the past term to the study of Beethoven's Mass in C, and on June 16 a performance of the work was given at the College. Though small in numbers, the choir sang with certainty and unity, and the tone was excellent. Dr. A. T. Pringuer conducted, Mr. Harry Gray and Mrs. J. R. Blazey were organist and pianist respectively, and the solo vocalists were Miss Lilian Barnett, Miss Clarice Mills, Mr. Gilbert Simpson, and Mr. Roland Roberts.

THE BEECHAM OPERA SEASON.

BY ALFRED KALISCH.

Up to the present the success of the German-Russian season at Drury Lane has been singularly marked. It is too late to do more than chronicle the fact that Strauss's 'Legend of Joseph' was produced on June 23, under the conductorship of the composer, with Madame Karsavina and M. Miassine in the principal parts. Before the Russian artists arrived, there was a series of performances of 'Der Rosenkavalier' and 'Die Zauberflöte' in German. By his conducting of 'Die Zauberflöte,' Mr. Beecham certainly enhanced his reputation. The performances were full of life and poetry, and the orchestral playing was highly polished, but all the critics are not agreed that his entirely unconventional tempi justified themselves in every case. The problem of the mounting was cleverly solved, for it was artistic and effective but not at all obtrusive, and, wisely, no attempt was made to emphasise the symbolism and mysticism. The excellence of the German singing was a surprise. The greatest personal success was made by Miss Claire Dux by her singing of 'Ah! lo so,' and Herr Paul Knüpfer was wonderful as Zarastro. Herr Bohnen, Herr Bronsgeest, and Mr. Ranalow also deserve mention, but Fräulein Frieda Hempel was unfortunately not at her best on the one occasion when she undertook the part of the Queen of the Night. The performances of 'Der Rosenkavalier' were very good, and Fräulein Hempel made a great impression by her singing and acting as the Marschallin. Herr Knüpfer was inimitable as the Baron, and Herr Bohnen was also good in the part. Fräulein Siems was as effective as of yore as the Marschallin, and Fräulein Dux's Sophia is known as a very charming piece of work. Fräulein Charlotte Uhr was perhaps the most convincing Octavian we have seen.

Before discussing the new Russian works which have been produced, one must refer to the continued magnetism exercised by 'Boris Godounov' and 'Ivan the Terrible,' which rouse the audience to paroxysms of enthusiasm every time they are given. How far this is due to the influence of fashion, how far to the irresistible personality of M. Shaliapin, how far to the unapproachably artistic mounting, and how far to the music itself, it is difficult to say; but the pæans of the enthusiasts who say that no such music has been written for the stage in the last hundred years, seem to betray a certain lack of proportion, and make one wonder whether the thurifers—to use a word which is now rather fashionable—have ever heard of 'The Ring' or 'Tristan.' No one wishes to deny the extraordinary vivacity and picturesqueness of the Russian music, and the skill with which it is scored; but the impartial listener cannot escape from the fear that the very violence of the first impressions it makes will result, as in the case of very piquant dishes, in more speedy satiety. All the Russian music depends on constant iteration, rather than on development, and history proves that it is the music which relies for its effect in great moments of climax on thematic treatment (whether it be music for the stage or not) which has the longest life. It is because it answers to this definition better than the other operas, and because it has more unity, that 'Prince Igor' may possibly prove of more lasting value than the other works. The dances from 'Prince Igor' were familiar already, but in their proper surroundings their effect was enhanced a hundredfold, and their first production led to a scene of enthusiasm such as a London theatre seldom witnesses. By the omission of the love interest the plot becomes very slight, but it is still sufficiently interesting. M. Shaliapin appeared in two rôles, that of the dissolute Prince Galitzky and that of the Khan Khontchak. He altered his appearance so much that he was hardly recognisable in the second part. M. Paul Andreev was excellent as Prince Igor, and sang extremely well the extended solo in the last Act, which is the most lyrical passage in all the operas we have heard, so far, from the Russians. Madame Kousnetzov was very effective as Princess Yaroslava. The scene of the departure of Igor's army on its warlike expedition is one of the most thrilling stage-pictures within recent memory.

The season has introduced us further to two new experiments in art-form, known as opera-ballets. The first of these and the most important, is 'Le coq d'or' of Rimsky-Korsakov, which is based on a story of Pushkin and has an allegorical significance which need not detain us now. Here the singers are arranged on two tiers on either side of the stage, and each character has a vocal and a dancing representative. The solution of the problem is not entirely happy, because the actors on the stage move and the singers are stationary. It is said that Rimsky-Korsakov's original idea was that the singers should be behind screens and should move about together with the actors on the stage, but this was found impracticable. Rimsky-Korsakov's music is extraordinarily brilliant and entertaining, and also has moments of remarkable beauty; and he seems to have realised at the end of his career that possibly he and his school had been underrating the value of logical thematic treatment. Mlle. Karsavina was delicious as the Queen Shemakhan, and the unctuous humour of M. Bolm as King Dodon, and Madame Jezierska as the Housekeeper (specially in her sorrow at the King's death) was a memorable feature of an unforgettable performance. The departure of King Dodon for the wars on a property rocking-horse was as wonderful in its grotesqueness as was its serious counterpart, the departure of the army in 'Prince Igor.' The mounting, designed by Mlle. Gontcharova, was an absolute triumph in its combination of splendour and wit. The singing of the florid music of the 'Golden Cockerel' itself (which is if anything more difficult and elaborate than the famous air of Zerbinetta in 'Ariadne') by Madame Dobrovolska was exceedingly brilliant, if a little hard.

The other experiment was Stravinsky's 'Rossignol,' based on Hans Christian Andersen's story of the real and the mechanical nightingales. Here Madame Dobrovolska, the representative of the Nightingale, sat in the orchestra, facing the audience, while we were asked to imagine the Nightingale itself as being on a tree-top at the back of the stage. It is not easy to speak of the music after one hearing. It is quite the most 'advanced' that we have heard, and the least like anything that we know. It serves no purpose to tell the composer that he ignores the demands of beauty: he would answer that the last thing he wished was to be 'beautiful.' His aim is to produce a series of fleeting impressions having no connection, musically, with each other, but following closely the happenings on the stage. He might have achieved his object without so much unpleasant noise, and one regrets that he was not satisfied with the paths which had led him to 'The Fire Bird' and 'Petrushka.' Here again the mounting is superbly daring and beautiful. With its mingling of wit and fancy, it seems to make ancient China live before our eyes.

The last Russian novelty was Steinberg's 'Midas,' which is pleasing and effective. The music serves its purpose well. It has points of contact with Debussy and the modern French School as well as with Young Russia.

Of non-Russian works the most important has been 'Les Papillons,' which has been invented by M. Fokine. He has wedded a slight story which is a continuation of that told in 'Le Carnaval' to Schumann's music, which has been orchestrated by M. Tcherepnine in a curiously unmodern way. He must have done it purposely, for he can be modern. 'Papillons' is a dainty trifle, charmingly played by Mlle. Karsavina, M. Fokine, and the rest of the artists of the company, and delightfully mounted.

'Daphnis et Chloé' is considered by M. Ravel to be his most important work: it is certainly his longest. Some controversy arose—the composer protesting that he did not wish it to be produced without chorus, and M. Diaghlev asserting that it was impracticable with it. We must be content to judge it without a chorus. The music of M. Ravel is rich in imaginative charm, but, too, his vein seems to have been worked out too soon, and there is a considerable lack of variety in the longish first pastoral scene. The less rarefied atmosphere, the more defined rhythms, and the robuster themes which the second scene, that of the Pirates' camp, brought with it were doubly welcome. M. Fokine danced and mimed with excellent skill as Daphnis, but he does not get as much personality into his miming and dancing as into his choreography. The part of Daphnis has been played both by Mlle. Karsavina and Mlle. Fokine.

The repertoire of previously heard works of the Russian Ballet so far has included 'Tamar,' 'Sheherazade,' 'Petrushka,' 'The Fire Bird,' and 'The Carnival.' The supreme direction is in the hands of M. Fokine, who has made his influence felt in many ways. It is impossible to go into detail, but the performances as a whole exercise as great a charm as ever.

Two hundred and forty-four Free Church choirs, representing over 7,000 singers, have signified their intention of taking part in the celebration of the twenty-sixth annual Festival of the Nonconformist Choir Union at the Crystal Palace on July 4. As the seating capacity of the Handel orchestra is limited to 4,000 adults, a process of selection is necessary. Mr. Frank Idle will again conduct, and Mr. J. A. Meale will be at the organ. Miss Maud Wilby has been engaged as solo vocalist.

At the annual dinner of the London Symphony Orchestra, held on June 14, Herr Arthur Nikisch was the guest of the evening and received a loving-cup as a presentation from the Orchestra. The chairman was Sir Alexander Mackenzie, and the guests included MM. Emil Cooper, Polacco, Mlynarski, Camilieri, Sir Frederic Cowen, Mr. Arthur Fagge, and Mr. W. W. Hedgcock.

THE INDEPENDENT MUSIC CLUB.

An organization under the above title has been formed with the following objects:

The promotion and especially the protection of the best interests of musical artists and composers;

The introduction of creative and executive artists to each other with a view to mutual benefit;

The fostering of breadth of view and knowledge of public requirements with regard to music; and

To establish adequate remuneration for all engagements coming to artists through the Club.

The subscription is £1 1s. for professionals, and £2 2s. for amateurs. The premises of the Club, West Lodge, 13, Pembroke Gardens, Kensington, London, W., are now open. Mr. G. C. Ashton Jonson is vice-president, and the secretary Miss Lett.

ORFEÓ CATALÀ (BARCELONA) AT THE ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

The devisers of the scheme for bringing this mixed-voice choir of about 200 voices to London must possess a very sanguine temperament to suppose that they could draw adequate audiences to the vast arena of the Royal Albert Hall on three occasions within four days during the busiest musical season on record. We trust that our visitors will not think that the London musical public is unsympathetic, and that they will understand the difficulty of the situation. For our part we desire to express our pleasure in hearing this well-trained choral organization, and we hope the members will have pleasant recollections of their visit to this country.

At the concert given on June 20 (the only one of the three announced which we can report at present), the choir sang a dozen or so pieces including five Catalan popular songs from original compositions, one of which was by the energetic and able conductor Señor Don Lluís Millet, and as a grand finale the great Motet for double choir, 'Sing ye to the Lord,' by Bach. The choir formed a picturesque scene. The men were closely packed together, and the ladies, who remained seated while singing, wore their very attractive mantillas.

The tone had no special beauty or quality, but it made a charming blend in the pianos and pianissimos, in which much of the music presented abounded.

In fortes the tenors were penetrating and very unblendful, and they sang rather too eagerly and enthusiastically. With the lady sopranos were associated about a dozen or more boys whose voices again did not blend very well. Many of the pieces sung depended upon what we should describe as ad captandum colour effect rather than upon interesting part-writing, but they were often sung with agreeable lightness and delicacy. The sopranos displayed a bright resonance, the contraltos did not show much sonority, and the basses were fairly rich, some low notes being very effectively resonant. There was much to admire in the rhythmic attack and general alertness.

The most notable effort was the Bach motet, which is well known to all the leading choirs in this country. The performance of the Catalonians was to us at least a novel interpretation. The first movement was for some time taken almost Adagio, but it quickened up somewhat. The beautiful and pathetic Andante sostenuto lost much of its appeal owing to the very slow tempo at which it was taken. The later movements were taken at greatly varied tempi, ritards and vehement accelerandos being features. It seemed to us that the rhythm was treated too freely, and that in consequence some of the dignity of the great work was sacrificed. The balance of the two choirs was not very good, the sopranos in the first choir being weak sometimes to the point almost of inaudibility. The tenors again were rather intrusively energetic.

The choir had the great advantage of the assistance of Señora Maria Barrientos, a coloratura soprano of conspicuous ability. Although not always precisely in tune, her execution and control were remarkable. She could apparently do what she liked with the D in alt. Another attraction was

VALUE OF COMPETITIVE FESTIVALS.

The following letter appeared in the Daily Telegraph on May 27:

SIR,—The musical Festival of the three counties of Bucks, Berkshire, and Oxfordshire will be held this year at Beaconsfield from June 9 to 13. Though I do not doubt that both you and the hon. organizing secretary (Mrs. Commeline, of the Rectory, Beaconsfield) are to be trusted to emphasise the fact much better than I could, I cannot refrain from writing you a line or two about the real value of the event when it happens in the town where I live. I cannot pretend to even that smattering of the subject which has made me rejoice in the success of our local experiments in some other arts and crafts; but I feel strongly that there are several broad reasons why this Festival should not be neglected even by the non-musical or those, if any, who are as ignorant as I am.

The first is that England ought to be and could be a very musical nation, and it is only by local activities that she can become so; the central citadels are necessarily in the possession of established reputations or of vested interests, and these are not always of a national type. In the Middle Ages we were regarded as the one great musical nation; and even much later the average of the habit was high. We did not produce great music in the same sense in which we speak of the sculpture of the Greeks; but we did produce what might be compared with the wood-carving of the Flemish and the French. Unfortunately, later we fell into the habit of sulking about the arts, which is almost unsportsmanlike. When we were told that Frenchmen could dance, we left off dancing; and since we admitted that Frenchmen cooked better we have not cooked at all.

The second importance of such a thing, I think, is that the revival of this country will probably come through the ancient and very national institution of the counties. What we may call the humours of England are very largely the humours of the counties. Already it has shown in fifty sports a power of fighting without quarrelling; an emulation that can end in laughter. But there is no reason why the more intellectual arts should not be managed on the same model; and the county patriotism encourage music as it does encourage cricket.

The third reason is that it will happen at Beaconsfield and will be very exciting. I had a glimpse of it once myself when the musical Festival was held at Newbury, and it was the only thing that ever reminded me of a popular pilgrimage; so that even if I did not understand the music, I should still understand the Festival.—Yours, &c.,

G. K. CHESTERTON.

PEOPLE'S PALACE, MILE END.—May 12-23.

This Festival is effecting a vast amount of good in a thickly-populated neighbourhood. Many of the results are of the highest class. It is difficult to believe that any general criticism of the educational value of competitions could survive actual experience of the whole event.

Vocal Trio (Female, advanced).—Test: 'We strew these opiate flowers' (S. Coleridge-Taylor). Three entries. 1st, St. Mary's, Stratford-Bow (Misses Bullock and Holt and Mrs. Thorburn).

MIDLAND COMPETITION FESTIVAL, BIRMINGHAM.—May 19-23

(Held over from June number.)

'Sing ye to the Lord' (Bach). (Two selections.)

NO. 1.—COVENTRY CO-OPERATIVE FESTIVAL CHOIR.

(Mr. John Potter.)

(A)	10,	10,	10,	10,	18,	36	=	94
(B)	9,	8,	10,	10,	17,	32	=	86

Tied with Barrow (3rd prize) 180

(A).—Fine vitality. Almost effervescent in its warmth. Perhaps sopranos a trifle keen? Splendid rhythmic life, and attack first-rate. Last movement very jubilant. A little hurried; but a really thrilling interpretation. Kept pitch. Some gorgeous moments. Tone often rich, but not a special feature. Fine technique.

(B).—A quaver beat. Query good. Too slow. Not much as a rhythmic appeal. Beautifully sung as tone and feeling. Devotional. Prayerful.

NO. 2.—BRITON FERRY CHORAL SOCIETY.

(Mr. Evan Morris.)

(A).—Nearly all from memory. A good stride in the rhythm. Not very fast. Tone fair. Trebles had some 'acid' in their tone. The second choir a better general blend. Execution fluent. Basses somewhat hollow resonance. Smart pace. Too neat; but technique excellent. Ample vitality. Fine enthusiasm. To them it was evidently something to sing and love. Fine glow.

(B).—Again slow, but not so slow as No. 1. Beautifully expressed. Much tenderness. An appeal because infused with sincerity. From the point of view very well interpreted.

(A)	10,	10,	9,	10,	16,	35	=	90
(B)	9,	9,	10,	10,	17,	33	=	88

(Certificate) 178

NO. 3.—BLACKPOOL GLEE AND MADRIGAL SOCIETY.

(Mr. Herbert Whittaker.)

(A).—Quicker than either No. 1 or No. 2. Nearer the pace. Second choir—sopranos weak in the balance. The tread of the rhythm was majestic. Fine, rich bass tone, especially at the Vivace. This movement was finely handled. Exhilarating. Controlled fervency. The musical 'bite' of the attack was a feature.

(B).—Beautifully blended. The dialogue between the two choirs well characterized. Although somewhat slow it was a rhythmic appeal. Deeply devotional. Very fine performance.

(A)	10,	10,	10,	10,	19,	36	=	95
(B)	10,	10,	10,	10,	19,	36	=	95

(1st prize) 190

NO. 4.—WALSALL MADRIGAL SOCIETY.

(Mr. Frank Mullings.)

(A).—Attack too intense. A sort of declamatory style. Pinching the tone. So many accents. Excellent as attack. Sometimes too vehement. Vivace: The tone better. Had some brilliant qualities; not enough wave in the rhythm. All blows! Some big curves possible here. As vitality splendid.

(B).—The pace better. The chorale part always loud. The comments of the first choir always soft—hushed. 'Like sheep': why so much accent in this beautiful bit? Later, too many effects. Lost pitch a little.

(A)	10,	9,	9,	10,	17,	33	=	88
(B)	10,	9,	9,	10,	16,	36	=	90

(Certificate) 178

NO. 5.—MR. T. APPLEBY MATTHEWS'S BIRMINGHAM CHOIR. (Mr. T. Appleby Matthews.)

(A).—Good pace. On the side of piquancy and neatness. The vowels not allowed enough chance. All crispness. Tone musical, if not imposingly resonant. Vivace: Almost dainty. Resilient. But was this the right style? Something bigger and grander—more imposing—called for. Hurried in places.

(A)	10,	8,	9,	9,	16,	32	=	84
------------	-----	----	----	----	-----	----	---	----

(Certificate) 178

NO. 6.—THE BIRMINGHAM SELECT CHOIR AND MADRIGAL SOCIETY. (Mr. R. W. North.)

(A).—Tone good, but with no special sonority. The execution not fluent, gave one the impression that there were 'passengers.' Intonation not always true. Vivace: Good pace, but not ideal unity. A little exhausted. Trebles very good. Basses ditto. A brilliant end.

(B).—Andante sostenuto. Four in bar; I think this is best. A fair rhythmic swing. The attack not very good. Bass a fine tone. Tenor rather hard. Nice feeling. Some intrusive expansions. Chording fair. No special distinction in the interpretation.

(A)	10,	9,	10,	9,	16,	34	=	88
(B)	10,	8,	9,	9,	15,	30	=	81

(Certificate) 169

NO. 7.—MR. ALDOUS'S LANCASTER CHOIR.

(Mr. J. W. Aldous.)

(A).—Did not seize the rhythm immediately. Not in the stride for some time. A broad style, but with no special vitality. Some fine moments, because the tone had blendful quality. Basses—'oo' quality. Vivace: Not treated feverishly. Some charm of colour imparted, but it deserves more impelling rhythm. Sopranos excellent. Not a special appeal.

(B).—Slow, but with some glow and infinite tenderness. The wave of the expansion without a splash. Well-judged effect. A fine interpretation. Full of feeling.

(A)	9,	9,	10,	10,	16,	33	=	87
(B)	10,	10,	10,	10,	18,	36	=	94

(2nd prize) 181

NO. 8.—BARROW-IN-FURNESS MADRIGAL SOCIETY.

(Mrs. T. M. Bourne.)

(A).—Pretty quality of tone. Soprano vocalisation a point. Well blended. Proportion of tone at various fortes well measured. Vivace: One beat in the bar. Did not come off very well. Some unsteadiness; improved. Some labour in the rhythm. Choir seemed to find it hard to measure divisions. Not happy.

* Scale of Marks. Accuracy 10, Rhythm 10, Diction 10, Intonation 10, Tone 20, Interpretation and General Effect 40=100.

(B).—Beauty of sostenuto and chording a speciality. Slow, eight in bar. Some differentiation of the choirs was a feature. Tenor tone very good. An appeal in the expression.

(A) ...	9,	9,	10,	10,	17,	33	=	88
(B) ...	10,	10,	10,	10,	17,	35	=	92

NO. 9.—ESSENDINE CHOIR, PADDINGTON.

(Mr. William Kendall.)

(A).—A sober, deliberate pace. Had no glow. Dragged. Tone fair—no special sonority. The runs not comfortably vocalised. Attack got ragged in places. Lacked unity. Vivace: Light—part-song style. Too much restrained. Pianos introduced. Laboured. Bass nice tone.

---------	----	----	----	----	-----	----	---	----

As noted in our last issue, the great motet was sung by the combined choirs with magnificent effect.

W. G. McNAUGHT.

The 'Mary Wakefield' challenge shield (which was presented to the Festival by the prize-winners at the 1913 Festival) was won for the third time by the Mixed (girls and boys) Choir from Grove Lane School, Handsworth (conductor, Mr. J. A. Toy).

In the class for Adult Mixed-Voice Choirs from Midland Counties the test was any section from the cantata, 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' (Coleridge-Taylor). Five choirs entered, and the first-prize was awarded to Mr. A. J. Cotton's Choir, Moseley. The Willenhall Choir (Mr. E. Dunton) was placed second. The whole five choirs combined to give the work complete, with Mr. Frank Titterton as soloist and the Birmingham and Midland Institute School of Music orchestra. It says much for the ability of all concerned that without a combined rehearsal Mr. J. A. Rodgers secured an admirable performance.

ACOCKS GREEN BOYS' SCHOOL (MR. S. A. SMITH).

Test: Two selections from 'The singing leaves,' Rathbone.

Boys.—(A) Fresh, natural tone. Smooth. Delicate piano. Vitality of the rhythm a feature. All well unified. Solo by several boys—excellent. Beautiful voices—training evident. 'Then came the turn' beautifully sung—staccato perhaps too short. Intonation nearly always perfect. The expansions at the climax finely managed. Dramatic instinct here! (B) The evidence of taste was constant. Lento fast. Climaxes afterwards splendid. Altogether excellent from every point of view.

95 marks out of 100 ... (first prize).

EAST LINCOLNSHIRE, SPILSBY.—April 27, 28.

The following report corrects and adds to that given in our June issue: Novice choirs: 1st, Hogsthorpe. Villages: 1st, Gunby, Welton, Candlesby (combined). Choral Societies: Tests: 'My love dwelt in a northern land' (Elgar); 'My delight' (Parry); Act 2 'Orpheus' (Gluck); and sight-reading. 1st, Alford; 2nd, Burgh. Female-Voice Choirs: 1st, Gunby and Welton, and in another section Spilsby, which was also victorious in the male-voice choir class. The combined performance of Act 2 of Gluck's 'Orpheus,' with soloists and orchestra, was the strong feature of the evening concert.

COUNTY WEXFORD FEIS.

On May 30 and June 1 the annual County Wexford Feis was held at New Ross, and the attendances on each day numbered from 15,000 to 20,000 persons. On the first day the proceedings consisted of games, oratory, band competitions, war pipes, dancing, &c., the Feis being formally opened by Lord Ashbourne, who wore the traditional Irish kilt. The second day was given up to literary and musical competitions. One of the keenest contests was for the silver shield for mixed choirs. Three choirs entered, namely, Wexford, Enniscorthy, and New Ross, and the result was in favour of the first-named by a few points. The unison choirs and female trios were also of a high standard, but the same cannot be said of the solos. There were also competitions for pianoforte solos, violin and pianoforte, and traditional fiddle. The musical adjudicators were Mr. Robert O'Dwyer, Mr. Louis O'Brien, and Mr. P. Delaney. A grand concert by the prize-winners concluded the performances.

KENT FESTIVAL, DOVER—May 20-23.

This Festival continues to make progress. The entries numbered 360, compared with 212 when the Competition was inaugurated a decade ago. The strenuous work of the hon. secretary, Mr. Walter Day, of Maidstone, has been the chief factor in this success. In recognition of his services the Committee have presented him with a rose-bowl.

The Maidstone Choral Union was first and Mr. Leslie Mackay's Choir was second in the female-voice, the male-voice, and the choral societies classes. The Watlington Choral Society was first in the village choral section. Paddock Wood was first in the village orchestras class. In the church and chapel choir class, in which the tests were 'I will arise' (Creyghton) and 'The eyes of the Lord' (John E. West), Grace Hill Wesleyan was first. The solo-singing winners were Miss D. E. V. Tobin (soprano), Miss K. Bishop (mezzo-soprano), Miss Pender (contralto), Mr. Rees Dier (tenor), Mr. Neville S. Fletcher (baritone), and Mr. L. A. Brett (bass). There were classes for violin, violoncello, pianoforte duet, accompaniment, vocal quartet, string quartets and trios, and school-choir singing. The adjudicators were Mr. F. Cunningham Woods, Mr. Dan Price, Mrs. Helen Trust, Mr. George Langley, and Mr. Charlton Palmer. The school results are given in the SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW.

HEREFORD.—(Whit-Monday).

This Festival was again held with considerable success. It speaks very well for the zeal with which music is cultivated in the district catered for that large numbers of amateurs were willing to devote their holiday to the exhibition and comparison of the result of their studies. Amongst the successful choirs were Hereford Baptist Ladies and Weston-under-Penyard. But the most striking choral event was the fine performance of the splendid chorus, 'Glory to God in the Highest,' from Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio,' by the Hereford Harmonic Society, under the able conductorship of Mr. Hubert Hampton. Dr. McNaught adjudicated.

TREORCHY (near CARDIFF).

This Eisteddfod attracted good entries and large audiences on Whit-Tuesday and Wednesday, June 2, 3. There was some first-rate choral-singing. Dr. Coward and Dr. McNaught adjudicated.

BRISTOL EXHIBITION.—June 3.

Some of the competitions announced in connection with this venture took place on the above date, but, as owing to financial difficulties the Exhibition had to be temporarily closed and its affairs placed in the hands of a Receiver, there is some doubt as to whether the remaining competitions announced will be held.

On June 2 there were solo-singing competitions in which Mr. T. Brenig Jones, of Stepaside, and Miss Florence Hanlin, of Bridgwater, were first-prize winners. Three ladies' choirs competed, and the first place was won by the Mansfield Choir (Mr. W. F. Marshman) from Northampton.

In the chief choral class there were only two entries. The tests were (a) Wesley's 'In exitu Israel' and (b) Max Bruch's 'Morning song of praise.' The first place was awarded to the Bristol Cecilian Choral Society (Mr. Charles Read), which gained 167 marks. Llanelly Royal Choir (Mr. John Thomas) was given 164 marks. Only one prize of £150 had been offered. After conferring with the conductors, and before the result was made known to anyone, the adjudicators, who were Sir Frederic Cowen and Dr. McNaught, settled to award £100 to the first choir and £50 to the second. This award was received with vociferous dissatisfaction by the Llanelly choir. We have no desire to dwell further upon a disagreeable episode.

LYTHAM (LANCASHIRE).—June 10-13.

This happily-managed Festival continues to flourish, although its existence is year by year threatened by the inadequacy of the accommodation afforded by the town. The Pier Hall, in which perforce the Festival is held, is exposed to all vicissitudes of weather, and its limited ante-rooms allow of no comfortable organization of the numbers of competitors who attend, yet the event attracts excellent entries from near and far: a result of the genial management already noted. It is found necessary to apportion four days for the work.

The twenty-seven classes into which the competition is divided include violin, pianoforte, mixed-voice choirs of several grades, male-voice and female-voice choirs, school choirs, and solo-singing in many sections. The tests generally were of the highest class. The chief results were as follows:

SOLO-SINGING.

Soprano.—Miss Clarice Hulme, Altrincham.
 Contralto.—Miss A. Pollard, Burnley.
 Tenor.—Mr. H. Clegg, Accrington.
 Bass or Baritone.—Mr. R. Hill, Stretford.
 Junior Girls.—Miss B. Street, Blackpool.
 Junior Boys.—W. Mitchell, Elland.
 Violin.—Miss D. Eglin, Blackpool.
 Pianoforte.—Miss Gladys L. Dawson, Liverpool; Miss M. Brown, Stretford.

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS (six entries).

Tests: 'Dream, baby' (Percy Fletcher).
 'The death of Trenar' (Brahms).

- 1st. Blackpool Glee and Madrigal (Mr. H. Whittaker).
- 2nd. Blackpool Orpheus (Mr. Clifford Higgin).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (nine entries).

SMALL CHOIRS.

Tests: 'Springtime' (Beethoven).
 'The boy' (A. H. Brewer).

- 1st. Goodshaw Glee Union (Mr. Burnet Peel).
- 2nd. Hebden Bridge (Mr. H. Greenwood).

LARGE CHOIRS (three entries).

The tests in this class were unusually severe, being 'Lucifer in starlight' (Bantock) and Brahms's Alto Rhapsody, each choir having to bring a soloist, who was also judged separately. Todmorden (Mr. Harold Lees) sang splendidly, and once again showed that they are one of the finest first-grade choirs in the country. They and their soloist were awarded first place.

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (five entries).

This class excited much attention alike because of the character of the tests and the high grade of the choirs that entered. The tests were 'When love and beauty' (Sullivan), 'How blest are they' (Tchaikovsky), 'Go, song of mine' (Elgar). We regret we have not space for criticism of the performance; it must suffice to say that Mr. H. Whittaker's Blackpool Society were placed first with 288 marks out of 300. Their performance of 'Go, song of mine'—at once one of the most difficult and beautiful of Elgar's choral songs—was an exceptionally fine one. Sale (Mr. A. Higson) came second with 281 marks.

The adjudicators were Dr. W. G. McNaught, Mr. C. H. Fogg, and Mr. Percy Fletcher.

School choir results are given in the SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW.

BERKS, BUCKS, AND OXON.—June 9-13.

This Festival was held at Beaconsfield. The promoters risked a good deal in deciding to hold it in a marquee, but fortunately the weather was not unfavourable. The singing, especially that of the schools, was very highly praised by the adjudicators. The concerts by combined choirs were a feature.

The chief results were:

Solo-Singing.—Soprano, Miss L. Peake (Oxford); Contralto, Miss S. Peake (Oxford); Tenor, Mr. W. Holden (Beaconsfield); Bass, Mr. H. Lewis (Oxford).

Female Choirs (Class 4b).—1st, Saunderton and District.

Choral Societies (Class 1).—1st, St. Mary's, Beaconsfield.

Female Choirs.—Little Hall Barn Singing Class.

Organ Solo.—1st, Mr. C. Teal (Oxford).

Male-Voice Choirs.—1st, Wooburn.

Female Choirs (Class 4a).—1st, Oxford Ladies' Choir.

Choral Societies (Class 1a).—Rev. B. C. S. Everett's Choir; (Class 1b).—1st, Brightwell Musical Society; (Class 1c).—1st, Brightwell.

Full Orchestra.—1st, Beaconsfield Orchestral Society (Miss F. Marshall).

String Orchestra.—1st, Wycombe Abbey School Orchestra (Miss L. Gibson); 2nd, Beaconsfield Orchestral Society.

Violin and Pianoforte: Miss B. Ireland and Miss K. Brown.

Boys' Solo.—1st, Master R. Tucker, High Wycombe.

Choirs of Men and Boys (c).—1st, Saunderton Church Choir.

Chorus of Female-Voices (Girls' Clubs).—1st (divided), Girls' Fellowship Club, Oxford, and Windsor Y.W.C.A.

Choirs of Men and Boys (a).—1st, Beaconsfield Church Choir.

Choirs of Female Voices (Teachers).—1st, Langley-Marish Central School Teachers.

Choirs of Men and Boys.—1st, St. John's, Aylesbury; 2nd, St. Giles' Parish Church, Reading.

The adjudicators were Dr. Walford Davies, Dr. Herbert Brewer, Mr. S. Nicholson, and Mr. W. Ackroyd.

FEIS CEOIL, DUBLIN (May 4 to 9).—Our report in June omitted to state that the £5 prize for small orchestras with pianoforte went to the Cecilian Orchestra, Dublin (Mr. Desmond Fitzgerald). The entries for the competitions numbered 585. The largest number for any one competition was fifty-seven, for the junior pianoforte.

DATES OF COMPETITIONS AND NAMES OF SECRETARIES.

FESTIVAL OF EMPIRE GIRLS' CHOIR.—July 8. Mr. Granville Humphreys, 85, Elms Road, Clapham, S.W.

WINCHMORE HILL.—July 11. Mr. Norman Chant, 44, Palace Road, Crouch End, N.

BLACKPOOL.—October 12 to 17. Mr. Lionel H. Franceys Musical Festival Offices, Blackpool.

THREE TOWNS (PLYMOUTH).—October. Mr. J. H. Lucas, 62, Hill Park Crescent, Plymouth.

KEIGHLEY ('SUMMERSCALES').—October 24 and 31. Mr. Allan Bradley, 96, Cavendish Street, Keighley.

NOTTINGHAM.—October 31. Mr. F. Purdy, 1, Claremont Terrace, Francis Street, Nottingham.

CRYSTAL PALACE MUSICAL COMPETITION FESTIVAL.—November 7. Mr. Granville Humphreys, Crystal Palace, S.E.

HASTINGS.—November 23, 24, 25. Mr. John Lockey, 47, Havelock Road.

Other competitions are reported in the SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW.

the fine violin-playing of Señor don Joan Mañen. He gave a brilliant performance of Mendelssohn's Violin concerto, in which he was supported by the New Symphony Orchestra, conducted by L. Camilieri.

The audience was small compared with the huge size of the arena, but it made up for this paucity of numbers by displaying a fervent enthusiasm that resulted in several encores and numerous recalls.

THE MUSIC CLUB.

We regret that we can do no more than record the brilliant gathering brought together by the Music Club on June 21, at the Grafton Galleries. Dr. Richard Strauss, guest of the evening, accompanied Lady Speyer in his Violin sonata, Miss Lena Ashwell recited Mr. Kalisch's translation of Uhland's 'Das Schloss am Meere,' while Mr. Stanley Hawley played Strauss's music. Herr Arthur Nikisch conducted Strauss's Serenade for thirteen wind instruments and the 'Siegfried Idyll,' and accompanied Miss Elena Gerhardt in songs. Many distinguished English and foreign musicians were present.

London Concerts.

THE ORIANA MADRIGAL SOCIETY.

This enterprising and highly capable choir gave what was one of the most interesting concerts of the season at the Duke's Hall, Royal Academy of Music, on May 26. Amid much that was of value, both as music and as interpretation, it is impossible to particularize. The older examples in the programme were the following:

Madrigals—

'Round about her chariot'	Ellis Gibbons.
'Love not me for comely grace'	Wilbye.
'This sweet and merry month of May'	Byrd.
'O yes, has any found a lad?'	Thomas Tomkins.

Ballet—

'Now is the month of maying'	Morley.
--------------------------------------	---------

together with Ayres and Rounds for solo voices. The selections from modern music included Stanford's six-part motet, 'Eternal Father,' Walford Davies's 'Magdalen at Michael's gate,' Bantock's six-part 'Nocturne,' Percy Grainger's 'Brigg Fair,' W. G. Whittaker's arrangement of 'Sir John Fenwick,' and Balfour Gardiner's 'Cargoes.' The choir, under Mr. C. Kennedy Scott's direction, gave constant evidence of their useful and well-inspired training. The interest of the occasion was further heightened by the playing of the Chaplin Trio on viols. Miss Grainger Kerr gave songs, among which were included Mr. Hamilton Harty's 'Across the door,' 'A cradle-song,' and 'The Rachray man.'

QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA.

In the absence of Sir Henry Wood the 'Parsifal' concert on May 23 was conducted by Herr Artur Bodansky, who, as he was associated with the 'Parsifal' production at Covent Garden, was the right man in the right place. The programme contained all the popular excerpts from 'Parsifal,' including the 'Herzeleide' music from the second Act, in which Miss Carrie Tubb interpreted the part of Kundry with great effect. Miss Tubb also sang the closing Scene from 'Götterdämmerung.'

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A programme of varied significance was chosen for the concert under Herr Mengelberg at Queen's Hall on May 25. The interest centred in the performance of Strauss's 'Don Quixote,' which had more of efficiency than of imagination. Mr. Patterson Parker's reading of the violoncello solo, however, was full of merit. Saint-Saëns's unattractive Pianoforte concerto in G minor was played by Miss Enid Brandt. The remainder consisted of two works of superlative worth—Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer Night's Dream' Overture and Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony.

A special concert was given at Queen's Hall on June 4, when this Orchestra played under the direction of Signor Camilieri. Wagner excerpts, a piece from Catalani's opera 'La Wally,' and an Overture by Glazounov (No. 1) on three Greek popular themes were features of the programme. It was, however, Miss Florence Macbeth's singing that engaged the chief attention. Her coloratura execution was, as usual, exceptionally brilliant.

Herr Nikisch conducted at the concert on June 8, when the programme consisted of three Symphonies: those of Haydn in G, Schubert in B minor, and Beethoven in A, all of which were superbly played. The audience occupied every seat in the house.

M. Paderewski made the chief attraction on June 15. His playing of his own A minor Pianoforte concerto was of extraordinary brilliance and poetry. Under Herr Nikisch the Orchestra played Elgar's ever-welcome 'Enigma' Variations, Mozart's G minor Symphony, Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel,' and Wagner's 'Rienzi' Overture.

SLAVONIC MUSIC.

The first of three orchestral concerts given by M. Emil Mlynarski at Queen's Hall to illustrate the music of Slav composers, took place on June 6 with a programme devoted to works by Glazounov. The chief work in the programme was the vigorous Symphony No. 4 in E flat. The variety of style encompassed by Glazounov's music was brought into relief by the inclusion of the Violin concerto in A minor (with M. Grigorovitch as soloist), the new Pianoforte concerto in F minor (with Miss Elly Heschelin as soloist), and the Symphonic-poem 'Stenka Razin.' The London Symphony Orchestra played finely under M. Mlynarski's direction. At the concert on June 17 Mr. Ernest Schelling played with great power and expression Rimsky-Korsakov's Concerto in C sharp minor and Paderewski's Polish Fantasia in C sharp minor. The playing of Wischnegradski's Symphony in A called attention to the talent and somewhat diffuse manner of one of the lesser-known Russians. A fourth composer, Karlovicz, was represented by a 'Lithuanian Rhapsody.'

Among the events of personal interest in the present season none have been more interesting than the return to the London concert-platform of Madame Tetrassini and Madame Clara Butt. The famous Italian prima donna appeared as the most distinguished of a 'star' company at the Albert Hall on June 4. By opening with Verdi's 'Ah! fors e lui' she gave an instant reminder of her first triumphs in this country and showed that her technique is as facile and as marvellous as ever. Eckert's 'Echo song' and Félicien David's 'Couplets du Mysoli' gave further proof that her extraordinary gifts remain undiminished.

Madame Clara Butt, with Mr. Kennerley Rumford, made her reappearance at the Albert Hall on June 6 before an immense audience. Her magnificent voice, which seems never to cease developing in power and range of expression, was heard to great advantage in Verdi's 'O don fatale,' Beethoven's 'Creation's Hymn,' Herbert Hughes's 'I know my love,' and other numbers equally varied. Mr. Kennerley Rumford's chief success was secured in the famous 'Largo al factotum' from Rossini's 'Il barbiere.'

Two admirable Sonata-recitals were given by M. Paul Kochanski (violin) and Mr. Arthur Rubinstein at Bechstein Hall on May 25 and June 13. The two artists, each of high rank, worked together with notable unity. On the first occasion they played the works of Brahms in A major, Szymanowski in D minor, and Beethoven's 'Kreutzer.' On the second they were heard in Korngold's Sonata, and Mr. Paul Draper introduced a new and interesting song-cycle, 'Des Hafis Liebeslieder' by Szymanowski.

The Folk-Song Quartet and the Monique Poole String Quartet gave a joint recital at Æolian Hall on June 4. Dr. Walford Davies's Six Pastorals were excellently sung, with the composer at the pianoforte. The instrumental Quartet were heard in Percy Grainger's 'Molly on the shore,' and other works.

The presence of Herr Kreisler as solo violinist lent distinction to the concert given by Madame Alexia Bassian (vocalist), with Miss Adelina de Lara (pianoforte), at Queen's Hall, on June 8. He played the 'Devil's Trill' Sonata of Tartini, and Bach's unaccompanied Adagio and Fugue in G minor. Madame Bassian's songs included Bantock's 'Lament of Isis,' and Dr. Vaughan Williams's 'The roadside fire'; Miss de Lara was heard with Mr. Sydney Rosenbloom in the arrangement for two pianofortes of Brahms's Variations on Haydn's 'St. Anthony' Chorale. The two lady artists mentioned, in company with Mr. Thomas Fussell, gave an interesting 'Matinée' concert at Claridge's Hotel on May 29.

M. Jacques Thibaud added to the interest created by his playing at Bechstein Hall on June 9 by securing a double string quartet, with additional assistance at the organ by Mr. Wharton Wells, for accompaniment. He was heard in Tivadar Nachèz's arrangement of Vivaldi's A minor Concerto, and in Chausson's D major Concerto for violin, pianoforte, and string quartet.

On June 16 Mr. Robert Lortat (pianoforte) gave the first of three recitals to be devoted to the whole of M. Gabriel Faure's compositions for the pianoforte, and many of his other works. Besides giving a number of solos he accompanied Lady Speyer in the Violin sonata in A major, and Mlle. Germaine Sanderson in songs.

The twenty-eighth annual concert of the South Hampstead Orchestra took place under Mrs. Julian Marshall's direction at Queen's Hall on June 16. Brahms's fourth Symphony and Bruch's G minor Violin concerto, with Miss Isolde Menges as soloist, were the principal numbers. Songs were given by Mr. Robert Maitland.

Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony and Mendelssohn's 'Ruy Blas' Overture were among the works performed by the Royal Engineers' Orchestra under Mr. Neville Flux at Queen's Hall on May 20.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

Rameau's 'Pièces de Clavecin en concert,' and Pianoforte trios by Godard, Op. 32, Volkmann, Op. 5, and Beethoven, Op. 1, were played by Miss Lena Sykes (pianoforte), Madame Beatrice Langley (violin), and Mr. Warwick Evans (violinello), at Bechstein Hall on May 28.

The programme of Mr. Holbrooke's last concert of the season, given at the Arts Centre on May 29, included a 'Fantaisie' for string quartet by Richard Cleveland, songs by Alfred Hale and Edward Mitchell, and pianoforte solos by Wilfrid Kershaw. These were heard for the first time. Dr. Ethel Smyth's Quartet in E minor, and four Dances for pianoforte and strings by Josef Holbrooke were also played. The artists were Messrs. Sammons, Petrie, Tertis, Withers, and Sharpe (strings), Mr. Kershaw and Mr. Holbrooke (pianoforte), and Mr. David Brazell (vocalist).

Mr. Dunhill opened a new series of British chamber music concerts on June 9. The new concerted works produced, all of great interest, were a Suite for clarinet and pianoforte by Dr. C. Harford Lloyd, a Trio for clarinet, violoncello, and pianoforte by John Ireland, and a set of Variations for violoncello and pianoforte on 'Sally in our alley,' by Mr. Dunhill. Songs, including a new setting of Walt Whitman's 'When I heard the learned astronomer,' by Dr. Bairstow, were sung by Mr. George Parker. The clarinetist and violoncellist were Mr. Charles Draper and Miss May Mukle.

The second of Mr. Dunhill's concerts introduced a Quartet in miniature by R. O. Morris and a Quartet in E flat major by Dr. Charles Wood, both played by the Grimson Quartet. A group of songs, including one by Miss May Mukle, was interpreted by Miss Margaret Champneys. We regret our inability to deal adequately with this excellent concert.

An interesting programme was performed by the enterprising London String Quartet on June 10. In addition to two tried favourites in Vaughan Williams's Phantasy Quintet (with Mr. Lockyer as the extra viola) and Debussy's Quartet in G minor, the scheme included Schönberg's Quartet with soprano solo, Op. 10—its first performance in England. The work is of the type that we have come to expect from its composer, containing as it does passages of extraordinary beauty alternated with others that torture the ear, the beauty being in this case almost entirely confined to the last two movements. Miss Carrie Tubb sang the ungrateful vocal part very skilfully, and also gave enjoyable performances of songs by Sibelius and Mozart. The audience was large and appreciative.

At Æolian Hall on June 10 the London Trio gave a concert that upheld the esteem in which their powers are held. They played Brahms's Trio in E flat and (in company with Mr. Eugene Goossens, jun., and Mr. Ernest Tomlinson) Dvorák's A major Pianoforte quintet. Miss Ivy Lusi (vocalist) and Madame Amina Goodwin gave solos.

Tchaikovsky's Pianoforte trio in A minor and Saint-Saëns's Trio in F major were played by Miss Muriel Herbert (pianoforte), Mr. Antonio de Grassi (violin), and Mr. Emil Krall (violinello) at Steinway Hall on June 10. Songs were given by Mr. George Parker.

The Trio de Lutèce, whose members are Mr. George Barrère (flute), M. Paul Kéfer (violinello), and Señor Carlos Salzedo (pianoforte), made their first appearance at Bechstein Hall on June 12, Mr. Ivor James taking the place of M. Kéfer, who was indisposed. The players showed that with skill and good study high artistic results can be obtained from the combination. Mr. Murray Davey sang songs of his own and Madame Poldowski's.

Some commendable playing was provided by the Mary Blash Quartet at Steinway Hall on June 17. Songs were given by Miss Mary Epps.

VOCAL RECITALS.

Two recitals have been given by the incomparable Liedersinger, Elena Gerhardt. They took place at Bechstein Hall on June 9, when Mr. Hamilton Harty was accompanist, and at Queen's Hall on June 18, when Herr Arthur Nikisch gave his invaluable assistance. The programmes were of typically high quality and interest.

Madame Agnes Nicholls, accompanied by Mr. Hamilton Harty, gave an enjoyable recital at Bechstein Hall on June 18. A special feature was made of six 'Songs of Ireland' by Mr. Harty which made an excellent impression.

Madame Geertruida Vogel, 8, Maida Vale—'Wiegenlied an der Krippe des Christkinds (1609).'

Miss Cicely Bankes, Steinway Hall, May 21—'Voi che sapete,' Mozart.

Miss Helen Henschel, Bechstein Hall, May 21—British traditional airs.

 Mr. John Powell, Æolian Hall, June 5—'Sonata Teutonica,' Powell.
 Mr. Max Pauer, Bechstein Hall, June 5—Variations and Fugue on a theme of Bach, Max Reger.
 M. Benno Moiseiwitsch, Bechstein Hall, June 6—Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue, Bach.
 Madame Elly Heschelin, Bechstein Hall, June 10—Variations and Fugue on a theme by Handel, Brahms.
 Mr. Walter Scott, Bechstein Hall, June 11—Sonata in C major, Beethoven.
 M. de Pachmann, Queen's Hall, June 13—Thirty-two variations, Beethoven.
 Miss Fanny Davies, Æolian Hall, June 17—Sonata in E major, (Op. 109), Beethoven.
 M. Henri Gilles, Steinway Hall, June 17—Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, Franck.

VIOLIN RECITALS.

Mr. Frank Gittelson, Bechstein Hall, May 23—Chaconne, Bach.
 Miss Daisy Kennedy, Æolian Hall, May 26—Sonata, 'Le Tombeau,' Léclaire.

M. André de Ribaupierre, accompanied by Mr. Rudolph Ganz, Steinway Hall, June 3—Sonatas by Busoni in E minor, J. Alden Carpenter in G major, and César Franck.
 Signorina Valentina Crespi, Bechstein Hall, June 6—Concerto in F minor, Ernst.
 Fräulein Mary Zimmer, Æolian Hall, June 10—Concerto in E minor, Vieuxtemps.
 M. Anton Maaskov, Bechstein Hall, June 17—Sonata in A, Brahms.

OTHER RECITALS.

Miss Ruth Eyre (pianoforte), Miss Dorothy Thirkell White (violin), and Miss Mary Mora von Goetz (vocalist), Æolian Hall, May 20—Sonata in A for violin and pianoforte, Brahms; 'Wiegenlied,' Brahms.
 Miss Kathleen Mera (vocalist) and Mr. Handley-Davies (violin), Steinway Hall, May 21—Songs by Caroline Curtis; Violin sonata in G major, Grieg.
 Mr. Dettmar Dressel (violin) and Mr. Otto Dressel (pianoforte), Æolian Hall, May 21—Violin sonata in C major, Mozart.
 Miss Isolde Menges (violin) and Madame Donalda (vocalist), Queen's Hall, May 21—Concerto, Brahms; 'Deh vieni,' Mozart.
 Miss Rhoda Simpson (violin) and Mr. Cecil Law (pianoforte), Æolian Hall, May 24—Chaconne, Vitali; Sonata in B minor, Liszt.
 The Misses Mabel and Marjorie Lockhart (vocalist and pianoforte), Bechstein Hall, May 25—'Mainacht,' Brahms; 'Davidsbündler,' Schumann.
 Mr. Arnold Trowell (violoncello), Bechstein Hall, May 27—Suite in C minor, No. 5, Bach.
 Madame Anna Carola (vocalist), and Miss Johanna Heymann (pianoforte), Caxton Hall, May 27—'Dichterliebe,' Schumann; Soirée de Vienne, Liszt.
 Don Luis Figueras (violoncello), Æolian Hall, June 3—Sonata, Cervetto.
 Mr. Boris Hambourg (violoncello), Bechstein Hall, June 5—Courante in D major, Bach.
 Miss Julia Goldner (pianoforte), and Miss Steffi Goldner (harp), Steinway Hall, June 9—'In's Leben' and 'Mondnacht am See,' Carl Goldmark; 'Concert-study' for harp, Camillo Horn.
 Miss Johanna Heymann (pianoforte), Mr. Marcel Bonnemain (violin), and Miss Ethel Maas (vocalist), Steinway Hall, June 11—Sonata 'Le Tombeau,' Léclaire; Old French songs.
 Miss Polyxena Fletcher (pianoforte) and Miss Marie Motto (violin), Æolian Hall, June 14—Violin sonata in E flat, Beethoven; four Klavierstücke, Brahms.
 Mr. York Bowen (pianoforte) and Mrs. Sylvia York Bowen (vocalist), Æolian Hall, June 16—Sonata in B minor, Liszt; songs, York Bowen.

Some new songs by Miss K. Allitsen Hibbert to new verses by Miss Kathleen von Eckardstein—in which both collaborators showed high talent—were produced at Clarence House on June 10.

A series of 'Boosey matinée recitals' has been instituted at Æolian Hall. On May 22 the artists who appeared were Miss Jean Waterston, Mr. Robert Maitland (vocalists), and Mr. Cyril Scott, who played pianoforte works of his own. At a further recital on June 12 the programme was carried out by Miss Dilys Jones, Mr. John Coates, and Mr. Wilfrid Douthitt.

At Steinway Hall on May 23, Count de Souza displayed extraordinary expertness as a guitar-player. Pianoforte solos were given by Señor Pujol.

London University Musical Society gave an interesting concert on May 26. Bach's 'Christ lay in death's dark prison' and Parry's 'Lotos-eaters,' were the chief works in a programme that included madrigals and part-songs.

Old songs and ballads were sung by Miss Jean Sterling Mackinlay at Æolian Hall on May 28, with all the pointed delivery and significance of action that have made her interpretations famous.

Scenes from 'Lohengrin,' 'The daughter of the regiment,' 'Faust,' and 'Madama Butterfly,' were given by pupils of the Marylebone Operatic and Dramatic School on May 28, under the direction of Miss Florence von Etlinger.

A 'Matinée musicale,' arranged by Mr. Ernest W. Gilchrist, with the assistance of a number of artists, took place at Æolian Hall on June 9. The programme included Madame Liza Lehmann's cycle, 'Parody pie.'

Miss Marta Cunningham gave an extra 'Matinée musicale' at Claridge's Hotel on June 11. Among the artists who appeared Madame Merle Tillotson Alcock and Mr. Bechtel Alcock (vocalists), and Madame Backus-Behr (pianoforte) were new to London.

On June 11 Miss Cicely Trask gave a programme of 'Chansons anciennes' at the Arts Centre, and added a 'Rustic sketch' formed of old English ballads and folk-songs with scenery and connected action, the music of which was arranged by M. Gustave Ferrari.

Compositions by Miss Bluebell Klean that were introduced at Bechstein Hall on June 15 included a Pianoforte quintet in C minor, and songs interpreted by Miss Ada Crossley and Miss Xenia Beaver.

The artists who appeared at the Professional Musicians' Début Society's concert at Æolian Hall on June 15, were Miss Mary Hessel, Miss Maud Murray, Miss Ida Agnew, Miss Kathleen Joliffe, Signorina Emilia Scafidi, Mr. Thornley Grattan (vocalists), Mr. Harry Idle (violin), Signor Manlio di Veroli (pianoforte), and Miss Maud L. Arnold (violoncello).

The thirty-fourth annual Festival of the Church Sunday Schools took place with great success at the Crystal Palace on June 13. A choir of 5,000 voices sang under the direction of Mr. W. Schofield, with Mr. F. W. Belchamber as organist, and choral competitions proved an important part of the scheme.

The tenth annual Festival of the National Union of School Orchestras is reported in the School Music Review for July.

The forty-second London Sunday School Festival was held at the Crystal Palace on June 17. Mr. J. Wellard Matthews conducted the junior choir of 5,000, and Mr. William Whiteman the senior choir. The orchestra was directed by Mr. Wesley Hammett. Competitions for children's and adult choirs were successfully held.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BIRMINGHAM.

The Castellano Italian and English Opera Company paid a visit to the Prince of Wales Theatre, where they gave a week's operatic season from May 25 to May 30, producing 'Lucia di Lammermoor,' 'Rigoletto,' 'Il Trovatore,' 'Il Barbiere di Siviglia,' 'La Sonnambula,' 'Maritana,' and 'The Bohemian Girl.' They did not succeed in attracting large audiences; indeed, the houses were mostly half-empty. The orchestra was very poor and the chorus colourless. The only artists who really scored were the brilliant Swedish soprano, Miss Dirgis, a delightful coloratura singer, and the excellent baritone, Signor Vail.

The Birmingham Strings Club held their second Chamber Concert in the new rooms of the Birmingham Royal Society of Artists, where they gave a performance of Beethoven's String quartet in C minor, Op. 18, No. 4, the performers being Miss Christine Ratcliff, Miss Hodgkinson, Miss Maggie Edser, and Miss Brenda Sichel. Some vocal quartets were given by Mrs. W. C. Hutchings, Miss England, Mr. Charles Hyde, and Mr. W. C. Hutchings. The feature of the concert was Miss Gertrude Fuller's magnificent performance of Vitali's 'Chaconne' for violin, which she played with so much success at the Town Hall at the Midland Competition Festival, then accompanied on the organ.

The chief musical event in June was the three weeks' season of Theatre Royal Promenade Concerts, from June 8 to June 27. A strong appeal was made for their support, as in the past years they have not quite paid their way. The attendance was certainly the largest since these excellent concerts were inaugurated ten years ago. The orchestra of about seventy performers is the best yet heard at the Promenades, Mr. John Saunders being the leader, and Mr. Landon Ronald conductor as usual. Mr. Max Mossel was once more the director, and succeeded in his arduous task. Several new works were introduced this season, and one was especially interested in the first performances here of Sir Edward Elgar's Symphonic study, 'Falstaff,' and Rachmaninov's Symphony in E minor, Op. 2. The list of artists who appeared during the season included many newcomers, among whom were Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Phyllis Lett, Miss Clara Evelyn, Mrs. York Bowen, Fräulein Riess, Miss Beryl Freeman, Mlle. Adèle Clement, Miss E. Schulz, Miss Muriel Pickup, Miss Maud Delstanche, and Mr. Brabazon Lowther.

With the exception of music at our local parks and two vocal and instrumental concerts at the Edgbaston Botanical Gardens, the latter specially arranged by Mr. Oscar Pollack, music at Birmingham during July and August enjoys a complete rest, for it is our saison morte.

BOURNEMOUTH.

Beyond the weekly Symphony Concerts there is now but little attempted on behalf of the musical section of the community. These Symphony Concerts, however, serve a good purpose by holding together the most enthusiastic of our resident music-lovers, and there is also always a sufficiency of summer visitors whose ideals rise above musical comedy outpourings and al fresco concert parties. The programmes submitted are by no means negligible from an artistic standpoint. During the past month, for instance, we have heard such attractive works as Goetz's Symphony in F; two of the Flemish Dances by Jan Blockx; Bizet's 'L'Arlesienne' Suite No. 2; Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale; Coleridge-Taylor's 'Bamboula' African dance; Edward German's 'Richard III.' Overture; Dvorák's melodious fourth Symphony; a meritorious Old English Suite by Scott-Baker (conducted by the composer); 'The Flying Dutchman' Overture (Wagner); Mozart's 'Prague' Symphony; an effective, but not altogether original tone-poem, 'Woods in April,' by Edith Sweptone (first performance); and Massenet's 'Les Erinnyes' ballet music. The soloists have been as follows: Mr. H. Wolters, of the Municipal Orchestra (violoncello), Miss Nora Read, the popular local soprano, Mr. Algernon Holland (violin), Miss Muriel Poliska Mann (pianoforte), Mr. George Baker, Mr. Arthur Strugnell, and Mr. Frank Foster (vocalists).

A series of competitions for local amateur sopranos, contraltos, and tenors (the baritones and basses are to come later) has created much interest, and although nothing abnormal has been discovered, yet a fairly satisfactory level of achievement has been maintained, the contralto competition providing by far the best material. The prizes have been awarded by the votes of the audience—a method that has not invariably illustrated soundness of judgment.

Mr. Thomas J. Crawford, a well-known London organist, has been appointed to the vacant chorus-mastership of the Municipal Choir. The Municipal Choir will afford him plenty of scope for hard work, and all who wish for the advance of choral music at Bournemouth will support his endeavours whole-heartedly.

BRISTOL.

There was a large audience at the Victoria Rooms on May 27, when a miscellaneous concert was given. The vocalists were Miss Hilda Eager and Mr. Percy Heming, and the instrumentalists Miss Helen Cavell (violin), Miss Constance Carter (violoncello), and Miss Dorothy Peake (pianoforte). These local musicians contributed pieces which were well received.

At the opening of the Bristol International Exhibition there were two concerts of a gratifying character under the direction of Mr. G. Herbert Risleley. On the afternoon of May 28 the main features consisted of instrumental compositions by the Bristol Symphony Orchestra (augmented), the chief attraction being two movements from Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic Symphony.' Miss Agnes Nicholls and Mr. Lloyd Chandos aroused great enthusiasm by their singing of operatic airs.

At the evening concert a larger audience assembled. A choir of 450 voices had been rehearsed by Mr. G. Herbert Riseley, and were heard to advantage in Sir Arthur Sullivan's 'The Golden Legend.' The soloists were Miss Agnes Nicholls (Elsie), Miss Alys Gear (Ursula), Mr. Lloyd Chandos (Prince Henry), Mr. Herbert Heyner (Lucifer), and Mr. Ernest Blizard (a Forester). An adequate interpretation of the Cantata was followed by a miscellaneous selection. On June 3, in the Exhibition Hall, there was a choral contest (referred to in the Competition Festival Record).

On June 6 the National Brotherhood Festival was held at the Exhibition, and there were contests for male-voice choirs, orchestras, and bands in connection with the Brotherhood throughout the country. The Festival was organized by the Bristol Brotherhood Federation.

The monthly organ recital at St. Mary Redcliff Church, on June 3, was given by Mr. Herbert W. Hunt (organist of Bristol Cathedral), whose skilful performance of compositions by César Franck, Widor, and Guilmant, was highly appreciated.

An impressive choral Festival was held on June 17 at Henbury Church, at the re-dedication of the peal of bells which has been re-hung, with a new chiming apparatus added. The combined choirs of the Stapleton Rural Deanery, numbering 230, including the choirs of Avonmouth, Almondsbury, Downend, Colston School, Henbury, Shirehampton, Stoke Bishop, and Stapleton, took part in the special service, under the direction of Mr. W. S. Calway. Mr. A. B. Cleaves was at the organ.

CAMBRIDGE.

Berlioz's 'Faust' is the most intricate work which the Musical Society has undertaken in recent years, and the appreciation and enthusiasm both of performers and audience certainly justified the choice. Cambridge may well be proud of two such musicians as Mr. Clive Carey (Mephistopheles) and Mr. Stuart Wilson (Faust). Miss Gladys Moger sang the 'King of Thule's Song' especially beautifully. Dr. Rootham is to be congratulated on the success of the whole performance, and especially on the excellent results of his work with the choir and orchestra, during the past year.

The Musical Club gave at their 'open' concert a remarkably interesting programme, including a new String quartet by Arthur Bliss, who has only recently left the University. The Quartet is a most promising work, full of interest and scored at times with beautiful effect.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

The management of the Plymouth Pier Pavilion have made a movement which must be regarded as an experiment and one which has so far justified itself. Their custom has been hitherto to engage military bands to give Sunday evening concerts; they have now taken a step in the right direction by inaugurating orchestral concerts including a vocalist each week. Now that the summer season of band performances on the Hoe and in the parks has begun, the opportunities for hearing military bands are sufficiently numerous, and the dearth of orchestral music in the Three Towns assures a welcome to the string combinations of the Service bands whenever they play. The bands of the R.G.A. (Mr. R. G. Evans) and R.M.L.I. (Mr. J. W. Newton) have so far performed on alternate weeks, and the services of local vocalists have been much appreciated.

Sir Frederick Bridge, as chairman of the Board of Trinity College, visited Plymouth on May 27, when the awards gained at the local centre examinations were presented by the Mayoress, and three prize-winners—Ira Brand and G. M. S. Goodanew (pianoforte), and Sylvia Hill (violin)—played solos.

The choir of the South Devon and Cornwall Institution for the education and employment of the blind gave their annual concert in aid of the holiday fund on May 29. Mr. Frederic Weekes, musical director, obtained a satisfactory performance of 'The May Queen' (Sterndale Bennett), and also contributed pianoforte solos to a miscellaneous programme otherwise comprising vocal solos, glees, and concerted vocal pieces.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

The first demonstration of the Jaques-Dalcroze Rhythmic Exercises in Devon took place at the Maynard School, Exeter, on May 23. Pupils of the Home School, Highgate, demonstrated under the direction of Miss M. Bischoff in exemplification of a lecture given by Mr. P. B. Ingham, and definite interest was taken in the features and principles of the method by a large audience.

On May 25 M. Zacharewitsch (violin) and Mr. Lloyd Powell (pianoforte) gave a recital with assistance from Miss Sonya Ivanov (vocalist) and Miss Joan Saxby (elocutionist). The programme included the Strauss Sonata in E flat, Op. 18, 'The Kreutzer,' and M. Zacharewitsch's new descriptive composition, 'A phantasy of life' (on the 'Rubáiyát'). On June 13 Mr. Robert Chignell (baritone), Mr. Ivor James (violoncello), and Mr. Harold Samuel (pianoforte) gave a Sonata and Lieder recital in the Pavilion.

Mr. R. H. V. Ball led an excellent little string band who assisted in a charity concert at Yelverton-on-the-Moors on May 20; and another noteworthy event of moorland music was the giving of two concerts in Dartmoor Prison on May 26 to the prisoners, Governor, relatives and friends of the officers, and the officers. The 900 prisoners were divided into two batches, and the string band of the Royal Garrison Artillery, conducted by Mr. R. G. Evans, played two programmes of good popular music. The audience was very responsive.

CORNWALL.

At the concert at Camborne on May 20, several choirs who had distinguished themselves in the recent Cornwall County Music Competitions sang concerted and other music. They included Camborne Women's Choir, Mrs. Bennett's Tuckingmill Girls' Club, Camborne Orpheus Choir, Tuckingmill Wesleyan Choir, Camborne and Tuckingmill vocal quartets, Basset Road Girls' School. Mr. S. J. Treloar played flute solos. Folk-dancing was demonstrated by Basset Road scholars. Marazion Male Choir gave a concert on May 29, and the Wesleyan Choir on the same occasion sang the Cantata 'The song of Miriam.'

A satisfactory financial condition was reported at the annual meeting of the Falmouth Philharmonic Society, of which the Rev. Canon Corfe is conductor. A busy year's work was reported by the committee of the Marazion Apollo Male Choir at their annual meeting. By fifteen concerts £70 had been raised for charities.

Cornish band contests are a great feature of the public life here, and one of the most prominent prize-winning bands, Camborne, organized competitions for the first time on May 30, which attracted ten entries. Mr. W. Nuttall awarded first-prizes to St. Dennis and Bugle Silver. A new band has been formed at Falmouth under the direction of Captain Carter, S.A., and a first concert was given on June 10.

Mr. Walter Barnes conducted a capable orchestra which took part in a charity performance at Penzance on June 9.

DUBLIN.

The series of Sunday orchestral concerts at Woodbrook Concert Hall terminated on May 31. The programme included Beethoven's fourth Symphony, Wagner's 'Waldweben,' and Tchaikovsky's 'Rococo Variations' for violoncello (Mr. Clyde Twelvetees) and orchestra. Madame Borel sang Handel's 'Let the bright Seraphim' brilliantly, with organ accompaniment. At the previous concert Beethoven's 'Eroica' Symphony was the chief feature, and Miss Edith Mortier was the vocalist.

A series of concerts at the same hall is announced for the week commencing August 3 next. The London Symphony Orchestra have been engaged, and the conductors will be Dr. Esposito and Mr. Hamilton Harty.

On May 27 the Students' Musical Union of the Royal Irish Academy of Music gave a semi-private concert at the Aberdeen Hall, the programme including Parry's 'Blest pair of Sirens,' conducted by Mr. John Larchet. The choir was small but very efficient, and the accompaniment was played by strings and pianoforte. Mr. T. W. Hall sang Coleridge-Taylor's 'The quadron girl' with choral and string orchestral accompaniment. Miss Nita Edwards and Mrs. Henry Daunt were also vocalists, Miss Marie Dowse the violinist, and Miss Annie Lord the solo pianist.

A series of orchestral concerts devoted to works by Dr. M. Esposito has been arranged for the coming summer season in several towns in Russia. Dr. Esposito's brother, Signor Eugenio Esposito, is one of the conductors of the St. Petersburg Opera.

EDINBURGH.

On May 27 some three thousand people, including the Lord High Commissioner and his suite, came to the Usher Hall to welcome M. Widor, on the occasion of his first visit to Scotland. The recital of the great French organist and composer was unfortunately cut short by a bad cypher before half of his programme was completed. It was evident that the stops and stop-controls were unfamiliar to him, and consequently the recital as such was disappointing. On the evening of the same day the Organists' Society honoured themselves by entertaining M. Widor to a complimentary dinner.

Prof. Niecks has been granted leave to retire at the close of the present academic year from the Reid Chair of Music at the University, which he has held since 1891.

LIVERPOOL.

Mr. S. Royle Shore gave an address on 'Practical Plain-Chant to English Words' before the Liverpool and District Organists' and Choirmasters' Association on June 8. Mr. Shore greatly interested his audience in his subject, and by means of his own edition of Merbecke's Communion Service he transformed them into a responsive choir who readily chanted the simple and beautiful unisonal melodies. With the improvement of choral and congregational singing as an ideal Mr. Shore advocates the occasional use of plain-song, and a church service on the lines he recommends is contemplated being held as an object-lesson for choirmasters in this centre.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

Manchester's reputation suffered a severe shock last autumn with the breakdown of the Denhof opera tour, and on May 29 last it got another when the morning papers announced a loss on the last Hallé season's working of £1,648 6s. 4d. At least half of the deficit was due to the new system of payment of bandmen, and the balance is probably due to the diminished receipts both at the doors and from subscribers. This is the most serious set-back experienced by the Hallé Society, and yet there was an attendance at the annual meeting of only about thirty of the 184 guarantors of the executive; there may be room for difference of opinion as to whether the executive would be justified in regarding this attitude of passivity as a vote of satisfaction or not. In the Press it has been urged that the concerts should be put on a sure foundation in one of two ways: (a) Ample endowment (over £40,000 would have been necessary on this basis to liquidate last season's deficit); (b) The duty of the City Council to replace the guarantors, and support not only the Hallé concerts but others of the highest type.

The choral works for next season include Beethoven's Mass in D, Bach's 'God's time is best,' Berlioz's 'Faust' and 'Messe des Morts' (this on February 11), and Bantock's compressed version of 'Omar Khayyam'; amongst the novelties promised are Korngold's 'Symphonietta,' Scheinplug's 'Comedy' Overture, Balakirev's 'Thamar' Suite, Ravel's 'Valse nobles et sentimentales,' Reznicek's Suite 'Donna Diana,' and Sibelius's 'Scènes Historiques.'

The new visiting artists include Scriabin, the Misses Harrison, Madame Noordewier-Reddingius, and Madame de Haan-Manifarges, Mlle. Ilona Durigo, M. Cortot, M. Rachmaninov, and Miss Isolde Menges.

Mr. Arthur Catterall has been made leader of the orchestra in place of Mr. Rawdon Briggs, who resigned last April.

The executive of the Gentlemen's Concerts reported a diminished income also; whilst applications had equalled those of previous years, the resignations had been more numerous. Still, the year was turned with a small credit balance, and in addition a reserve fund of £3,385, which was referred to in some sense as a 'trust fund for the benefit of music in Manchester.' The engagements for the coming season include a recital by Scriabin, Miss Dorothy Bridson, Miss Dora Gibson, Miss Tosta de Benici, Mlle. Durigo, the Geloso Quartet from Paris, all of whom are, I believe, new to Manchester. After a lapse of two years a choral concert has been again included in the scheme, the Blackpool Glee and Madrigal Society giving an evening recital at the last concert before Christmas.

The always enterprising Bowdon Chamber Concerts Society are already to the fore with a completed scheme, the St. Petersburg Quartet, the Misses von Aranyi and Cortot being the instrumentalists, and Miss Caroline Hatchard and Mr. Carlton Brough the vocalists.

The concert of Mr. Albert J. Cross's School of Music on June 18 seemed rather like the 'breaking-up' concert of a big school, with a programme of somewhat unwieldy proportions. What I was able to hear pointed conclusively to the necessity for greater concentration on fewer works; in the long run this would mean the greater musical welfare of all concerned, audience included.

OXFORD.

THE BACH FESTIVAL.

This Festival, given by the Bach Choir and Choral Society, has eclipsed all the other music of the term. Excellent in every way, it included four concerts, the last being devoted to the glorious B minor Mass. To quote a few words from the excellent analytical programme: 'The object of this Festival is to present in as complete a way as possible the amazing variety displayed in Bach's works—from the lovely delicacy of the first chorus of "Liebster Gott" to the immensities of the Mass in B minor—from the Chaconne for violin to the great Overture in D.'

The first concert was given in New College Chapel on May 13, the programme consisting of the two Cantatas, 'Since Christ is all my being' and 'When will God recall my Spirit,' the Magnificat in D, 'O ewiges Feuer,' for contralto, beautifully sung by Miss Dawnay, accompanied by flutes and muted strings, and 'Süsser Trost,' for soprano, admirably interpreted by Miss Hilda Foster to the accompaniment of solo flute, oboe d'amore, and strings. Dr. Harwood played two Organ preludes as introductory pieces, and at the conclusion the great Toccata and Fugue in F. It is impossible to find space to notice in detail all these interesting items, but the Choir worked remarkably well throughout, and with the aid of their excellent and energetic conductor, Dr. Allen, scored many good points. If in one or two places the attack seemed to be slightly hesitant, that was no doubt caused by the fact that the performers had to be placed in the ante-chapel while the audience were in the chapel proper.

The second was a morning concert, given the next day in the Town Hall, the programme being mainly instrumental. It included three Concertos and the now popular Overture in D, two songs in diametrically opposite moods being introduced, 'Wie will ich lustig lachen,' finely sung by Mr. Francis Harford, and 'From my eyes the salt tears showering,' with Mr. Gervase Elwes as exponent, being exceedingly charming.

At the evening concert on the same day the Choir were given a heavy task in the interpretation of the motets 'Sing to the Lord,' 'Be not afraid,' and 'Come, Jesu, come,' but for all that, thanks to the watchful help of their never-failing pilot, Dr. Allen, they came out triumphantly. A few slips there were—and probably always will be—but in dealing with a performance of such all-round excellence they need not be dwelt upon. Sir Walter Parratt contributed three organ solos, playing as no one else can, his last being the well-known Prelude and Fugue in A minor. Miss Hilda Foster sang charmingly a group of four songs selected from the 'Geistliche Lieder,' and Mr. W. H. Reed played the D minor Chaconne for solo violin in capital style and with a beautifully full tone.

The fourth and last concert took place on the evening of May 15, in the Town Hall, and a more fitting conclusion to the Festival than the B minor Mass could not have been imagined. The beautiful building was densely packed in every part. The soloists were Miss Petri, Miss Dawnay, Mr. Elwes, and Mr. Harford, and the solo violin Mr. Reed. The choir was augmented by members of the London Bach Choir. Dr. Allen's orchestra, most ably led by Miss Venables, was supplemented by the necessary wind from the London Symphony Orchestra. The choir sang throughout splendidly, especially in the 'Credo' and 'Et resurrexit.' At the conclusion of the Mass Dr. Allen was most enthusiastically applauded, and certainly no conductor more richly deserved it. To him the labour must have been one of love, and he, with the aid of his able and enthusiastic confidants, has been the means of further extending not only the knowledge but, what is far more important, the appreciation of a style of music destined to last for all time—the unsurpassable music of John Sebastian Bach.

OTHER EVENTS.

Among several interesting Eights-week concerts the most ambitious was that of Keble, on May 27. An orchestra and a choir of seventy-two voices gave Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet' (with Mr. H. P. Veazie as soloist) and Pearsall's madrigal, 'I saw lovely Phyllis,' and the orchestra was heard alone in Weber's 'Der Freischütz' Overture and Wagner's Overture to 'Die Meistersinger.' Mr. Fox, the organ choral, conducted.

On June 16 the professor of music, Sir Walter Parratt, gave his terminal lecture in the Sheldonian Theatre to an appreciative audience, the subject being 'The organ as a mock orchestra.' The lecturer began by saying that it was quite impossible for the organ to produce true and legitimate orchestral effects, for to mention only one objection it could not be made sufficiently expressive; the solo stops in most organs not being placed in a swell-box, there was no means even of a crescendo or diminuendo. Again, the clarinet of the orchestra—with its different registers—was capable of the most wonderfully artistic expression, whereas the same stop in the organ was continually speaking at one dead level.

The lecturer thought it hardly advisable that the organ should be turned into 'a dancing elephant,' and made to play gigue, gavottes, nocturnes, and cradle songs. However, he did not wish to be too sweeping, and would gladly admit that the organ Flute was one of the best imitators of the one in the orchestra. For all that he rejoiced to think that a reaction was setting in against too much 'imitation.' He said that the Choral preludes for the organ by Sir Hubert Parry, which were being played quite frequently, showed most consummate art and were much in the vein of J. S. Bach. The illustrations were played on the organ by Dr. Allen, Mr. Ley, and Mr. Fox.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.
Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

BEXHILL.—On May 13, the Musical Society gave effect to their enterprise and ambition with a performance of Sir Hubert Parry's choral Symphonic Ode 'War and peace,' and carried out their task with creditable success. The same programme included Elgar's 'The Banner of St. George,' and Beethoven's 'Egmont' Overture. The soloists were Madame Winifred Dixon, Miss Eva Bayley, Mr. Richard Ripley, and Mr. Albert Crouch. Mr. A. P. Howe conducted.

GLOUCESTER.—The newly-formed Gloucester Amateur Operatic Society made its début on Whit-Monday in 'The Mikado,' under the direction of Mr. Joseph Woodward, and gave promise of attaining a high artistic standard.

HOBART (TASMANIA).—The Orpheus Club gave their second concert of this season on April 20, at the Town Hall, before a crowded audience, which included Sir William and Lady Macartney. The Club gave eight four-part songs. Solos were given by Miss Nora Gould and Mr. H. Macintosh (vocalists), and Miss Eva Creese (violin); Mr. Percy Henry skilfully supplied the pianoforte accompaniments. The conductor was Mr. P. Planche-Plummer.

KINGSTON (JAMAICA).—Stainer's Cantata 'St. Mary Magdalene' was performed at the Wesley Chapel on May 6, under the direction of Mr. G. W. Griffith. Accompaniment was supplied by Miss B. Clarke at the organ, and by orchestral wind, the string players having gone "on strike." The soloists were Miss Ivy Da Costa, Mrs. Vernon, Mr. Campbell, and Mr. Spooner.

RAUNDS (NORTHANTS).—The Raunds Cecilia Choral Society, a very capable organization conducted by Mr. J. Purser Archer, gave a highly successful performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'The death of Minnehaha' on June 5. A small orchestra assisted, and solos were given by Master Ezra Eaton, Miss Maud Loake, Madame Irene Lyne, Mr. Arthur Trayhurn (vocalists), and Mr. Knighton (flute).

STAINES.—In aid of the funds of St. Mary's Parish Church a concert was given at the Town Hall on June 8 by a choir and orchestra under the direction of Mr. F. Oscar Pidduck. The chief of the choral items was Waddington's 'John Gilpin,' which was given with full orchestral accompaniment. Other numbers in an interesting programme were German's 'Orpheus with his lute,' with string accompaniment, Sullivan's 'Oh hush thee, my babe,' arranged for female voices, and several pieces for orchestra.

SWINDON.—Music in this district has received a further impetus with the organization of the Orpheus Male-Voice Choir, in connection with the Primitive Methodist Church, Regent Street. The conductor is Mr. David Jeames and the organist Mr. E. Farr. The choir made a promising initial appearance on June 7, with a programme that included Adam's 'Comrades in arms,' Gounod's 'By Babylon's wave,' and Dudley Buck's 'In absence.' Songs were given by Miss Ada Davis and Miss Lena Bezer.

WALLINGTON.—On June 6, Mr. Francis Gregg's annual concert took place with the customary success. The principal artist was Miss Mabel Mann (soprano). Movements for pianoforte trio by Arensky and others were included in the programme.

Foreign Notes.

ANTWERP.

A great musical Festival has been held at the Société Royale de Zoologie in celebration of the 200th anniversary of the birth of Gluck. Excerpts from Gluck's 'Alceste' and works by Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Berlioz, and Peter Benoit (the National composer) were heard.

ATHENS.

'War in peace-time,' an operetta by the famous Greek composer Spiro Samara, has been produced here with considerable success.

BAYREUTH.

It is stated that the Festival performances to be given this year will comprise 'Parsifal' (seven times), 'The Flying Dutchman' (five times), 'The Nibelungen Ring' (twice), and perhaps two performances of 'The Mastersingers.' Cosima and Siegfried Wagner intend to present to the German nation the Festspielhaus and the Villa Wahnfried, with all the priceless collections they contain.

BETHLEHEM, PA.

The ninth great Bach Festival, held under the direction of Prof. Wolle, was successful in every direction. In the B minor Mass the experiment was made of allotting the solo numbers to sections of the choir.

BUDAPEST.

Jeno Hubay, the director of the National School of Music, has written a new opera on Tolstoi's 'Anna Karenina.' The work will be produced here during next season.

COLOGNE.

Fritz Steinbach, the well-known conductor and director of the Conservatoire, has handed in his resignation.

DARMSTADT.

Felix Weingartner has been appointed General-Musikdirektor, conductor of the Symphony Concerts, and director of the Opera.

DRESDEN.

A music-drama, 'Gabin,' by A. Wulfs, has been successfully produced at the Opera.—The great Festival organized by the Opera will take place in August and September, under Kutzschbach, Muck, and Richard Strauss.

DUSSELDORF.

Hugo Kaun's new choral work, 'Mutter Erde' (Mother earth), will be produced here under Panzner in December.

EVANSTON, ILLINOIS.

The sixth annual Festival of the Chicago North Shore Festival Association, at Evanston, Illinois, opened on May 25 with a performance of Haydn's 'Creation,' under Mr. Peter Christian Lutkin, the choir being augmented to one thousand voices. On the following evening Miss Alma Gluck and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Frederick Stock, furnished the programme. On May 28 the choir of six hundred gave the first performance in the West of Gabriel Pierné's 'St. Francis of Assisi,' under the direction of Mr. Lutkin. The A Cappella Choir, of Northwestern University, and a young ladies' choir of three hundred singers also took part. This was a remarkably fine performance on the part of both choir and orchestra. Saturday afternoon was a Young People's matinée. The choir, composed of 1,500 children under the leadership of Mr. Osbourne McConathy, sang various groups of songs in an inspiring manner. The first performance in the West of Hamilton Harty's 'The Mystic Trumpeter,' was given with Mr. Lutkin as conductor, and Mr. Charles W. Clark as baritone soloist. The work was sung in a manner that did justice to its many beauties and gave due effect to its dramatic climaxes. This series of concerts was in every way an advance on former years, and Mr. Lutkin is to be congratulated on the ability, as well as the fidelity, of his co-workers in bringing to pass such noteworthy results.

FLORENCE.

On the initiative of Madame Ida Isori, the celebrated bel-canto singer, a commemoration plate has been placed on the house where Giulio Caccini died in 1615.

FRANKFORT.

M. Manskopf, the owner of the well-known musicohistorical museum, has decided to form a Richard Strauss Museum in commemoration of the composer's fiftieth birthday.

GENEVA.

When the centenary of the liberation of Geneva from the yoke of Napoleon is celebrated, an important feature will be the descriptive music written by Jaques-Dalcroze (of Eurhythmic fame) to the great historical pageant-play that will be given at a specially constructed theatre. The composer aims to make his music in perfect harmony with the gesture and action on the stage.

HAMBURG.

The German Brahms Society has bought the house Speckstrasse 53 (Brahms's birthplace), where a Brahms Museum will be established.

LISBON.

The first performance here of Saint-Saëns's 'Samson and Delilah' was given with very considerable success. The composer was present, and was received with great enthusiasm.

MOSCOW.

The Holy Synod has definitely prohibited the planned performances of 'Parsifal.'

MUNICH.

It is decided to give here, early in 1915, a great Dreibund Festival, consisting of concerts devoted to German, Austrian, and Italian music. The Munich Court Orchestra, the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, and a first-class Italian Orchestra (under Toscanini) will participate.

NEW YORK.

Great interest was taken in the first American performance of Hamilton Harty's 'The Mystic Trumpeter,' which was given recently by the Colombia University Chorus under the direction of Mr. Walter Henry Hall, and flattering opinions have been passed upon the work.

NORFOLK, CONNECTICUT.

On June 4, at the Norfolk Musical Festival, the first performance was given of an unpublished orchestral work by Coleridge-Taylor entitled 'From the Prairie.'

PRAGUE.

In commemoration of the thirtieth anniversary of the death of Smetana, the great national composer, the Czech Theatre has given the two-hundredth performance of his most popular opera, 'Dalibor.'

RIGA.

The administration of the town theatre states that the Holy Synod (St. Petersburg) has definitely refused permission to perform 'Parsifal.' The work is only to be performed at St. Petersburg.

SALZBURG.

During the great Festival given by the Mozarteum Society for the inauguration of the new Mozart House three open-air performances will take place, on August 14, 15, and 16.

VENICE.

At the inauguration of the new organ at Santa Maria del Giglio-Zobenigo, the celebrated organist and composer Enrico Bossi gave a splendid recital of works of Bach, Galuppi, Handel, Dubois, and César Franck.

VIENNA.

A general committee for the publication of the 'Corpus scriptorum de musica,' under the presidency of Dr. Guido Adler, has been formed. This most important publication (about fourteen volumes in folio) will comprise the works written on music from the 8th to the 16th century. It is hoped that the work will be completed in about fourteen years.—The widow of Franz von Suppé, the well-known operetta composer, has presented 25,000 Kronen to the Society of Composers and Music Publishers of Vienna.—Hans Huber's Symphony No. 6 will be produced here shortly, under Weingartner.

Miscellaneous.

A short melodrama-opera with a modern plot and music written by Marshall Hall, of Melbourne, was produced under the composer's direction at the Palladium on June 8 with considerable success. The music is up-to-date, and contains a great deal of well-designed operatic writing. The chief characters were taken by Miss Constance Drever and Mr. Harold Deacon.

On June 14, in connection with the Conference of Master Printers of Great Britain and Ireland, held at Sheffield, a special performance was given of Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise'—a work composed to commemorate the fourth centenary of the art of printing.

Alderman Sir Edward E. Cooper has been elected vice-president of the Royal College of Organists for the jubilee year of the College.

The firm of Bechstein has received a royal warrant of appointment as pianoforte manufacturers to Her Majesty the Queen.

Answers to Correspondents.

L. L.—The Abbé Vogler, 1749-1814, was a teacher, composer, theorist (of a progressive turn), organist, and a practical innovator in organ-building. His pupils included Weber and Meyerbeer. See 'Grove's Dictionary.'

THEORY OF MUSIC

CONTAINING

NUMEROUS TEST-QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS.

BY

JULIA A. O'NEILL

Composer of "EXERCISES FOR THE WEAKER FINGERS" (Progressive Studies, Edited by FRANKLIN TAYLOR, Book 53) and of "MELODIOUS TECHNIQUE."

Price One Shilling. Paper Boards, 1s. 6d.

THE TIMES.

It is in its clear statement of facts, both in writing and by the use of simple diagrams, that Miss Julia O'Neill's book excels.

THE MORNING POST.

Her manner of putting down the facts is concise and clear. An immense amount of ground is covered in logical sequence, and the book is one of the most helpful publications as yet made. It is satisfactory to note that ear-cultivation is touched upon.

MUSICAL OPINION.

It is really surprising the amount of useful matter that Julia A. O'Neill has managed to compress within the covers of her primer, "A Practical Guide to the Theory of Music." Teachers who wish to keep abreast of the times in an educational sense will find this well-written guide calculated to help them to a knowledge of the latest and most accepted method of elementary theoretical instruction. We are pleased to note that the all-important subject of ear-culture has not been neglected in the present primer.

THE LADY.

Is a thoroughly praiseworthy attempt to present the cardinal facts of musical theory in a plain and straightforward manner to the beginner. Wholly admirable is the way the gradual formation of our present-day clefs is explained.

HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS
IN MUSIC

CONTAINING

600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS

BY

ERNEST A. DICKS,

FELLOW OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

The scope of this book covers the whole ground of theoretical examinations in music. It supplies an invaluable equipment to candidates entering for the various Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge held periodically throughout the country, and it will be found extremely useful to those who are preparing for the higher grades of Diploma and Degree Examinations.

The book is therefore very comprehensive. Its range includes questions and answers in Theory, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form, Fugue, Acoustics, Musical History, Organ Construction, and Choir Training.

By no means the least valuable part of the volume is that section, consisting of upwards of one hundred pages, which contains reprints of past examination papers set by the Associated Board, Trinity College, and the Incorporated Society of Musicians; the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, London, Dublin, Durham, and Edinburgh, and the Victoria University; The Royal Academy of Music, The Royal College of Music, and The Royal College of Organists. The advantage of having so many specimens of these actual examination papers within one cover is too obvious to need further comment or commendation.

PREFACE TO THE NINTH EDITION.

The author desires to acknowledge his great indebtedness to the authorities of the London University; The Royal Academy of Music; the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music; The Royal College of Organists; Trinity College of Music, London; and the Incorporated Society of Musicians, for their kindness in allowing him to incorporate copies of their latest Examination Papers in Parts II. and III. of his Handbook, in order that he might present their latest examination requirements.

THE ORGAN BY WALTER G. ALCOCK,

M.V.O.,

Mus. Doc. Dunelm., A.R.C.M., F.R.C.O.

Organist and Composer to His Majesty's Chapels Royal and Assistant-Organist of Westminster Abbey.

Published as a Net Book.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS NET.

THE ATHENÆUM.

A fine work . . . and is admirable at all points.

YORKSHIRE POST.

The name of Dr. Walter G. Alcock is in itself a sufficient guarantee of the sound teaching of organ-playing, and his book, "The Organ," more than sustains his reputation. . . . There are many useful exercises on various technical points, and some short original pieces which serve as further illustrations of the author's teaching. It is very clearly printed on good, stout paper, and from every point of view is a desirable book.

YORKSHIRE OBSERVER.

A treatise on the instrument by so eminent an authority as Dr. Walter Alcock is likely to become a standard text-book. The young student could ask for none better.

THE SCOTSMAN.

The work is a distinctly useful addition to books of musical instruction.

THE BRISTOL TIMES AND MIRROR.

Although many books of instruction about the organ have been published, the latest is among the best. Its merits are sundry. . . . If the book be thoroughly mastered no other one is needed for the purpose of tuition, for it is the key to everything that has been written for the king of instruments. The print is exceedingly clear, and the book itself neat and attractive.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS.

This is not an "instruction" book in the ordinary use of the term, for its scope is too wide, and the information given is so largely the result of personal experiment and experience that those who have already advanced in the art of organ playing will find many hints and suggestions which will prove of practical service. The book is admirably divided into sections dealing with the elements of organ art; and a very important chapter is that on hymn-playing.

THE SUNDAY TIMES.

Every young organ student will find himself greatly helped by "The Organ," a new manual of the instrument by Dr. Alcock.

THE CHOIR.

We congratulate Dr. Alcock on having produced a work which will rank with the best of its kind.

THE MUSIC STUDENT.

The work is up-to-date in every way, it is well arranged and graduated and begins at the beginning. . . . One must look a long way to find a work which unites as much sound instruction with so much good music of all grades, all under one cover.

THE BOOKSELLER.

Dr. Alcock has produced a very helpful and useful book which the ambitious player will do well to study with great care and attention; he who follows the directions here given will undoubtedly find his work as an organist very materially assisted.

CHURCH FAMILY NEWSPAPER.

Written by a master of his subject, "The Organ" makes an immediate appeal to organists of all descriptions, for the matter contained in the book embraces all that is necessary from simple pedal exercises—called by some "first steps"—up to pieces requiring all the resources of modern organ technique.

THE FINEST ENGLISH MAKE CHAPPELL PIANOS CANNOT BE EXCELLED

FOR THEIR EXQUISITE TONE, RESPONSIVE TOUCH,
REMARKABLE SINGING QUALITY, AND LASTING DURABILITY.

BACKHAUS says: "I cannot speak too highly of the brilliant and sympathetic tone and responsive touch. You need fear no rival."

PROFESSOR ERNST VON DOHNÄNYI says: "It gives me great pleasure to state that in the qualities of tone and touch the Chappell Piano ranks first in Pianofortes of the highest grade."

DR. RICHARD STRAUSS says: "I consider the tone of a remarkably sweet and sympathetic quality and of unusual sustaining power, the touch very responsive and light. Having always been used to pianos of German make, it was a great and agreeable surprise to me to find such a perfect instrument of British manufacture."

How to Keep "in practice" without "practising."

To the busy pianist or the pianist on a holiday, the "From Brain to Keyboard" System presents a particularly useful feature—the possibility of keeping "in practice" in spite of the fact that the piano may not be touched for weeks at a time. By substituting for the hours of daily keyboard practice but eight minutes twice a day in following (away from the Keyboard) the principles of

"FROM BRAIN TO KEYBOARD"

MACDONALD SMITH'S SYSTEM OF PIANOFORTE TOUCH AND TECHNIQUE,

a pianist can come back to his piano after, say, a month's absence and find his Technique, Touch, and Control not only as good as ever, but greatly improved.

The "From Brain to Keyboard" System not only dispenses with the necessity for perpetual Keyboard practice, but experience with nearly 6,000 successful pupils has shown that by this system can be accomplished in a few months what the student frequently fails to acquire in years of daily "keyboard practice." It is a fact that there is no requirement of even the most advanced pianist which cannot be satisfied by the "From Brain to Keyboard" System.

If you will write to me to-day and detail any technical difficulties which trouble you, I shall be pleased to explain how you can permanently master them in a few months.

My book, "LIGHT ON PIANOFORTE PLAYING," will be sent free on request.

Address M. MACDONALD SMITH, 19, BLOOMSBURY SQUARE, W.C.

Learn to Play at Sight

If you play the piano at all you can, within three months' time, become a proficient sight-player able to play accurately all music within your technical ability AT FIRST SIGHT—but only by studying the Ehremayer System of Sight-Playing.

This is because the Ehremayer System is based upon sound scientific facts and trains the student in a pleasant, interesting way to read music as easily as he reads a book and to play it accurately with equal facility.

If you have difficulty in playing with both hands at once—if chords are troublesome—if one stave is more difficult to play than the other—IF YOU WISH TO BECOME A PROFICIENT SIGHT-PLAYER—

WRITE AT ONCE for the interesting booklet, "Playing at Sight," which explains how you can overcome your difficulties and become an expert Sight-Reader in the shortest time and with least trouble by postal lessons at home in your own time.

IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING

BY FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

RUSSIAN OPERA AND RUSSIAN 'NATIONALISM.'

BY ERNEST NEWMAN.

We have all been reading a good deal lately of the 'national' quality of the Russian operas we have been hearing at Drury Lane. Mrs. Newmarch, in her book on 'The Russian Opera,' Mr. Montagu-Nathan, in his 'History of Russian Music,' and the whole body of critics in their articles, have assured us, with a persistence and a unanimity that it seems almost rude to refuse to be convinced by, that at any rate the chief of these Russian operas are 'national' both in subject and in musical idiom. There must be something wrong, I am afraid, with my mental make-up, for I have never been able to see very much that is 'national' in either. As regards the stories of the operas, I ask myself whether my friends are not confusing 'national' with 'historical.' It is quite true that 'Boris Godounov,' 'Khovantchina,' and 'Ivan the Terrible' are founded upon episodes in the history of Russia; but I submit that that does not make them any more national than an opera founded upon some event in English history would be. I am not sure that I know what a 'nation' is in the sense in which my friends use the word. I know what a nation is in the geographical and political senses. For rough-and-ready purposes we call a nation any body of people, however diverse in racial origin, in temperament, in ideals, who live within the same geographical boundary and under the same political constitution. 'National' for me has no other meaning than this: as soon as you try to posit homogeneity of physical and mental nature, of outlook, of habit, of aspirations, among these millions of men and women, you begin, I think, to take leave of realities and dupe yourself with words. If there were anything in the ordinary theory of a 'national' English consciousness, it would seem to follow that every Englishman would, by the very fact of his being an Englishman, be thrilled in the same way as his fellows by the so-called 'national' episodes in English history. If that be so, then I and a good many others are not Englishmen; for nine out of ten characters and events in English history create no more emotion in us—perhaps less—than Hannibal, Julius Cæsar, Pericles, Savonarola, Tamerlane, Charlemagne, Napoleon, the Battle of Salamis, the Retreat of the Ten Thousand, or the Russian campaign of 1812. We cannot make an opera 'national' simply by putting a few historical characters on the stage, or even characters who are in the very centre of the nation's field of vision to-day, and therefore as 'national' to us as any we can imagine. I myself should not call an opera 'national' if the chief characters in it were Mr. Asquith, Mr. Balfour, Lord Lansdowne, Mr. Bonar Law, Mr. Lloyd George, and Mr. Churchill—no, not even if Mr. Keir Hardie and Mr. John Redmond and Sir Edward Carson were thrown in. My view would be that these people, interesting as they are, are not the nation, or expressive of more than a thousandth part of the psychology, the activities, the dreams of the nation. And so I feel about Boris Godounov and Ivan the Terrible and Count Khovantsky very much as I feel about Queen Elizabeth and Burleigh and Sir Walter Raleigh and King Henry the Eighth. If they are made vital on the stage, I am willing to be interested in them; but only because they are vital, not at all because they are 'national' or historical. A purely fictitious theme would engross and move me just as much as a historical theme if it were equally human and equally well handled. There is nothing historical about 'Othello,' but I find it, to say the least, as great a work, both in its human appeal and in its imaginative treatment, as 'Boris Godounov.'

That is how I see the matter. Nowhere in this article have I any desire to dogmatise. I recognise that the subject of nationalism in music is one on which people in opposite camps hold equally strong opinions. I can only state the case as it strikes me, and my remarks are to be taken as queries rather than deliverances.

Are the Russian operas we have lately been hearing 'national'? First of all I would ask 'What is the Russian nation,' or indeed, 'What is any nation?' I have been putting this question to my folk-song friends for a long time, but without the favour of a reply. When people talk of founding a 'national' music on the folk-song of the country they necessarily imply a common national consciousness at the time the songs were composed,—of which the songs are the expression—and a common national consciousness now, that can find satisfactory utterance in the same idiom as that of our forefathers. Of a 'nation' in this sense, I admit, I have no knowledge, either practical or theoretical; nor, I suspect, have my friends. We are particularly prone, I think, to the error of looking at nations (I use the word here, as elsewhere, in the geographical and political sense) too much in the lump. 'Russia,' says some one or other; and instantly we have a dim vision of a number of people a long way off, all as like each other as one sheep is like another sheep, and in the mass as different from all Frenchmen or Germans as sheep in the mass are different from elephants or dachshunds. If 'Russian,' in the sense in which the folk-song partisans use the word, does not mean this, then it has no meaning at all. I venture to suggest to my friends that what they take to be a homogeneous racial body is in reality a body highly heterogeneous. How fallacious is this way of looking at a foreign nation is seen at once when a foreigner lumps all the inhabitants of the British Isles together under the category of 'Englishmen.' I will say nothing now about the mixture of races within the geographical boundary of England proper, except this, that when our folk-song friends talk as they do about the 'Anglo-Saxon' who is supposed to cover England from the Tweed to the English Channel, and from the North Sea to the Welsh border, I am moved to a mild wonder whether they have ever heard that we 'English' are a mixture of primitive 'Britons,' Jutes, Danes, Saxons, Normans, and Jews, with a dash of some half-dozen other races. But even our folk-song enthusiasts recognise a broad distinction between 'Anglo-Saxons' and 'Celts'; and they are up in arms when a foreigner confuses the two. When M. Van den Borren, in his book 'Les Origines de la Musique de Clavier en Angleterre,' spoke of Giles Farnaby as an Englishman, he was gravely taken to task by one reviewer, who, with unconscious humour, argued that Farnaby was a Cornishman, and therefore not an Englishman but a Celt. This opens up an alarming prospect, for it appears that even people living within the English borders can, on occasion, be un-English. If a Cornishman is thus barred out of the 'Anglo-Saxon' heritage, what hope is there for any given East-Anglian, or Northumbrian, or the dweller on the Welsh border? When is an Englishman not an Englishman? we might ask. But at any rate the people who argue in this way do insist, as I say, on certain supposed racial distinctions between the inhabitants of different parts of the British Isles. They would never admit, for example, that an Irishman is an Englishman. It must therefore amuse them when foreigners regard Englishmen and Irishmen as being of the same race, as I found a German writer on music doing the other day. I submit that foreigners must be equally amused when, in our ignorance of the varieties of racial types within their borders, we lump them together as 'Russians,' 'Frenchmen,' 'Slavs,' or 'Orientals.'

Now is not this the error our musical writers are making at present with regard to Russia? Is there such a thing as 'a' Russian or 'the' Russian? I find that the Russians number some hundred and fifty millions, i.e., one-twelfth of the inhabitants of the earth, occupying one-sixth of the land surface of the globe. It would be amazing indeed were all these people to be built up on the same physical and mental plan, as is assumed by the theorists who talk of Russian folk-music, Russian nationalism, and Russian national opera. But of course it is not so. It is as hard to define 'the' Russian as to define 'the' Englishman. 'The Russian' in fact is as much a myth as 'the Anglo-Saxon.' 'Within the [Russian] Empire,' says an authority, 'a very great diversity of nationalities is comprised, due to the amalgamation or absorption by the Slav race of a variety of Ural-Altaic stocks, of Turko-Tartars, Turko-Mongols, and various Caucasian races.' One of my difficulties has always been to find a common denominator between 'Anglo-Saxon' types as different as the Yorkshireman, the man of Dorsetshire, the East Anglian and the Cockney, or between writers like Shakespeare, Pope, Blake, Swinburne, Dr. Keble, and Mr. G. K. Chesterton. The difficulty must be equally great in Russia. Mrs. Newmarch—to whose book and Mr. Montagu-Nathan's all we students of Russian music are deeply indebted—says that the 'Malo-Russian and Cossack population are more vivacious, and also more dreamy and sentimental, than the Great Russians. In fact the difference between the inhabitants of the Ukraine and those of the government of Novgorod is as great as that between a southern Irishman and a Yorkshireman, and lies much in the same direction.' 'The Little Russians,' says the 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' 'differ from the Great Russians not only in language but in physical height, domestic architecture, and folk-lore.' The differences, it would seem, are even greater than this. 'The primary distinctions between these branches (Great Russian, Little Russian, and White Russian) have been increased during the last nine centuries by their contact with different nationalities, the Great Russians absorbing Finnish elements, the Little Russians undergoing an admixture of Turkish blood, and the White Russians submitting to Lithuanian influence. Moreover, notwithstanding the unity of language, it is easy to detect among the Great Russians themselves two separate branches, differing from one another by slight divergences of language and type and deep divergences of national character—the Central Russian and the Novgorodians.' Sir Donald Mackenzie Wallace has a passage to the same effect in his book on Russia: 'Between these two sections of the population (Great Russians and Little Russians) there are profound differences—differences of language, colour, costume, traditions, popular songs, &c., &c. And again, 'We have here two distinct nationalities, further apart from each other than the English and the Scotch. The differences are due, I believe, partly to ethnographical peculiarities and partly to historic conditions.'

The 'national' Russian character seems at this point to be eluding us. To a mere outsider it looks as if, when we talk of 'the' Russian, we are committing as wild an absurdity as the German who speaks of Irishmen, Scotsmen, and Welshmen as if they were Englishmen.

And does 'nationalism' really help a composer to be 'national'? Not always, it would seem. In English folk-song, according to our theorists, is to be found the vital source for the regeneration of English music. But just as a man cannot get away from his own shadow, so, no matter how steeped in folk-music he may be, he cannot be bigger than his own personality. Serov, Mrs. Newmarch tells us, 'had not that national gift for assimilating the national spirit and breathing it back into the dry bones of musical form as Glinka had.' Even a Russian, then, may apparently be without the right national spirit—or, what is the same thing in this connection, his value as a nationalist is determined by his gifts as a musician. Even Glinka, try as he would, did not succeed in being a 'national' composer in the sense that he expressed the whole of the soul of Russia. It took Glinka plus Dargomijsky to do this.

'Glinka,' says Mrs. Newmarch, 'was not fully in touch with the national character'—although he was a Russian! 'There were sides of it which he had entirely ignored in both his operas, because he was temperamentally incapable of reflecting them.' Glinka and Dargomijsky, in fact, 'together make up the sum total of the national character.' 'Glinka had the versatility and spontaneity we are accustomed to associate with the Slav temperament; Dargomijsky had not less imagination but was more reflective.' That is to say, even a good Russian, one very anxious to be a 'national' Russian, can express no more than a fragment of 'the Russian character'; yet we are asked to believe that the 'English national character' is fully expressed in the folk-songs of a few humble country singers of several generations ago! Is not all this an admission that there is no 'national character,' and that if there were, there is no one formula for it in art, no one artist, or indeed no twenty artists, capable of epitomising it in themselves?

My bewilderment deepens, indeed, the deeper I go into the subject. For it appears that men of a given nationality sometimes cannot write music characteristic of that nationality, while such music can be written by men who are not of that nationality at all. When the Russian nationalists cast Rubinstein out of their councils they dubbed him, in their large-handed way, an Oriental. All that he is good at, according to them, is Oriental music. 'Yet,' says Mrs. Newmarch, 'how different is the conventional treatment of Eastern music in "Feramors" from Borodin's natural and characteristic use of it in "Prince Igor." So that a non-Oriental can write—assuming Borodin to be a Russian—Oriental music more naturally and characteristically than an Oriental! And the versatile Borodin achieves not only this feat, but the still more remarkable feat of writing Russian 'national' music without being a Russian. He was on his father's side a Georgian—the illegitimate son of a Prince of Imeretia; and a Georgian is no more a Russian than an Icelander is an Englishman. Mr. Montagu-Nathan, indeed, lays stress on Borodin's Oriental blood. 'It is to that descent,' he says, 'that Borodin's Oriental tendency is to be traced, and also his peculiarly striking physiognomic cast.' Yet in the very next sentence we read of 'his truly spontaneous nationalism, which, according to a French admirer "exuded from every pore." My reason totters on its throne at this identification of the Russian and the Oriental! 'The nationalism of Borodin,' says Mr. Montagu-Nathan, 'is a pure product of heredity and owes nothing to environment'; i.e., he was not brought up among the peasants as Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakov were, and so did not drink the Russian folk-song in with his mother's milk. Borodin's Oriental heredity, then, made him a 'national' Russian! I give it up! After this it is a small thing to learn that though Tchaikovsky was 'typically Russian by temperament and in his whole attitude to life,' he was not a 'national' composer. 'His ideals were more diffused,' says Mrs. Newmarch, 'and his ambitions reached out towards more universal appreciation.' So that however 'typically Russian' a Russian may be, he is not a Russian if he looks, as many Russians do, beyond the borders of his own country, and finds certain aspects of foreign art more interesting than the indigenous art of the home territory. But if that be so, a good many thousands of us who have always supposed ourselves to be Englishmen are in reality nothing of the sort. Personally, I would not give one movement of a Beethoven Symphony or a single page of 'Tristan,' or the choruses in 'Boris Godounov,' for ninety-nine per cent. of the folk-songs of England. I would much rather be a good musician than a good patriot; I am much fonder of the French Debussy and the Russian Stravinsky than I am of the 'Anglo-Saxon' Philistine across the road.

I shall be told, I know, that say what I like, there is a peculiar 'note' in this music that marks it out as being Russian, and nothing else. As the indignant adherents of the 'national' theory sometimes put it, 'Could a Frenchman have written the "Meistersinger"? Could a German have written "Pelleas and Melisande"? Of course not; but only because Frenchmen and Germans are brought up in different culture-environments.

It is environment, more than race, that matters. The Jew in Germany writes German music, in Russia Russian music, in France French music. The Italian Rossetti, domiciled in England, writes English poetry. The Dutchman Beethoven, the Hungarian Liszt, domiciled in Germany, write German music. The Georgian Borodin, domiciled in St. Petersburg, writes Russian music. I am not contending that race will not show itself somewhere in a man's mind as well as in his features; I should not expect a Bushman to think precisely like a Hindoo.* But of the three factors that together make up an artist—race, personality, and environment—race is of the least account. Had Borodin been removed to Germany in his cradle, and never set foot in Russia or heard a note of Russian music, he would almost certainly have written German music. And the reason people like Moussorgsky write music with a pronounced 'Russian' physiognomy is simply that, brought up among the people as they were, they imbibed a certain folk-song idiom as naturally as a German conservative musician imbibes the idiom of Brahms or Wagner or Strauss. Each of them unconsciously assimilates what is strongest in the air about him. Musicians are generally driven to 'nationalism' as a revolt against foreign influences. In the Russia of the 'sixties and 'seventies there was discontent on the part of a number of musicians with (a) the economic and artistic preference for Italian and

* I ought to add that the mental differences between the Bushman and the Hindoo are much less a matter of 'race' in the individual than of the different culture stages to which the two races have arrived. Precisely the same differences would be found between the ancient Briton of three thousand years ago and Mr. Lloyd George.

German composers, (b) the packing of the conservatoires with foreigners, mostly Germans, and (c) a decaying romanticism that found its most facile expression in German music. In turning to Russian popular music the Russian composers simply did what all artists do in epochs of revolt against a dying but still tyrannous tradition—they made a 'return to nature.' So far as this return to nature helped them to realise their own personalities it was a good thing; so far as it imposed a new and native shackle on them in lieu of the foreign shackles they had managed to shake off, it was bad for them. Both the good and the bad sides of the folk influence can be seen in Moussorgsky's operas. It is not true to say that his style is wholly founded on folk-song, for there are passages in 'Boris Godounov' that have no affinity whatever with folk-music; some of them, indeed, have for me a curious, faint, indefinable tang of 'Lohengrin' about them. But it is indisputable that a certain folk idiom had become so part and parcel of Moussorgsky that he spoke it as naturally as a German musician speaks the language of this or that school. And this idiom is an admirable one where it is applicable. It is wholly appropriate in the choruses of the people; it would be difficult to imagine anything more effective in their way than the opening chorus of 'Boris Godounov' and the chain of choruses at the end, where the mob is baiting the unfortunate aristocrat who has fallen into its hands. But—apart, of course, from the genius of Moussorgsky, who is without a rival on this terrain—the overwhelming effect here is owing to the idiom and the psychology being in harmony. It is natural that the folk should sing in a popular style: the folk-song flavour is more than an additional musical piquancy—it is a veritable psychological instrument. But with all respect for Moussorgsky's genius, one is bound to say that there are places, both in 'Boris Godounov' and 'Khovantchina,' in which the folk idiom obtrudes itself where it is not wanted. One result of this is rhythmic and melodic monotony; a still more serious drawback is that it narrows all dramatic psychology down to that of the peasant. For the folk idiom is so racy of the soil that it carries a suggestion of the soil with it wherever it goes. I cannot believe, for instance, that the boyards in the fourth Act of 'Boris Godounov' (vocal score, p. 265 ff) are boyards; to me the idiom is that of the peasant. And Moussorgsky as good as admits that the folk idiom, valuable as it is for some psychological purposes, is too limited for others, by discarding it throughout the greater part of the music of Boris himself. That music, I venture to think, is often quite undistinguished; we are inclined to estimate it more highly than it really deserves because it comes to us freighted with the glowing genius of Chaliapine. But at times it has a strange, irresistible power, a simplicity, a sincerity, a directness, a poignancy of a kind that is not to be found in any other music that I know; and here, I think, the magic is wholly Moussorgsky's own.

So with certain of the other fine pages in 'Boris Godounov'; there is no more reason, for instance, to attribute such a passage as the monologue of Schtschelkalov (vocal score, pp. 17-19) to Russian folk-song influence than there is to see a similar German influence in the King's prayer in 'Lohengrin.' The one is pure Wagner, the other pure Moussorgsky.

It is possible then, I imagine, to exaggerate the folk-song influence in Moussorgsky's music. Nor can it be doubted that even at its best folk-song is an instrument of very limited psychological possibilities. The biographers all tell us that certain portions of 'Boris Godounov' are adaptations of the music of the earlier opera 'Salamambo'; but they apparently have not seen all that this implies. The chorus with which the people greet the pseudo-Demetrius was formerly the triumphal hymn of Moloch; the recitative of the dying Boris was Salamambo's invocation to Tanit; and so on. This seems to me to land the partisans of the folk-song idiom in a dilemma. Either the Demetrius chorus of the people, for example, which should be typically 'national,' has so little of Russia in it that it would be equally appropriate to ancient Carthage, or it is so purely Russian that Moussorgsky must have been labouring under a delusion when he imagined it to be expressive of the characters and the milieu of 'Salamambo.' Perhaps the latter proposition comes nearer the truth. If so, we see once again the limitations of a popular idiom as a psychological instrument. On the face of the case it can be serviceable only for subjects of a genre and set in a milieu that harmonize with it. A dialect Russian chorus is credible: a dialect Boris or Ivan might be credible: a dialect Faust or Hamlet or Francesca da Rimini is frankly incredible, as Tchaikovsky had the sense to perceive. And that the folk idiom is appropriate only to a narrow range of musical psychology is shown in the tacit disavowal of it by the Russian composers who followed the 'Invincible Band.' Mrs. Newmarch expresses this in the happiest way when she says that to expect a composer to write in nothing but the 'native idiom' is equivalent to laying down the law 'that a painter's pictures will be disqualified for exhibition if he uses more colours on his palette than those which appear in his country's flag.' As she shows, the folk-song allegiance became in time a burden. The younger men soon threw it off, for they saw that world-music cannot be written in a local dialect. Rachmaninov, Glazounov, Scriabin, Tcherepnine, Medtner, Stravinsky, and a dozen others have written music of which it would puzzle anyone to name the 'nationality.'

The degree of Doctor of Music has been conferred by Durham University upon Mr. Nicholas Kilburn, who, as a choral conductor, has been for forty years a leader of music in the Newcastle and Sunderland district. He conducts the Auckland Musical Society, the Middlesbrough Musical Union, and the Sunderland Philharmonic Society.

THE CRISIS OF THE PARIS GRAND OPÉRA.

By M.-D. CALVOCORESSI.

The sudden collapse of the managers of the Paris Opéra House, compelled by financial deficit to resign their office a bare few months before the completion of their seven years' contract, may have seemed astonishing to many, but can hardly have surprised anyone acquainted with the situation that has for a long time obtained.

The Paris Opéra House is a 'national' theatre, supported by the State. The Secretary of State for Fine Arts appoints the manager or managers, who receive the house rent free and a subsidy of £32,000 per annum. The subsidy is eked out by a capital of £60,000 which benevolent supporters and patrons of art subscribe. On the other hand heavy duties rest upon the managers whom their contract binds to give 192 performances a year, stipulating that these performances are to be 'high-class in all respects'; to produce every year eight acts of new operas or ballets by French composers, a certain proportion of which must be works of Laureates of the 'Prix de Rome,' appointed by the Secretary of State.

This latter clause is a most heavy burden. But one may not unreasonably consider it as a fair offset for the subsidy; and admit that, expenses and takings remaining normal, the Paris Opéra might, if not thrive, at least pay its way.

In effect, the former manager, M. Pedro Gailhard, had succeeded in keeping things steady, although extreme dissatisfaction with his doings, from the artistic point of view, was expressed in many quarters. He ran the Opéra House according to obsolete principles, but principles which events now prove to have been, given the circumstances, sound enough.

When MM. Messenger and Broussan were appointed to succeed him, great expectations were founded on M. Messenger's well-known artistic capacities. Despite the shortcomings of the Grand-Opéra as a building and as an institution, it was hoped that he, who had been instrumental in having M. d'Indy's 'Fervaal' and M. Debussy's 'Pelléas et Mélisande' produced at the Opéra-Comique under M. Albert Carré's management, would succeed in giving greater interest and variety to the répertoire, and also in improving the artistic level of performances. But the répertoire remained unchanged. Attempts were made, though in a desultory fashion and with indifferent success, to improve upon the prevalent routine. And soon it became obvious that the Grand Opéra was doomed to remain what it was—an antiquated, drooping institution.

As early as February, 1909, thirteen months after the new managers' accession, came a first crisis. It was made known that the greater part of the subscribed capital had been expended, and that a breakdown was unavoidable. Difficulties, however, were tided over, new capital subscribed, and the smash postponed.

Leaving apart the question to what extent may the downfall be ascribed to mismanagement, and to what extent to accidental causes or to ill-luck, one must remark that many circumstances combined to render it almost unavoidable.

The Opéra is a huge, obsolete, ill-contrived building, thoroughly unsuitable to its purpose. A quantity of space has been wasted on the grand staircase, on the passages and lounges, whereas comparatively little room, and that little inconvenient, is given to store the stage properties, decorations, &c. To ensure sufficient variety even to the current répertoire, decorations and stage properties must ceaselessly be shifted from the theatre to the shops, and back again, at a cost that can well be imagined. All labour is done by hand, there being no motive power; and in order to establish up-to-date plant, it would become necessary to close the theatre for a long period.

All other expenses (cleaning, light, &c.) are on an equally tremendous scale, and increase steadily, owing to the rise of salaries of the hands, of the musicians, &c.

In 1907, shortly before MM. Messenger and Broussan's accession, M. Couyba, in his official report to Parliament, stated that if the Opéra's condition was precarious, the fact was due to the architect as well as to the management. 'The Opéra,' he said, 'is a monster quærens quem devoret, with its twenty stories, its mazes of rooms, corridors, workshops, its forests of scaffoldings, &c. As much as eight or nine thousand square yards of painted canvas may be required for the decorations of one play, as many as seven thousand lamps to supply the light. Two thousand people draw salary from the Opéra. The average cost of each performance is £840, out of which about £160 is supplied by the State subsidy.'

The managers cannot recoup themselves by increasing the number of performances, because part of the staff—and especially the musicians—are unavailable during day-time (a clause introduced in their contract so as to enable them to eke out, by other work, their meagre salaries), and a number of nights have to be kept free for rehearsals.

Nor can a considerable increase in the average takings be hoped for. The Paris Opéra was built specially for production of the grand opera in vogue fifty years ago, which was a social entertainment far more than an artistic function. Even at the time when it was opened to the public (1876) the architect did not escape censure for having given too much thought to pomp and gorgeousness, too little to practical requirements, and even to the bare fact that purchasers of seats might expect to see and to hear.

The unsuitability of the Opéra as a building is still more striking nowadays, when the taste for grand opera has almost disappeared. Hardly anything can be done by way of improvement, and what little is done does not go far to keep the public interested. The Opéra, with its enormous hall and stage, is inappropriate to the classical répertoire, from Lulli to Mozart, Gluck, and Weber. For several reasons, some of which remain unaccountable, the others being the routine and unfitness alluded to, it has not afforded a particularly congenial frame to Wagner's lyric dramas. As to the modern works produced according to regulations, the tale is soon told: out of fifty given during a period of twenty years, not one has proved successful, the expenses of production remaining in all cases a dead loss.

The greater number of French operas produced under the obtaining régime are still-born, written in conventional-wise by composers with no special gift and no special taste for their task, simply because their 'turn' has come. And even before the production everyone interested in the event, from the managers to the public, is generally aware of the issue, and prepared to see the work sink into oblivion after the customary short run of performances.

Facts such as these give rise to the vexata questio of subsidies and protectionism versus independence and normal commercial working of operatic stages as of any other concern, according to the general laws of demand and supply, &c. But for the present I shall not go into the problem except by again emphasising the fact that the Paris Opéra, as a building and as an institution, cannot be run on rational and independent lines.

Here is another case in point: owing to high expenses the managers are compelled to pay low salaries to their singers; and as the prices of seats may not be altered they are debarred from engaging expensive artists. It is no certainty that if they could engage the famous singers who draw full houses in other countries, they would thereby increase their average takings; indeed, this very season, foreign managers have made the bitter experience that even casts of far-famed operatic stars do not suffice to ensure success at Paris. But on the other hand the fortune of the Russian Opera and Ballet companies has proved that there exists at Paris a sufficient number of people ready to pay high prices for their seats if they deem it worth their while. The managers of the Paris Opéra are not allowed to attempt any experiment of the kind.

To define the taste of the Paris public, to offer any suggestion as to the proper way of catering for it within the precincts of the Grand Opéra, is by no means an easy task. One cannot even find points of comparison by studying the working of its long-prosperous rival, the Opéra-Comique, where all—building, scheme of working, public, répertoire—is in complete contrast. Paris has a public for 'Pelléas et Mélisande' as well as for 'Madama Butterfly' or for 'Manon.' But how any public can be brought to support the actual Grand Opéra seems an unsolvable riddle. The new manager, M. Jacques Rouché, is said to be full of hopes. Being an energetic, wealthy man, and surrounded by a competent, eager staff, he is sure to do his best. He has agreed to take charge of the Opéra from the day when MM. Messager and Broussan shall withdraw—viz., September 1, whereas his contract was to start from January, 1915. He will have to contend with all the difficulties that have stood in the way of his predecessors, and the issue shall prove whether these difficulties are unconquerable, as they appear to many, or not.

MUSICAL CLICHÉS AND COPYRIGHT

BY G. H. CLUTSAM.

In a recent article in the Musical Times on the subject of commercial music, I hinted that most of the melodies or tunes that made a frankly popular appeal and attained their ambition were more or less based on a common foundation—or, rather, were variants with modest elaborations of elemental melodic lines. Logically, composers who are mutually dependent on these primitive bases for their inspiration should not have it within their power to claim copyright of any sort, but they are precisely those for whom the protection of the copyright law is most valuable. It may have been noticed that all the cases of musical copyright infringement dealt with in the English courts of law since the Berne Convention have been concerned with protecting music that really was scarcely worth fighting about. For one thing, most of it little deserved the privilege of copyright.

It is not, however, the purpose of this article to deal with the artistic, as distinct from the commercial, vagaries of the copyright laws, but to suggest that certain clichés that have exercised a considerable sway on composers' imaginations for many decades, and have been responsible for commercial successes times out of number, should be accorded a well-deserved rest. At least, unless they can be disguised with a cunning that savours of genius, the privileges of copyright should be entirely denied them. The clichés of the musical journalist are of two sorts. One is concerned with the melodic line, the other with the harmonic support. This last has as well-defined and deliberately reminiscent a sequence as its unabashed partner, the simple tune.

In a diatonic scale, of course, it is only possible to ring the changes of progression on seven notes, and there are even then limitations in the order of selection which no tune-maker dare exceed. Now the main factor in securing a large, general, musically unscientific and immediate attention to a tune is to base its movement on some succession of notes that is absolutely familiar to the public ear. This is generally done by the composer unwittingly, and this type of work is more dangerous than the deliberate. If one went exhaustively into the matter of subconscious filching on the part of any composer who imagines he has evolved a new tune on a diatonic basis some surprising results would accrue from the examination; but in the scope of this article it is only possible, of course, to touch tentatively on a few of the aspects. The examples given have not been selected with deliberation, but in the most casual manner. Perfect accuracy is not guaranteed, as they are all quotations from memory. The reader will be considerably amused, and possibly astonished, if he applies some similar analysis to all the popular melodies that come within his own knowledge.

The descending scale, in part, or in the whole of its course, as a foundation for popular tunes has a fascination for composers (composers who never compose but are inspired by reminiscence and the pianoforte to tune-making are the most susceptible) that is extensively exemplified in almost every publishers' parcel with an astonishing recognition of its powers as an inspiring force, and a much more astonishing insensibility to the fact that whatever slight variation of the idea they may initiate there is not the slightest claim to originality or copyright vested in it. Or rather there should not be.

It is only possible to show by the following examples a very limited number of variations of the descending scale cliché, but that each has had a claim to commercial popularity of no ordinary kind is scarcely to be denied. Tempo and expression marks are unnecessary and invidious under the circumstances. A first illustration can be made, appropriately enough, with our own familiar 'Home, sweet Home':

which diverges only slightly from the equally familiar 'Blue-bells of Scotland':

although a start could actually be made with one of the oldest English tunes known, 'The Carman's Whistle':

Verdi has made a fine and passionate tune of it in 'Traviata' by giving it a different rhythmical swing. (The key is retained for obvious purposes):

and there is scarcely one of his operas in which the phrase as a melodic basis is not used, 'Falstaff' holding (as a swan song) an indisputable and delightfully ingenuous specimen:

Wagner treated the matter seriously in 'Parsifal,' but it is the one phrase in the opera that comes easily to the lay-hearer's recollection:

Innumerable instances exist of the play on the first four notes, but variants with an interval missing or a delayed entrance are extremely common—the drop from the sixth to the third inordinately so. Wagner, in 'Die Meistersinger,' provides a potent example of one form:

which Thomé made into an exceedingly popular piece in another:

and which Leslie Stuart had little difficulty in turning into a patriotic song:

Mendelssohn many years ago evolved a variant (principally harmonic) of which a recollection is, according to circumstances, either a happy one or highly annoying:

Gounod used it many times—the following phrase 'made' one of his most popular songs:

He also tried another way of doing it, with great success:

but before this appeared, the well-known popular ballad writer, Mr. Behrend, had already played about with the thought similarly:

Rubinstein had many shots at the tune. Here is one:

Puccini's contributions are also many. Unadorned, as:

or elaborately disguised, as :

or given an unusual turn, as :

of which a sparkling march-movement has been made. (The composer's name I do not know) :

This is Sousa's version :

and a musical-comedy rendering is :

Popular contributions from other sources are :

and this extremely ingenious transformation, ragtime, I believe :

Three lady song-writers in England have had unusual successes with it :

The most popular song of the year is so nearly related to it, that the difference is easily made clear :

Finally, when Strauss has slaughtered all his enemies in the 'Heldenleben' he chants cock-a-hoop in the universal theme :

There are a thousand and one streams of melody that come from the same fount, and of course no reasonable person would desire them to be particularised ; but as far as this cliché of musical inspiration is concerned, is it not apposite to suggest that any law is entirely incapable of protecting it intelligently ? The special attraction of any or all of these tunes is undoubtedly the familiar features, with their immediate appeal to the public ear.

Classic examples have been avoided in the foregoing. They are multitudinous ; but as the next melodic cliché to be discussed has different characteristics, Beethoven himself, although not the first by any means, can start the ball going in very distinguished fashion.

PERFORMING FEES.

IN our August, 1913, Supplement, we drew attention to the fact that in France, Germany, and other Continental countries there exist Societies of composers and publishers which hold corporately all the performing rights to which their members are entitled. These Societies, through their own officials, undertake the onerous and not always agreeable responsibilities of collecting fees for performances, which they distribute in certain agreed proportions amongst the various interests concerned. It is stated that in this way the French Society alone dealt last year with as much as £200,000. After many discussions held during the last year or two by representatives of the parties most concerned, a Performing Right Society has recently been established in this country. This Society will determine, collect, and distribute to its members the fees payable in respect of works the rights in which are the property of its members. The new body is to work in association with the Continental Societies, and therefore it will derive benefit from the utilisation of the existing machinery of these Societies in the collection of fees due to members for performances given on the Continent.

As an abstract proposition, nothing could appear more reasonable and simple than that a composer should derive some benefit from the public performance of his works. But it is the ruthless application of this idea to existing circumstances and customs in this country that presents difficulties which some would say are insuperable. In the great majority of cases it is the interest of the composer and the publisher to promote performances in order to sell copies of the music, and it is noteworthy that in pursuance of this purpose well-known singers are actually paid to perform songs. Is it likely that this situation can be materially altered ? The scope of the new scheme may be held to include performances of part-songs by small and large choral Societies, anthems by church and chapel choirs, and each of the choirs at a competition Festival or Eisteddfod.

It is a significant fact that in our columns this month it is announced that until further notice and under certain conditions Elgar's Violin concerto may be performed without the payment of a fee. This is not philanthropy. It means simply that the owners of the rights want to encourage performances. Is there any evidence that a patriotic British public evinces such a feverish desire to hear the best works of native composers that concert-givers feel they must at all costs respond? Is it not likely that the pieces for the performance of which fees are demanded will be earmarked and boycotted? It is one thing to tax performances of popular light music given by orchestras in hotels, restaurants, cinemas, and theatres, and quite another thing to tax the village concert given by the local choral Society. But the subject is too large, too intricate, and the proposals, so far as we are acquainted with them, too nebulous, to be discussed profitably at present. A few of the questions that arise have been dealt with in the course of a recent correspondence in the Daily Telegraph, but it is doubtful whether all the numerous interests involved will be placated by what has transpired in the course of this desultory symposium. Nowhere (up to the time we write) has there been any public and official disclosure of vital details of the scheme. The publication of the rules of the new Society would be an enlightenment, and we suggest that its officers should explain to the public how the Society would deal with a miscellaneous concert programme consisting partly of pieces in which they hold rights and partly of pieces the rights of which are extinct or not controlled by the Society. The present administration of the Society may disclaim any intention to worry choral Societies, places of worship, charity concerts, &c., but it is clear they will have the power to do so. L'appétit vient en mangeant. Just now the glove may serve to conceal the iron-hand.

The subject of sight-singing is one SIGHT-SINGING that has perennial interest. There BY INTERVALS. exist methods galore that are more or less successful, but none give universal satisfaction. One is based upon pitch perception, another on interval appreciation, another on the mental effect of scale-tones without regard to interval, and another tries to utilise all these potentialities of the brain-ear. Mr. Samuel Winkley Cole, of Brookline (Boston), U.S.A., has recently paid a short visit to Europe in order to investigate sight-singing conditions here and at Paris, and to explain and advocate the use of an interval method he has invented in which he has great confidence. Instead of naming individual scale-notes or pitches he uses a specific singable syllable for each variety of interval, and he claims that the association of name and effect can be welded by vocalists of average ability. The new method is explained by Mr. Cole and commented upon by the Editor in the School Music Review for August.

The season of Promenade THE Concerts to be given nightly at Queen's Hall by the Queen's Hall PROMENADE Queen's Hall by the Queen's Hall CONCERTS. Orchestra, under Sir Henry Wood, from August 15 to October 24, promises to be the most interesting, in point of novelty, that has yet occurred. No fewer than twenty-one British and twenty-four foreign works will be given for the first time, or, in a few cases, for the first time in London. The British works are the following:

- Aug. 15. 'Sospiri,' for strings, harp, and organ (Op. 70) Edward Elgar
Aug. 18. (a) 'Colonial Song,' for three solo strings, harp, and orchestra Percy Aldridge Grainger
(First London performance of the new version.)
(b) 'Molly on the Shore,' Irish Reel set for full orchestra Percy Aldridge Grainger
(First London performance of the setting for full orchestra.)

- Aug. 19. Overture, 'Friend Fritz' Richard H. Walthew
Aug. 26. New Orchestral Rhapsody, 'From the Prairie' Coleridge-Taylor
(First performance in London.)
Sept. 3. New Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra Cyril Scott
Sept. 10. New Concerto in C for pianoforte and orchestra Kathleen Bruckshaw
Sept. 17. Suite de Ballet, 'Sakura' Percy Pitt
Sept. 19. 'The Language of Flowers' (2nd Suite de Ballet) Frederic H. Cowen
Sept. 22. Three New Songs with orchestra—
(a) 'Hail unto Mary crowned' Felix H. White
(b) 'Love's emblems'
(c) 'The Praises of the King's King'
Sept. 26. Dramatic Fantasy, 'Glaucus and Lone' (Last days of Pompeii) Oskar Borsdorf
Oct. 3. 'In Maytime' H. Balfour Gardiner
Oct. 8. (a) Elegy J. D. Davis
(b) Scherzo
Oct. 10. New Suite for orchestra, 'Fairyland' Henry E. Geehl
Oct. 13. Symphonic-Poem, 'Perseus' Eugène Goossens, Jun.
Oct. 14. 'Conversations,' for pianoforte and orchestra H. Walford Davies
Oct. 15. Dance Rhapsody, for orchestra Frank Bridge
(First performance in London.)
Oct. 20. 'Love and Night' (an arrangement for orchestra alone of the final choral dance from the music-drama The Birth of Arthur) Rutland Boughton
Oct. 22. Aubade, for orchestra (Op. 77) Cyril Scott
Oct. 24. Three Scottish Dances Algernon Ashton

The new foreign works, all of which will be given for the first time in Great Britain, are the following:

- Aug. 20. Sinfonietta (Op. 5) Erich W. Korngold
Aug. 20. Rhapsody in C, for pianoforte and orchestra Béla Bartók
Aug. 22. Concerto in D minor, for orchestra Vivaldi-Sileti
Aug. 25. Tableau Symphonique, 'Fragment de l'Apocalypse' Liadov
Aug. 26. Scherzo Fantastique Stravinsky
Aug. 29. Symphonic-Poem, 'Les Eolides' César Franck
Sept. 1. New Suite, for orchestra Béla Bartók
Sept. 2. Six New Songs, for soprano and orchestra Gustav Mahler
Sept. 5. New Suite, for orchestra, 'Reflets d'Allemagne' Florent Schmitt
Sept. 8. Symphonic-Poem, 'Dante' Granados
Sept. 9. Four Tone-Poems, for orchestra, after Arnold Böcklin Max Reger
Sept. 12. Overture, 'Reineke Fuchs' Karl Bleyle
Sept. 16. Deux Images, for orchestra Béla Bartók
Sept. 22. Marcia di Nozze Aurelio Giorni
Sept. 23. Aria, 'E dove t'aggiri' (Proserpina) Francesco Paolo Saccati
Sept. 29. New Concerto, for violin and orchestra Julius Weismann
Sept. 30. Futurist Impressions, for orchestra Anton von Webern
Oct. 1. Bacchanale, for orchestra Poldowski
Oct. 6. Eine Ballet-Suite Max Reger
Oct. 7. Des Knaben Wunderhorn (Set I), for mezzo-soprano and orchestra Gustav Mahler
Oct. 14. Kinder-Todtenlieder (Infant Death-songs), for contralto and orchestra Gustav Mahler
Oct. 17. Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen, for baritone and orchestra Gustav Mahler
Oct. 21. Concerto Eroico, for pianoforte and orchestra Ottokar Novacek
Oct. 21. Des Knaben Wunderhorn (Set II), for mezzo-soprano and orchestra Gustav Mahler

The general plan of the programmes is similar to that of former years, Mondays being Wagner nights, Fridays classical, Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays 'popular,' and Wednesday nights providing a Brahms or Tchaikovsky Symphony or an extra Beethoven Symphony. The interest of the programmes is sustained, apart from the novelties, by Strauss's tone-poems, from 'Don Juan' to 'Don Quixote,' the Symphony in D minor of César Franck, Stravinsky's 'Fireworks,' pieces by Debussy and other moderns, and many familiar masterpieces of all schools. We will reduce our customary statistical analysis to the statement that British music supplies 76 out of 590 items. They include Elgar's Violin concerto, Variations, 'In the South,' and 'Cockaigne'; Dr. Ethel Smyth's Overture, 'The Wreckers'; Hamilton Harty's 'Comedy Overture'; Vaughan Williams's Overture to 'The Wasps'; Stanford's second Irish Rhapsody; and Bantock's 'Ferishtah's Fancies.'

The programme of the Three-
THE Choirs Festival, to be held at THREE-CHOIRS Worcester on September 6-11, was FESTIVAL. outlined in our issue for May. To the works then named we have now to add the following: Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in D, Lee Williams; Coronation March, Elgar (these at the opening service); Motet, 'Tibi Laus, tibi Gloria,' Orlando di Lasso; Serenata for violin and orchestra, Sibelius (first performance); 'Till Eulenspiegel,' Strauss; Introduction and Allegro for strings, Elgar; Four Hymns for tenor voice and string orchestra, Vaughan Williams (first performance);
Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, Ivor Atkins;
Psalm xlviii., Elgar.

The thirty-first triennial Norfolk
THE and Norwich Musical Festival will NORWICH be held at St. Andrew's Hall, FESTIVAL. Norwich, on October 28-31. The Festival Choir of 290 voices will be conducted at each of the eight concerts by Sir Henry Wood. The new works included in the scheme are two symphonic-poems—'The tinker's wedding' by Hamilton Harty, and 'Spring Fire' by Arnold Bax. A choir of sixty boys from the City of Norwich School will join in the performance of 'Parsifal,' which is to be given on October 30, and Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion, on October 31. 'Elijah,' 'Omar Khayyám' (Part 2), 'Samson and Delilah,' Sir Hubert Parry's 'The Vision of Life' (conducted by the composer), and 'Hiawatha' (Parts 1 and 2) will be given, and among the smaller works it is gratifying to notice Dr. Ethel Smyth's 'Hey nonny no,' also with the composer as conductor. Madame Aino Ackté's singing of the closing scene from 'Salome' may be expected to create a sensation among the music-lovers of Norwich.

Sixteen performances of music,
THE dance and mystic-drama will be GLASTONBURY given at Glastonbury during SUMMER August 5-29, in connection with FESTIVAL. Mr. Rutland Boughton's Holiday
School of Music. Chief interest will probably centre in the performances of the new music-drama 'The Immortal Hour,' and in the application to Wagner of the idea of 'Dancing Scenery.' The closing Scene of 'The Valkyrie' is to be sung by Miss Perceval Allen and Mr. Frederic Austin, while Miss Margaret Morris's dancers perform the functions of Loge's servants in the Fire Music. This takes place during the last week, when there will be performances every day to celebrate the laying of the foundation-stone of the Playhouse. The chief events will take place in the historic grounds, where stand the ruins of the Abbot's Kitchen, or, in the event of bad weather, in the Crispin Hall. Detailed programmes may be obtained from the hon. secretary, Miss S. F. Meade, Horsington, Templecombe.

The post of Reid Professor of Music in the University of Edinburgh has been accepted by Mr. Donald Francis Tovey, the well-known pianist, composer, and musical savant. Mr. Tovey is thirty-nine years of age. From 1894, when he was elected Lewis Nettleship scholar at Balliol, he was long connected with the musical activities of Oxford.
He has given a number of chamber concerts in London—his 'Chelsea concerts' have been a feature of recent seasons—and several at Berlin and Vienna.
His creative work and his pianoforte-playing have always earned the warm admiration of musicians; and Mr. Tovey is, moreover, eminently learned in music and its history.

We understand that the serious
THE damage recently suffered by the ALBERT HALL organ at the Royal Albert Hall ORGAN. involves extensive repairs and reconstruction. It is to be hoped that the Council may be prevailed upon to make this an opportunity for thoroughly overhauling the organ, lowering its pitch in accordance with standard usage in this country, and bringing the instrument into line with modern improvements.

The death of Mr. Harry Evans, which occurred at Liverpool on July 23, removed one of the strongest and most attractive musical personalities that Wales has ever produced. All who knew him intimately, as did the Editor of this journal, looked forward confidently to his enjoying a brilliant career of usefulness, not only to Wales but to the nation at large. He was not a great composer, although he had gifts of imagination. He was simply supreme as a choral conductor and as a stimulator and educator.
He mounted the crest of the great choral wave that through the Competition Festival movement has swept over the whole country. Grateful tributes to his forcefulness in this sphere of musical activity are given in our supplement—the Competition Festival Record—this month. In our issue for August, 1907, we gave a full sketch of Mr. Evans's career up to that date, and a portrait. We feel sure that the renewal of this portrait as a supplement to our present issue will be welcomed by our readers.

Harry Evans was the fifth of a family of ten children.
He was born at Dowlais, South Wales, May 1, 1873. His father, who was a roller of steel plates in an ironworks, spent much of his spare time in training choirs, with which he was successful at Eisteddfodau. Early in his childhood Harry Evans displayed more than average capacity in musical matters. At the age of ten he was appointed 'harmoniumist' of a Congregational Church. He studied piano with Mr. E. Lawrance, a pupil of Moscheles.
When he was fourteen his father gave him the option of entering the ironworks or becoming a pupil-teacher.
The school life was chosen, and in the same year (1887)
he became organist of Bethania Congregational Church.
In 1893 he passed the A.R.C.O., and on this being announced he resigned school work and became a music teacher. He now trained choirs, one of which in 1905 won the chief choral prize at the National Eisteddfod.
He also trained a male-voice choir for the Liverpool National Eisteddfod in 1900, and gained the first prize. One of the eleven choirs that competed was the Manchester Orpheus.
His last success was at Llanelly, and after this he resolved not to compete again as he was so much in request as an adjudicator. In 1902 he became conductor of the Liverpool Welsh Choral Union, and in 1906 he decided to settle in that city, and became the organist of Great George Street Congregational Church. At the Cardiff Festival, in 1904, his dramatic cantata 'The Victory of St. Garmon' was produced with success. Since this period his engagements as conductor and adjudicator have spread over numerous centres throughout the British Isles. He became conductor of the Liverpool University Choral Society, the Liverpool Psalmody Festival, Director of Music at the Bangor University, and choral conductor of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society.

It was in the direction of the concerts of the Welsh Choral Union that he revealed his exceptional powers as a conductor. The most modern works—'The dream of Gerontius,' 'The Apostles,' 'Omar Khayyám,' and recently Granville Bantock's 'Atalanta' and 'Vanity of Vanities'— have been produced. The Union was to have come to London next season to perform the last-named work at one of Sir Henry Wood's Queen's Hall concerts. For further and many interesting details of the late musician's career we must refer our readers to the August, 1907, number of the Musical Times.

MUSICAL NOTATION.

PRACTICAL WAYS OF EXPRESSING
DETAILS OF MUSICAL COMPOSITION.

BY H. ELLIOT BUTTON.

SECTION II.—RESTS.

In the previous section it was shown how the grouping of notes could be used to show the pulsations or beats in the bar. For instance, in the following example it is difficult to realise that the time is 3-4 because the quavers are grouped as in 6-8 time :

Example in 3-4 time.
Organ Sonata in F.

LUARD-SELBY.

But if the passage be written thus :

the grouping shows quite clearly the three pulses in the bar. The consistent use of rests can be made to serve the same useful purpose.

Of the six quavers composing a bar of 6-8 time, the first, of course, bears the strong accent, and the fourth the medium accent. The second and third and the fifth and sixth quavers may be said to be unaccented.

In a bar of 6-8 time the following arrangement of rests would be possible :

but it would evidently be equally possible in a bar of 3-4 time ; some change must therefore be made that will give it the unmistakable appearance of a 6-8 bar. This can be done thus :

Again :

is possible but inadvisable because the crotchet rest is used on one of the unaccented quavers as well as on the strong accent. To avoid this it is only necessary to substitute two quaver rests for the crotchet rest, thus :

One more example will suffice :

This is another ambiguous arrangement, belonging equally to a 3-4 or 6-8 bar. By substituting a dot for the quaver rest the required 6-8 appearance is at once obtained :

Sufficient examples have now been given to provide logical grounds for formulating rules as to the consistent use of rests in 3-8, 6-8, 9-8, and 12-8 times :

Use a crotchet rest (♩) before a quaver (♩) ;

Use two quaver rests (♩♩) after a quaver (♩) ;

Use a dotted crotchet rest (♩.) for half a 6-8 bar or a third of a 9-8 bar or a quarter of a 12-8 bar ;
For half a 12-8 bar use —.

Similar rules are applicable to other times but in some instances need slight alteration.

In 3-4 time :

will be found to work satisfactorily ; as also :

in 6-4 time. But in 3-2 an exception must be made, for as the semibreve rest is used to denote a whole bar :

so to use it to denote two-thirds of a bar :

would be illogical. It is therefore better in the latter instance to use two minim rests instead of the semibreve rest :

It may be argued that as in Section I. the crotchet- or dotted-crotchet-unit was considered advisable in all styles of composition, so there can be no need to study the question of rests in 3-2 time ; but this is not so.

In passages in 4-4 time bars containing six crotchets may be introduced, the time value of the crotchet remaining unchanged. The groupings (and consequently the time-signatures) of these 6-note bars will depend upon the rhythm required. If the rhythm is :

the time-signature will of course be 6-4 ; if the rhythm is :

the time-signature will be 3-2. But in either case the crotchet remains the unit.

The complication of rests to denote several bars' rest, such as :

is quite unnecessary and pedantic. It is a mathematical problem gratuitously giving trouble to the performer, when a dash and figure 7 :

gives the required information without possibility of misapprehension.

SECTION III.—STEMS.

It is only necessary to mention the fact that in writing a melody in the treble clef, notes below B (on middle line) have their stems turned up, and those above B have their stems turned down, since it draws attention to the uncertainty of the behaviour of B. Let the context be the guide, and use stemming, as you use quaver-binds and rests, to group the bar in beats. Thus in the following example :

the B stem is turned down to divide the bar in the middle, the first half of the bar having up-stems and the second half down-stems : this plan is therefore to be preferred to :

Stemming may often be used to show the beats in a bar. The following example is in 12-8 time, but it requires to be studied closely before this fact (or the harmonic scheme) becomes apparent :

Example in 12-8 time.

Pianoforte Sonata, Op. 57 (p. 302, 1st score).

BEETHOVEN.

If, however, we arrange the stems thus :

the four beats of the 12-8 bar and the four chords are at once evident.

Although struck notes and held notes must evidently often be joined on the same stem, it is occasionally inadvisable to do so, e.g. :

is better than :

as it shows clearly that the E is struck again and the G held.

A note to be trilled should have a separate stem and not be connected to another note or notes. The following :

would seem to imply that both the E and the C had to be trilled, whereas in this case :

it is evident that the E only is affected.

In writing anthems, or services in which the organ accompaniment has for reasons of space to be printed on two staves, it is most important that the notes to be played on the pedals should be plainly indicated by writing them on a stem separate from the left-hand part.

Always write the up-stem on the right-hand side of the note-head and the down-stem on the left, thus :

Some composers have a habit of placing them both on the right :

but as this system often leads to confusion it is not to be recommended. The notes to be taken by each hand are much more clearly indicated in the following example :

Andante with Variations (Op. 32).

MENDELSSOHN.

than they are when written with all stems on the right-hand :

It is usually inadvisable to write notes for right and left hands on the same stave, but in two-stave organ music it is often unavoidable. Compare the following :

when the superiority of the stemming here advocated becomes obvious.

There are cases in which it is impossible to make the meaning clear if both stems are written on the right-hand side of the notes, e.g. :

(To be continued.)

CHOPIN AS A MASTER OF FORM.

BY A. REDGRAVE CRIPPS.

THE POPULAR OR LITERARY VIEW OF CHOPIN.

There is probably no musician who has been at once so fortunate and so unfortunate in his posthumous fame as Frederic Chopin. Fortunate, in that he has attracted the attention of many to whom, as a rule, music makes but little appeal; unfortunate, because, largely through that very circumstance, a somewhat false picture of him has little by little been built up. His name has served as a peg on which to hang much empty rhetoric. Thus, we have Chopin the sentimentalist, Chopin the 'tone-poet,' Chopin the lover, Chopin the (supposed) patriot; but Chopin the musician—for him, indeed, we have very far to look.

SERIOUS MUSICIANS NOT UNAFFECTED BY THIS.

It must be admitted, however, that more serious writers who have professedly treated Chopin from a purely musical point of view have not been altogether unaffected by the 'literary' or 'popular' view just spoken of. Indeed, far from correcting it, they have, if anything, rather confirmed it. Thus even Dr. Hadow, in his essay on Chopin (unquestionably the sanest short account of the composer which has yet appeared), permits himself to write as follows: 'We can hardly think of him as marking a stage in the general course and progress of artistic history, but rather as standing aside from it, unconscious of his relation to the world, preoccupied with the fairy-land of his own creation. The elements of myth and legend that have already gathered round his name may almost be said to find their counterpart in his music; it is ethereal, unearthly, enchanted, an echo from the melodies of "Kubla Khan" If his music is sometimes visionary, at least it is all beautiful; offering, it may be, no response to the deeper questions of our life, careless if we approach it with problems which it is in no mind to solve, but fascinating in its magic if we are content to submit our imagination to its spell.' And unfortunately this general view of what may be called the spiritual quality of Chopin's music finds very naturally its reflection in a similar estimate of his position as a musician pure and simple, and especially as a master of form. As Dr. Hadow adds, in a passage which follows immediately after what has just been quoted: 'Precisely the same distinction may be made on the formal side of his work. In structure he is a child, playing with a few simple types, and almost helpless as soon as he advances beyond them; in phraseology he is a master whose felicitous perfection is one of the abiding treasures of the art.'

That this, too, is no mere isolated or individual opinion, but is really representative of the view generally held by musicians need hardly be insisted upon. In case, however, there may be any doubt, we may quote the following passage from Sir Hubert Parry (whose authority of course is beyond question), in which precisely the same opinion is somewhat more crisply put: 'His work is not often great in conception or noteworthy in design, but it is the spontaneous expression of a poetical, refined, and sensitive temperament.'

THE QUESTION OF 'FORM,' AND WHAT IT IMPLIES.

Now, as to Chopin's position in Art in regard to the actual intrinsic or spiritual value of his work it is of course impossible to argue. What means much to one man means little or nothing to another, and there simply is an end of the matter. But with regard to Chopin as a musician, as a master of design, the case is different. Here we have something palpable, something we can weigh, and measure, and discuss, and come to a definite decision about. It may be said, however, that after all a man's 'form'—the mould in which he casts his thoughts—may generally be taken as the measure of the worth of the thoughts themselves. At least is this so in music, where the two are inseparably connected. Should it appear, therefore, that Chopin, far from being the mere wayward and individual genius, the mere artificer of dainty trifles that he is generally supposed to be, is as a matter of fact a master of form second to none,—should this appear, we shall have already gone a great way towards showing that the general estimate of his ultimate or spiritual quality is correspondingly mistaken.

CHOPIN'S POSITION AS A 'PIANOFORTE' WRITER: ITS TRUE SIGNIFICANCE.

Before, however, proceeding to a consideration of Chopin's form, one very obvious circumstance connected with his work must be touched upon: the fact that the great bulk of his compositions (all, in fact, with a few comparatively unimportant exceptions) are written for the pianoforte. It is this, no doubt, which has stood in the way of a more general recognition of his true place in musical art.

Of the perfection of Chopin's writing for the instrument there is indeed no need to speak: it is sufficiently recognised, in words at least (though perhaps it is only those who have actually played his works who can have any conception of how very perfect that perfection is), by all who have written on him. But what needs to be pointed out is that it is precisely because Chopin was not a pianoforte writer at all, in any special sense, that his writing is so perfect. Chopin, that is to say, was not primarily a writer for the pianoforte. We cannot imagine him scheming out special effects for the instrument, as Liszt, or even Schumann (in rather a blundering way) did, and then incorporating them in his music. In the whole of his music—in the whole, that is, of his mature writing—there is hardly an instance of a passage dragged in merely for the sake of display, or to fill up, or for the sake of some special effect; every passage exists only for the sake of its relation to the whole, and apart from that whole would have no meaning. The perfection of his pianoforte writing, in short, lies in this,—that it is only part of a greater perfection: and it is only when this is recognised that we can appreciate in any true sense even the perfection of his pianoforte writing itself.

CHOPIN'S CONCEPTION OF FORM.

One thing further follows almost immediately from what has been said. We must not hope to find in Chopin examples of what theorists are pleased to regard as 'form' in the abstract,—or if we do we shall be disappointed. Theoretical writers are fond of dividing form into different categories,—the 'Sonata form,' 'Rondo form,' the 'Dance form,' and the like. For Chopin—as a composer—such divisions simply did not exist. Indeed, if we would do justice to him we shall do best to start by forgetting that there is such a thing as form, in the abstract, at all. Only then shall we be in a position to view the matter from Chopin's own standpoint; and only then, therefore, can we realise what he aimed at, and how perfectly he achieved his aim.

ROUGH CLASSIFICATION OF CHOPIN'S WORKS (AS REGARDS 'FORM').

Classification, however, provided it be sufficiently rough and loose, may be useful as making for greater clearness. And, taking Chopin's works altogether, we find that, roughly, they may be divided into three classes: (1) Those pieces which are perfectly homogeneous (as to style and 'subject') throughout, and which may therefore be conveniently described as 'one-idea' pieces; (2) those which are made up of two (at least) distinct ideas or 'subjects,' and which may accordingly be called 'two-idea' pieces; and (3) those pieces which consist of a number of 'subjects,' and may be described as 'completely developed' pieces. Of course this classification cannot be strictly maintained: each class merges into the one above it; but that being understood, some such rough classification may make our task easier. It is with the third of these classes (the 'completely developed' pieces) that we are here chiefly concerned. Nevertheless, the principles of construction which Chopin employs are so essentially the same throughout all his works that it will be well to begin by glancing at the first two classes.

THE SIMPLEST OR 'ONE-IDEA' PIECES.

The 'one-idea' pieces (as we have called them) are few and, of course, slight in length. They are to be found almost exclusively among the Preludes and Etudes. Very few, however, of these—in fact, only a few smaller Preludes, such as Nos. 1 to 7, 9, 10, 11, &c.—can be said to be strictly 'one-idea' or absolutely homogeneous throughout. Mostly they may be subdivided into three sections according to the following plan: (1) A 'section' beginning of course on the tonic and making a more or less definite close either in the tonic or (more generally) some allied key; (2) another section, naturally springing from the preceding and forming a continuation to it; and (3) the first section repeated, but altered at end so as to remain in tonic. This plan may be conveniently represented to the eye by the formula $a + b + a$. Nearly all Chopin's Etudes are in this simple form (all of Book I. and nearly all of Book II.), and it is also to be found in a few other smaller pieces. So clear and simple, however, is it that it can hardly be overlooked. As a particularly obvious example the third Etude, Book I., may be quoted. The first section (a) ends at bar 21; the second (b) extends to bar 61; and the first (a) is then repeated, with one phrase omitted. In the Etude which follows immediately, No. 4, the division is less clear; it is not easy to say precisely when the first section (a) ends, though its return (at bar 51) is clear enough. In this Etude, too, as in many others built up on this plan, Chopin extends the final section into a little Coda, thus emphasising the sense of tonality, and rounding off the design.

'TWO-IDEA' FORM.

If in a piece built on the above simple plan the three sections be more distinctly marked off from each other, and given a more distinctly separate character, we have what we have called a 'two-idea' form, which may similarly be expressed by the formula $a + b + a$. This form, in reality, in no way differs from that just spoken of, except in the more decided character of its sections; and it is, as a matter of fact, impossible to draw a hard and fast line between them. As decided examples, however, of the 'two-idea' form may be mentioned Etudes Nos. 5 and 10 in Book II., which may be contrasted with the examples just mentioned of the 'one-idea' form. Other examples may be found in the Valses (Op. 64, Nos. 1 and 3; Op. 70, No. 1), the Mazurkas (Op. 17, Nos. 2 and 4), the Nocturnes (Op. 9, No. 3; Op. 37, No. 1; Op. 48, Nos. 1 and 2), and the Impromptus (Nos. 1 and 4). Examples, indeed, are very numerous; in fact, by far the greater number of Chopin's pieces are founded on this form (which of course is one of the simplest known in music), or else, more commonly, on some simple extension of it. Such extensions are to be found, indeed, in even the smaller homogeneous pieces, especially the Mazurkas and smaller Valses (which may be said to stand about midway between the true homogeneous 'one-idea' piece just spoken of and the more distinct 'two-idea' pieces we are here considering); and generally they take the form of a subdivision of one or other of the sections, making the section so divided a complete little piece in itself. Thus in the Mazurka, Op. 17, No. 1, we have the first section subdivided (giving the formula $ab a + c + ab a$); in the Mazurka, Op. 17, No. 3, both sections are subdivided (giving the formula $ab a + cdc + ab a$). It may be remarked, however, that, as a rule, when the first section is subdivided only the first sub-section is heard on the repetition, as in the Mazurkas, Op. 6, No. 1; Op. 7, No. 1; the Valse, Op. 69, No. 1 (of which the formula is $ab a + c + a$); and the Mazurka, Op. 7, No. 2 ($ab a + cdc + a$). Very often, of course, the first and second sections are divided less obviously, as into two parts only and so on, giving such forms as are to be found in—to take a few examples at random—the Mazurka, Op. 24, No. 1 ($ab + c + a$); Op. 41, No. 1 ($ab + cd + ab a$); Op. 7, No. 3 ($ab + cd + d + e + a$). In the last of these, as in some other Mazurkas, a certain unity is given by the repetition of an opening phrase at the end. To go, however, over all the varieties to be found would be unnecessary as well as tedious; and it is, of course, in the larger (or 'two-idea') pieces that the possibilities of this simple form are most strikingly conveyed. In these nearly always the first section is itself subdivided, and very often the second: as in the Scherzo, Op. 20, ($A(a + b + a) + B + A(a + b + a)$); the Polonaises, Op. 26, No. 2 ($ABA + C + ABA$); and Op. 40 No. 2 ($A(a + b + a) + B(a + b + a) + Aa$). Here, too, very often only the first subdivision of the first section is heard on the repetition; and it may be remarked that, as in the smaller forms also where this is the case, and especially where the three sub-sections of the first sections are pretty distinctly divided, the effect on the hearer is often that of the 'Rondo' form. The simple form we are considering, however, is capable of even wider expansion than in the pieces just named. This may be seen from such pieces as the Scherzos, Nos. 3 and 4, and the Barcarolle. These, it is true, verge towards the 'completely developed' pieces presently to be considered: but in all of them the underlying 'three form' ($A + B + A$) may be distinctly traced. Another method of extension (not so often employed) may be mentioned: it lies in the simple device of introducing after the repetition of the first section not a new section, but the second section again, following this by the first section once more,—thus making the formula $A + B + A + B + A$. This may be seen very clearly in the second Ballade (F major) and the third Scherzo (C# minor).

CHOPIN'S MASTERY OF FORM SHOWN IN HIS PERFECT MANAGEMENT OF ARTISTIC RESOURCE.

It is, however—and this fact cannot be too strongly emphasised—not the mere fact that most of Chopin's compositions can be reduced to a certain form, or formula (satisfying to the eye), that makes him a master of form; otherwise any duffer who can compose in accordance with some predetermined scheme (and what duffer, alas! cannot?) would be a master of form. It is in the wealth of resource exhibited within the limits of that form that his mastery is shown.

Unfortunately, it is precisely this resource, this mastery of detail, which it is impossible to illustrate on paper. It is, however, so essential to our argument that the attempt must be made. Let us take as an example the Nocturne in F♯ major, Op. 15, No. 2 (quite a fair average specimen of Chopin's short works), and examine it a little in detail. It obviously exhibits the extremely simple form of A + B + A; but let us see how the details are carried out. The first section (A), which consists of a little sentence repeated in a more ornamental form, obviously ends at bar 16; it is very clear as regards tonality, and thus a very distinct impression of key is made on the hearer. To it succeeds a passage which seems to grow out of it, and which, from the first bar, we might expect to go on in much the same way for some time. The bass, however, falls rapidly from C♯ to A♯ by steps of semitones, thus producing a feeling of uncertainty or confusion in the mind (as if the ground were suddenly giving way), which is only partially dispelled when A♯ is at last reached. This A♯ (felt as a dominant) would seem to prepare the way for D♯ minor, but after a weighing of A♯ in the treble (a good example of a special pianistic device applied absolutely subserviently to the broader principles of design) the music is suddenly turned off into a section built up almost entirely of dominant harmony. To pursue our analysis further in detail, however, though easy, would be superfluous. It is sufficient that here, in these first twenty-four bars, we see the devices of clear tonality and rhythmic arrangement, confused tonality, ornamentation, and even a particular device for the instrument (an exceptional thing in Chopin), all used together for an artistic purpose. The piece as a whole shows Chopin as a perfect master of form, not because it corresponds to an elementary formula, A + B + A, but because, within the limits of that formula, it interests. The mind is carried forward irresistibly from one point to another; every bar is felt to be inevitable, and yet when first heard it has that element of strangeness or surprise which is necessary to all great art. Within its limits, it would be difficult to imagine a better example of the perfect management of artistic resource.

TONALITY AS A FACTOR IN FORM: CHOPIN'S ATTITUDE HERE.

Tonality, or key-relationship, as a factor of form, is of course most important, and Chopin's attitude in regard to this is particularly worthy of notice. It is often supposed that here he is wildly revolutionary; but a very little consideration of his works will show that this is quite a mistake. It is true that he often, even in the smaller pieces (though by no means always), eschews the well-worn contrasts of tonic and dominant; but where he does so it is obviously from no mere eccentricity or waywardness, but from an artistic desire to obtain greater variety through a wider or more subtle contrast. Where he thus avoids what are called the 'nearly related' keys it is noticeable that he very often, in fact nearly always, chooses some key (either major or minor) at the distance of a third (major or minor) above or below his tonic. Examples of this are so numerous that it can hardly be necessary to quote any. But it is in the larger pieces, divided or subdivided into several sections, that this use of the distance of the third as the basis of the principle of tonal contrast is most clearly displayed. Especially in those pieces in which the second section itself is repeated (which we have represented by the formula A + B + A + B + A) it is apparent. In such pieces, whatever key B may first appear in, it is generally placed, on its repetition, in a key a third (major or minor) higher or lower. A very good and clear example of this is the Nocturne in G, Op. 37: the contrasting section is first introduced (bar 28) in C major, and on its reappearance (bar 83) in E major, —a third higher. Here, too, it is worthy of remark, that the first four bars of the theme are brought in at the end to round off the design as a sort of Coda, in the tonic G,—thus completing the steps of thirds upwards. Another good example is afforded by the Finale of the Sonata in B minor. Here, however, the second or contrasting section is itself subdivided into two parts, the first in B major, and the second in F♯ major; and on its repetition the first part is transposed a major third upwards and the second part a minor third downwards, so that it appears in E♭ major throughout. (In this movement, too, the first section is itself—rather exceptionally—transposed, appearing first in B minor, then in E minor, and then in B minor again.) That there is, however, nothing mechanical in this use by Chopin of the distance of the third as his principle of key contrast is shown by such a movement as the Nocturne in D♭, Op. 27, No. 2 (which is written in the form, a + b + a + b + a + b + Coda), where the second section, which appears originally in B♭ minor, is on its first repetition transposed to A major, but with certain subtle modifications; appearing afterwards for the third time in E♭ minor. In fact, it may be said of Chopin's choice of key relationship, as of his form pure and simple, that in every case it seems to grow inevitably from his thought; and the proof of this is that if we take almost any of his works and try to imagine the key centres changed, the effect is felt at once to be absolutely ruined. Try to imagine the Nocturne in C minor, Op. 48, for instance, with the second section in E♭ major instead of C major! Such points as we have been here able to deduce are worthy of note as forming part of what may be called his unconscious scheme; though it may be added it is in the larger or 'fully developed' pieces that they find their fullest application.

SOME OF THE EVILS OF 'HARMONIC' STRICT COUNTERPOINT.

BY C. H. KITSON.

Those who adversely criticise the study of strict counterpoint are generally either those who do not understand it, or those who cannot write it. Nevertheless, even for the intelligent student it presents many enigmas, many difficulties which arise from the method of study. You cannot put new wine into old wine-skins, and the more you attempt to bring strict counterpoint 'up to date,' the more illogical it becomes. The use of the term 'chord' in reference to this subject is liable to be very misleading in some important directions, and the utterly false idea that it is a licence to change the harmony in the bar (representing two accents) leads to some absurd positions. I do not suppose anyone would gainsay that in the example below:

(a) was the chord of F major, (b) was the dominant thirteenth in C major.

Now such a procedure as the above is legitimate strict counterpoint arising from the combination of first, second, and third species. But a student of strict counterpoint is taught that he may only use common chords and their first inversions, and the first inversion of the diminished triad: and he would have qualms about using the above in strict counterpoint. But his teacher will say, 'This is quite right: E, D, B, and G are all unessential notes. You are using one chord in the bar.' This is pernicious teaching, because the analysis is quite at variance with the effect. If you use the term chord at all the combination on the second minim has just as much right to be called a chord as that on the first minim. But herein comes the danger: being taught to analyse the music in a way that is at variance with the effect, the student will probably write:

The master will pass this by unnoticed. Next day the pupil may bring a piece of composition containing the following:

and the master will at once pounce upon him for quitting the seventh (F) incorrectly. This is merely a reductio ad absurdum. I do not say that the interval system will prevent this fault, but it will prevent an illogical analysis, and a confusion of principles.

The essential intervals are the third and perfect fifth, and third and sixth from the bass (as applied to the modes). The term chord should not be used at all.

Until quite recently hardly a student dare use two different essential combinations in the bar, or, if you will, two chords in the bar. This ridiculous restriction, invented by Macfarren, has led many students to analyse their music in a way quite at variance with the effect:

The evil lies in their adding further notes that are concordant with the first group of the bar, but are hideous on the second accent:

But even those who have always allowed two chords in the bar (as a matter of fact, no one has the right to lay down any law in the matter) say that a change may be made on the second crotchet, but not on the fourth. Now the practice of the polyphonic period exhibits no restriction beyond the dictates of commonsense. You may leap to or from a concordance, but you must approach and quit a discordance by step. The restriction that a change of harmony may not be made on the fourth crotchet results in some absurd positions. Any musical person feels that the second of the three following examples is infinitely preferable to the first:

Ex. 6.

And yet theorists would condone (c) while condemning (d), and they would pass (e), for they would argue that (e) was not a change of chord at all! Here the analysis is quite contrary to the effect. A change of harmony may be made anywhere in the bar. It is best on the second minim; it is quite good on the fourth crotchet; it is weak and awkward on the second crotchet. The examination nuisance makes students argue in the following absurd fashion:

Ex. 7.

Again, the statement that only common chords and their first inversions can be used is very misleading in reference to the use of prepared discords, which are combined with the consonances:

Ex. 8.

(f) is a dominant seventh, (g) is a $\frac{6}{4}$.

If only common chords and first inversions are to be used, the logical deduction is that (f) and (g) cannot be used. But they are a regular part of the resource, and are quite intelligible so long as we keep the term 'chord' out of the scheme. Any prepared dissonance can be used in conjunction with a consonant combination, so long as its resolution forms a consonance with the other parts (either stationary or moving).

It will thus be seen that:

- (1) A system of chords induces a student to think he cannot use certain combinations that are quite legitimate;
- (2) The one-chord-a-bar myth induces an analysis that is often completely at variance with the effect, and has pernicious influence on composition.

Of course, one does not say that two harmonies in a bar should be used on every conceivable occasion, but such a procedure in combined counterpoint is no more a licence than to use a different chord for each accent in a hymn-tune, for the semibreve covers two accents.

It is not, as some people imagine, an easy way out of a difficulty. It is the only musical means of combining first, second, and fourth species. Someone will say that if in combining these species you use two chords you are not doing what you set out to do. The reply to this is: (1) I did not set out to write second and fourth species against a semibreve which necessarily implied one chord; (2) Strict counterpoint is a principle of horizontal movement, not of chords at all. If I get my second species adequately conjunct, I achieve my aim, no matter whether I use two chords in a bar or one. This confusion of argument would all disappear if we got back to the original principles.

The more one teaches, the more one is convinced that strict counterpoint must be taught exactly as it was, including the use of the modes. The only other alternative is to devise something entirely new.

DR. D. F. SCHEURLEER: HIS WRITINGS AND COLLECTIONS.

BY JEFFREY PULVER.

The prospector walks over many a gold-mine and is ignorant of its existence; gold seldom sets up a signboard bearing the legend 'Dig here.' Nor do the treasures of musical palæography and bibliography; and many a research worker has passed through or near The Hague without suspecting the almost priceless collections possessed by Dr. Daniel François Scheurleer, banker and amateur. It was only after working in the libraries connected with the Amsterdam University that I became aware of the fact that an enormous amount of useful material was lying in Holland's social capital; a hint from the librarian, Dr. C. P. Burger, sent me to seek the entrée to the collector of The Hague, and this courteous and learned gentleman was immediately ready to assist me in every way. A chat on matters of musical history and bibliography in the banker's office in the Spui-sstraat, and a visit to his bookshelves in the Laan van Meerdervoort were experiences that will remain long in my memory.

It will of course be impossible to describe the contents of the Scheurleer library in an article of this kind; such an undertaking would necessitate a shelf-full of volumes, and an idea of the magnitude of the collection may be formed from the remark that the catalogue alone requires three volumes. But the catalogue, fortunately, is easily accessible to readers who use the British Museum libraries, and from it all the information required, short of the actual text of the works, can be obtained. A few of the gems of this collection, chosen almost at random, deserve especial mention. Here we find works of every description; from the histories and dictionaries common to almost every library, to some of the earliest and rarest examples of the printer's art as applied to music. Several copies and facsimiles of rare books are also included, and although these do not please the collector so well as originals would, they are of immense use to the historian who has to do only with the contents. Among the foreign publications that have been brought together by Dr. Scheurleer, I must name the 'Theorica Musice' of Gafurius, 1492, and the 'Arithmetica, Geometria, et Musica Boetii' of Boethius, 1492: works that in spite of their necessary shortcomings have become landmarks in musical history. Sebastian Virdung, comparatively reliable, is represented by his 'Musica getutscht und aussgezogen,' Strassburg, 1511. A Paris Missal with music, dated 1515, is interesting; so is Martin Luther's 'Deutsche Messe' (also containing music), published at Wittenberg in 1526. Continuing to adhere to chronological order regardless of place of publication, the next interesting works to merit mention above the countless others that must remain unnamed are Pierre Attaignant's 'Trente et une Chansons' (1529), Martin Agricola's 'Musica figuralis Deudsch' (1532), and Sebald Heyden's interesting and useful 'De Arte Canendi,' Nürnberg (1540). Glareanus, so often quoted, has his monument in the Scheurleer collection in 'Dodekachordon' (1547). Zarline, the teacher of Sweelinck, can be read in two works dated 1571 and 1573, and Baltazar de Beauioyeux in his 'Balet Comique de la Roynie' (1582). 'Il Primo Libro de Madrigali,' Venice, 1586, is the interesting work of the great madrigalist, Luca Marenzio, and another book of the same class of composition is 'Il vago alboreto di Madrigali et Canzoni,' published by Peter Phalese in his Antwerp days (1597). An interesting copy of the Abbé Jean Tabourot's (Thoinot Arbeau) 'Orchésographie' (1589) is contained in the collection; it is the book that was in the possession of J. B. Despréaux, dancing-master to the Empress Marie Louise, and contains some notes in his handwriting. Published works of Salomone Rossi are not frequently met with, but a copy of his 'Il Primo Libro de Madrigali à cinque voci' (Venice, 1600) is in the Scheurleer library. The collector's illustrious countryman, Jan Sweelinck, is represented (among other works) by his 'Rimes françoises et italiennes mises en musique,' Leyden, 1612. Especially noticeable is the fine collection of works by Orlando di Lasso, elegant and most distinguished son of the Low Countries. We find his 'Novem quiritationes Divi Job. Quaternis vocibus,' Paris, 1565 (Superius), and five other works dated 1585, 1587, and 1604. There are also the 1565, 1566, and 1567 'Libri di Madrigali,' and the 'Thrésor de Musique,' 1582 (the British Museum copies are dated 1576 and 1594). The last-named work has a title-page reading 'Orlando de Lassus, Prince de Musiciens de nostre Temps,' and which states that the book is 'augmenté de plus de la moitié en ceste seconde édition.' The library also possesses Lasso's 'Newe Teutsche Lieder' (1583). Very entertaining was the squabble over the proposed engagement of a dancing-master for the now no longer existent University of Franeker in Friesland. Dr. Scheurleer has most of the different books and pamphlets that appeared (1682 and 1683) giving the arguments for and against the innovation. Worthy of note, too, are several of the early 16th century publications of the works of Georg Rhau, and a wonderful collection of 'Souterliedekens' (Psalms with texts in the vernacular) goes further to enrich this magnificent library. It would be impossible even to name the many works of Froberger, Frescobaldi, Mattheson, Marpur, Corelli, Geminiani, Graun, Hasse, Handel, Arne, Campra, Collasse, Lully, Desmarests, &c., &c., that are included in the catalogue. Some first editions of Bach and Beethoven are interesting.

Of the English works represented in the collection a few taken haphazard will show the nature and extent of Dr. Scheurleer's possessions. John Dowland's translation of 'Andreas Ornithoparcus his Micrologus' (1609) is there, a few notes respecting this quaint and entertaining work being given in my article on John Dowland in Musical News (January 25 and February 1, 1913). Another interesting English publication is 'The whole Booke of Psalmes: collected into English Meeter by Thomas Sternhold, John Hopkins, and others, conferred with the Hebrew, with apt notes to sing them with all,' London, 1628. The editions of 'The whole Booke of Psalmes,' by the same editors, published in 1565 and 1632, are also in the collection. 'The English Dancing-Master' is represented in four editions: 1651, 1686 (seventh edition), and the fourteenth and seventeenth editions. Christopher Simpson's 'Chelys, &c. . . or The Division Viol' is present in its second edition (1667), and the same writer's 'Compendium of Practical Musick in five parts' in its third edition (1678). Matthew Locke's 'Melothesia' (J. Carr, 1673), Thomas Mace's 'Musick's Monument' (1676), and Henry Playford's 'Theater of Music' (1685), are also to be found among a very large quantity of English music published during the 17th century. Dr. Scheurleer owns, besides these, several books of songs and instrumental music by Henry Purcell, Dr. Blow, and other composers of that period, and also interesting specimens of the 'Catch Club' music. Illustrative of the fact that English music of the Stuart era was still highly appreciated on the Continent, there is a book of Fancies copied from English sources: 'T. Lupo, J. Coprario, W. Daman. XX Konincklycke Fantasien, om op 3 fioolen de Gamba en ander speel-tuigh te gebruycken. Gestelt door de Kunstige Engelse speelmeesters. En noch IX Fantasien om met 3 Fioolen de Gamba te gebruycken, door Orlando Gibbons' (20 Royal Fancies for three Viols da Gamba and other instruments. Set by the most cunning English virtuosi. And besides, 9 Fancies for three Gambas by O. G.).

But Dr. Scheurleer is not content with collecting the works of others; he has himself added much interesting and instructive matter useful to the student of musical history. Only a few of his works can be mentioned. Very useful and well-informed are his writings dealing with Mozart and his times, the first work on this subject being 'Mozart's Verblijf in Nederland en het Muziekleven aldaar in de laatste helft der achttiende eeuw' (M.'s sojourn in Holland and musical life there in the second half of the 18th century), published by Martinus Nijhoff at The Hague in 1883. This book has been cited in my article on Otto Jahn (Musical Times, April, 1913). It goes through the story of Mozart's life and work in the Low Countries, and gives a realistic picture of the state of music there and then. In 1906, Dr. Scheurleer published (Nijhoff, The Hague), 'Portretten van Mozart,' an interesting little pamphlet giving a summary of the activity of the master-symphonist, drawing especial attention to the various portraits and pictures made of him; the booklet contains twenty-three plates showing Mozart in as many different epochs. The culmination of the doctor's studies in Mozartiana was reached with the publication of his 'Het Muziekleven in Nederland in de Tweede Helft der 18e eeuw, &c.' (Nijhoff, The Hague, 1909). This sumptuous volume, containing more than two hundred illustrations copied from old portraits, etchings, and prints, gives an excellent idea of Holland, from the musical point of view, during the period treated. The work is enriched by the substance of Leopold Mozart's letters, written while on tour, for which the author owes thanks to Prof. Dr. Max Seiffert, of Berlin. A work that must have cost its author very much labour is the excellent catalogue of the Scheurleer collection, published in three volumes 1893, 1903, and 1910. It gives occasional bibliographical notes, and facsimiles of some title-pages make the work more interesting than catalogues usually are. Only 120 copies were printed, and the book is not on the market. Another useful work of Dr. Scheurleer's is 'Een deuoot ende Profitelyck Boecxken,' a reprint, with copious notes and instructive introduction, of 'a sacred song-book with melodies of 1539.' Facsimiles of the title-page and the types used for text and music in the original (Simon Cock, Antwerp, 1539) make it entertaining, and a thematic index renders it useful (The Hague, Nijhoff, 1889. 350 numbered copies). Further works are 'De Souterliedekens. Contributions to the History of the oldest Dutch Psalm-rhyming' (100 numbered copies, Leiden, 1898), published also in German in the same year; 'Niederlandsche Liedboeken,' a list of song-books published in Holland before 1800 (Nijhoff, The Hague, 1912), an index of writers, publishers, and printers, making the contents easily accessible; and 'Twee Titanen der Negentiende Eeuw, Hector Berlioz en Antoine Wiertz' (Two Titans of the 19th century, Berlioz and Wiertz), published at Haarlem in 1878. In 1898, Dr. Scheurleer published his 'Ecclesiasticus,' a collection of hymns, prayers, and psalms from ancient sources, with texts in several languages; in 1877 his 'Richard Wagner's "Meistersinger von Nürnberg";' and in 1909 his 'Jean Marie Leclair in Holland.' The foregoing represent only a part of the collector's musico-literary activity, the complete list of his works containing many more books, pamphlets, and articles.

Daniel François Scheurleer was born November 13, 1855, is a doctor, honoris causa (1910), president of the North Holland Musical Association, member of many other learned societies, and is descended from our old adversary, Admiral von Tromp, and also from Prof. Tulp, of the Rembrandt 'Anatomy lesson.' He possesses, besides his books, a huge collection of ancient musical instruments. His book-plate is:

Church and Organ Music.

THE COMPLEAT ORGANIST.

BY HARVEY GRACE.

VIII.—OF OLD ENGLISH ORGAN MUSIC (continued).

Thomas Adams is represented by an Overture in C (No. 1†), an 'Air varied' (No. 11), and a Fantasia in C minor (No. 32). The Overture is by way of being well known, and seems to have kept its place as a recital piece since the composer's day. While it contains many effective points, and has a notably bold harmonic scheme, there is too much 'padding' of the kind all too familiar in Haydn and Mozart when those great men nodded. Adams appears to much better advantage in the 'Air varied'—a pleasant tune, with four admirably-written Variations (the fourth being specially good), and only needing a somewhat better Coda to make it above reproach. This work would make a good study for a fairly advanced pupil, and would be useful in impressing on him the fact that the most elementary form of variation—by figuration—may be employed without triviality. Adams shows his ability to provide us with strong meat in his Fantasia in C minor. It consists of three movements,—a four-part Fugue, ending on a half-close in the dominant, an Andante

* On the Continent the E flat is called Es.

in C major, and a second Fugue at the end of which the subjects of both are combined. The Andante is of the complacent, Haydn-and-water style into which the composers of the period sometimes relapsed, and was evidently intended as jam to help in the swallowing of the tough fugal work. Fortunately it has no thematic connection with the rest of the fantasia, and may well be omitted, the work then being a double Fugue of the kind familiar to us in the C minor example in the organ works of Bach. The first section gives us three pages of solid treatment of a brief, sturdy subject. The writing is full of colour, and rich in suspensions and their resultant ashes. I quote the final entry of the subject in the bass, with an excellent close stretto:

Ex. 1.

The second subject is a good foil, being an animated affair of quavers and semiquavers springing boldly from tonic to submediant. After five pages of flowing and vigorous treatment, with some particularly good episodic writing, the two subjects are combined, with subsequent use of the first subject stretto against the second, thus:

Ex. 2.

Altogether, this work of Adams (with the unnecessary Andante omitted) is a credit to English organ music, and deserves to be widely known.

Benjamin Cooke's Introduction and Fugue (No. 2) suffers by comparison, being rather loosely thrown together, and with episodes which merely 'fill in' rather than discuss. Nevertheless there is some effective writing, and the massive and daring cadence is fine.

John Stanley, the famous blind organist, is drawn on for a Voluntary in G minor (No. 3), consisting of an introductory Adagio (more coherent and interesting than such things were wont to be) and a fluent Allegro moderato, with a pronounced Handelian flavour.

Thomas Attwood Walmisley's Prelude and Fugue in E minor (No. 4) is of the serious and earnest cast that might be expected from its composer. The Prelude is a refreshing change from the casual introductions that so often did duty at the time, being a movement of four pages, with a good theme well treated. The Fugue perhaps suffers from too continuous a use of quaver movement in all the parts, but is a capital piece of work, dignified and wholesome. An episode at the beginning of page 7 provides us with one of those 'thematic coincidences' that happen in the best regulated circles, Bach's short Fugue in E minor being recalled. As the subjects of both Fugues have for a feature a two-note figure preceded and followed by a rest, Walmisley may easily be acquitted, since the episodic use of this part of the subject could hardly lead to anything else but coincidence.

Samuel Wesley was one of the most original composers of his time, and as may be expected some of the best music of this series comes from his pen. He also provides one of the most unequal of the works in his Voluntary in C (No. 7). The opening Largo contains music full of splendid vigour, and our expectations naturally run high. Unfortunately, the Andante larghetto which follows shows us Wesley putting on at intervals the garb of Haydn. When he discards it he is his bold and original self. But the two styles do not mix, with the result that at one moment we are playing some not very interesting reminiscences, and the next admiring clever treatment of a fugue subject.

Wesley owes nothing to anybody else (save perhaps his beloved Bach) in No. 9, the magnificent Prelude and Fugue in A. The adjective is one that needs living up to, but the more one looks at this work, the more sure one feels that the term is fairly deserved. The Prelude alone is a big work,—six pages made up of massive chords, rushing semiquavers, and fine sequential passages. Fine as it is, the Fugue is even finer, a telling subject being worked with a craggy full-blooded vigour that cries no halt until the final bar. A quotation from page 9, showing an entry of the subject in the bass, gives a good idea of the energetic style of the movement:

Ex. 3.
Allegro con moto.

The last page contains a stretto at one crotchet's distance. Both Prelude and Fugue are difficult, but well repay time and trouble spent on them.

We find Wesley in lighter mood in Three short pieces (No. 12)—a Prelude with a bass moving throughout in quavers, an Air, and a Gavotte; the first a sturdy piece suitable for an out-voluntary, and the second and third tuneful, quiet movements. This set would be excellent study for a pupil who had just finished Bach's Eight Short Preludes and Fugues.

Of William Russell's three Voluntaries in A (No. 5), in C (No. 8), and in D (No. 30), the last is easily the best. No. 5 consists of two pleasing soft movements, a Siciliano and an Allegretto moderato, while in No. 8 we have a couple of movements too reminiscent of Haydn to be entirely satisfactory. The Voluntary in D minor is a much stronger piece of work,—indeed, it is one of the best of the series. A Larghetto in D minor of a couple of pages serves as introduction to a very bright Fugue of seven pages. The music throughout is spontaneous and attractive, and the key-scheme is more interesting than is usual in works of the period, the subject having entries in D minor, G minor, B flat, and F. Some effective pedal-points and a stirring Coda are features in this lusty movement. It is fairly difficult.

Dr. Croft's Voluntary in D (No. 13) provides us with a well-worked double Fugue, and Dr. Boyce, in his Two Voluntaries (No. 15), expresses himself vigorously, though in short space. Both works take the form of Introduction and Fughetta, and are effective and excellently written—the kind of music that a pupil with a healthy taste would work at with enjoyment and profit. Of Dr. Nares's Introduction and Fugue in E \flat (No. 17), the Fugue is by far the better portion. Much superior all round is the companion work in A (No. 18). The Introduction is an effective Largo, and the Fugue brightly written and full of tuneful life. The composer toys with his subject skilfully, once (at the end of page 8) threatening us with a stretto by inversion, though he thinks better of it after a few notes. The inverted form of the subject plays a large part in the scheme of a delightful movement. In No. 19 we have two little pieces by Jonathan Battishill, Andante in A, and Alla Marcia in B \flat , both easy and tuneful, while a capital double Fugue is to be found in No. 21—a Voluntary by John Travers. Of the Three slow movements that make up No. 22, the most attractive is John Bennett's Adagio, a charming little work, the other two pieces being by Thomas Adams and William Walond. William Felton is known in most quires and places where they sing only by a distressful single chant. Here is his Concerto in E \flat (No. 26), consisting of four movements,—a Tempo ordinario (an introductory couple of pages of no great moment), a vigorous fugal Allegro, a charming Alla siciliana, and a jolly Gavotte,—making up a Concerto well worth revival. The Introduction and Allegro by John Keeble (No. 33) contains much attractive music, but its great length—sixteen pages—is against its being used. I venture to suggest its reduction to reasonable proportions by the omission of the Introduction, and a 'cut' from the last bar but one on page 3 to the second bar on page 9. The form of the piece is somewhat casual, so one need not be over-scrupulous in the matter, and the pages omitted contain chiefly conventional passage work. The last number of the series is a Voluntary in D minor by William Walond of which the Allegro moderato, an excellent fugal movement, is the principal feature.

Lying outside this interesting collection, but claiming attention on much the same grounds, are the organ works of Samuel Sebastian Wesley. While the Choral Song, the Fugue in C, and the Air with variations known as 'Holsworthy Church Bells' are widely appreciated (my copy of the last-named bears the legend 'Seventeenth edition'!) the merits of the Fugue in C \sharp minor are hardly recognised as they deserve to be. A comparison between it and its popular companion in C major surely leaves one in no doubt as to its superiority.

Like the Fugue in A by Samuel Wesley, noticed above, it can be placed in the company of the finest specimens of its form and take no shame. In its breadth and noble melancholy it recalls such works as the Bach B minor and D minor (Dorian) Fugues. And yet this emotional music is largely built up of fugal devices, used with astonishing skill,—one more proof, if any were needed, that to a composer with a message formal excellence is not the strait-waistcoat our modern eccentrics would have us believe it to be. The various stretti will repay close study. The first notable one begins in the last bar of page 6 (I refer to the revised edition), and is a fine specimen of stretto by augmentation. Not only are both forms of the subject used in full, but the counter-subject: which appears completely for the first time in the bass, commencing in the last bar of page 5, is also used, together with an interesting free part. In the last bar of line 2, page 7, commences a stretto by augmentation and inversion with the counter-subject again used intact. On page 8, bar 4, begins a combination of the subject with an inversion of its augmented form, the counter-subject still fitting into the scheme. A stretto between treble and alto at two bars distance over a dominant pedal, with some delightful counter-point in the tenor, is found on page 9, line 1, and as a fitting climax, in the last bar of page 10 we find the subject appearing in all four parts at once, the subject and its inversion in the treble and tenor, and augmentations of subject and inversion in the alto and bass. I quote the stretto, with three bars of the pungent questioning passage which precedes it, and from which it gains much of its effectiveness:

EX. 4.

EX. 5.

What an organ composer was here, born out of due season! Had he lived in these days of fine organs and organ music what might he not have done?

Meanwhile, seeing what he and others of our native old-time organ composers managed to achieve, in pite of their handicaps, it remains for us to honour their efforts, not by erecting tablets to their memory, but by making use of the best of their music. All the simpler of the pieces mentioned in this article are excellent for teaching purposes, and would give the young pupil a keener interest in our musical past than he is likely to obtain from lists of names and dates. Indeed, an examination of the 'Old English Organ Music' series in chronological order gives one an admirable mental picture of the growth of instrumental music in England. But apart from historical or patriotic grounds the music itself claims consideration by virtue of its qualities of frank melody and healthy vigour. Save for an occasional reminder of the Haydn-Mozart school, the music has the straightforward directness that we still think of as an English quality. The fugal writing is generally excellent,—considering the scarcity of good models available at the time, surprisingly so. Finally, when a few years ago the greater part of this old music was inaccessible, being either in manuscript or in old collections long since out of print, there was good reason for our neglect of it. But now that the best of it is brought to light, carefully edited and adapted to the modern organ, it should on all grounds—antiquarian, patriotic, sentimental, and musical—take its place among those collections of standard works without which no organist is complete.

The arrangements for the Summer School of Church Music, to be held at Cambridge from August 17 to 22, have now been completed. The aim of the School is similar to that of the gathering at Oxford last year—namely, to draw into consultation those who are anxious to raise the musical standard of churches. The meetings will be held in Sidney Sussex College, and daily lectures will be given by various authorities. Dr. Alan Gray will speak on the subject of organ voluntaries, Mr. Geoffrey Shaw will deal with the organization of singing, Mr. Francis Burgess will lecture on plainsong, and Mr. Martin Shaw will address the members of the School on the singing of the daily services. The important subject of hymnody will be dealt with by the Rev. Maurice Bell, and it is hoped that Prof. Burkitt, Dr. Charles Wood, and other theologians and musicians will be present to take part in the discussions. The scheme provides for actual performances of good-class music, including at least one service of the polyphonic type, for which Dr. Cyril Rootham will be responsible. Further particulars may be obtained from the hon. secretary, the Rev. A. S. Duncan-Jones, Blofield Rectory, Norwich.

In regard to an announcement which appeared in last month's issue as to the origin of the hymn-tune sung to the 'Easter Hymn,' Dr. Grattan Flood writes to us as follows:

"When I read your paragraph concerning 'an important addition to our knowledge of the history of hymnology,' based on an entry in Reeves's Catalogue of Old Music, I rubbed my eyes, as I had examined many years ago a transcript of the very tune in question taken from a Romansch Hymn Book in 1684. Of course it is well known that the earliest form of the 'Easter Hymn'—'Jesus Christ is risen to-day,' appears in 'Lyra Davidica,' a collection of 'divine songs and hymns,' published in London in 1708. The volume offered for sale by Reeves is said to be published 'at Bassa, in the Engadine, dated 1684,' and it is stated that the tune is 'a Hymn for Ascension Day, with the tune in question.' It is added: 'This discovery suggests a new source for melodies of uncertain origin.'

As a close student of hymnology I was much interested in this 'discovery,' for it would throw back the source of the tune from 1708 to 1684. However, I had my doubts, relying on the transcript of the tune taken from the Romansch dialect as published in the Engadine in 1684, and yet I marvelled what place of publication could be 'Bassa' as given in Reeves's Catalogue. Accordingly, I wrote to Mr. Barclay Squire, of the British Museum, asking him if he would kindly collate for me the hymn-tune assigned to Ascension Day in Simler's 'Philomela,' a Romansch Hymn Book, published at Tschlin in the Engadine in 1684. Mr. Squire kindly informs me that the description in Reeves's Catalogue is misleading, because evidently the compiler took 'Bassa' to be the place of publication, whereas the actual imprint was Tschlin in 'Engadine Bassa.' The hymn-book was compiled by Johannes Martinus or Martinis, and was edited by Mr. Simler, a second edition being issued in 1702.

'The tune assigned to "Acels'ha Christ hoz aduzá"—stated, in Reeves's Catalogue, to be identical with the "Easter Hymn" "not hitherto traced earlier than the 'Lyra Davidica,' 1708, of which there is a unique copy in the British Museum," begins as follows:

'For the purpose of comparison I herewith give the first eight bars (transposed to the key of F) of the "Easter Hymn" from "Lyra Davidica," 1708:

'It will be seen at a glance that the former tune from the Romansch Hymn Book of 1684 is by no means identical with the "Easter Hymn" of 1708; and therefore the source of the latter tune still remains a puzzle.'

['P.S.—Since the above was in print a friend has examined Mr. Reeves's book, and he informs me that the two tunes are quite different; so it remains for some hymnological delver to discover an earlier source than 1708.']

A local Festival of the Manchester Diocesan Church Music Society was held at St. Andrew's Church, Ancoats, on June 24. Several choirs in the neighbourhood took part, and effectively performed 'Come, Holy Ghost,' by Palestrina; 'Hymn to the Trinity,' by Tchaikovsky; 'Thou, Lord, art praised,' from Schumann's 'Requiem.' Mr. E. Emery presided at the organ, and Mr. S. H. Nicholson conducted. St. Andrew's has recently been re-decorated and repaired, and the organ has been rebuilt by Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper.

The annual Festival of the choirs of York, Durham, Ripon, and Wakefield Cathedrals took place at York Cathedral on July 9 under Dr. Bairstow's direction. The service music included S. S. Wesley's 'O Lord, Thou art my God,' Tertius Noble's 'I will lay me down in peace,' and Ivor Atkins's setting of the Canticles in G.

A choral Festival was held at Mold Parish Church on July 9 for the choirs of the Mold Rural Deanery, the total number of voices being about 500. The anthem was Stainer's 'Sing a song of praise.' Mr. R. W. Pringle, organist of Hawarden Parish Church, was the conductor, and Mr. W. H. Adams presided at the organ, in addition to which brass instruments and drums were used.

On the occasion of his retirement from the post of organist of St. Andrew's Church, Pau, after eighteen years of service, Mr. J. Godfrey Luard was presented, on June 1, with a gold watch, a cheque, and an illuminated address.

On July 15, at St. Mary's Hall, Luton, a presentation was made to Mr. F. Gostelow, in recognition of his twenty-five years' service as organist of Luton Parish Church.

THE ADVENTURES OF A LONG METRE TUNE.

By G. W. J. POTTER.

In the following lines an attempt has been made to sketch the history, or rather a portion of the history, of a comparatively unknown hymn-tune. Although classed as a long metre, it is not really written in that measure, as will immediately be seen by anyone who tries to sing a standard long metre hymn to it. This incorrect ascription is probably the chief reason why the melody has fared so badly in its existence; though perhaps it ought to be said that it is the arrangers who show up somewhat unfavourably.

In 'A Book of Psalmody,' by Matthew Wilkins, the tune appears set for two voices (Ex. 1). This work, of which there are two editions, is undated, and has been attributed to the year 1699, but Wilkins was not born till 1704. The catalogue of the British Museum Library suggests that the dates may be 1725 and 1730. The tune is not found in both editions, but only in the presumed earlier volume. Possibly some of our readers who are versed in hymnody will be able to supply details of an earlier appearance or appearances of the tune:

Wilkins's Psalmody, c. 1730.

No name is here given, neither is the composer mentioned. Possibly Wilkins may have known whom he was, but at any rate he did not see fit to make public the information. As will be observed, the melody is striking yet simple, and the harmony fair (presuming filling in) though somewhat crude as it stands, with its frequent bare fifths and octaves.

The words to which the tune is set are based on the 51st Psalm, of which the first verse only is here given. The marriage which should exist between every poem and its musical setting is in this case absent, owing of course to the curiously wrong accentuation. The rhythm of the ordinary long metre is iambic: that is, commencing with an unaccented syllable, the syllables are alternately accented, thus: u-u-u-u-, or preferably in musical notation, ♩. The rhythm of the melody is not of this type, but is in dactylic metre (accented followed by two unaccented syllables), hence the confusion. Properly the tune should be classed as an 8.8.8.8. Dactylic, a very rare type in psalmody. A hasty perusal of a few hymnals has failed to discover any hymns written in this unusual metre. Matthew Wilkins, who was a teacher of music, seems to have been a compiler only—though he may also have been a composer—and probably did not write verse; nor probably was he acquainted with a poet who would help him, so, finding that there were four phrases of eight notes in this tune, he decided that it was, or ought to be, a long metre, and forthwith so described it, and what is more, attached this long metre psalm to it.

In the year 1785 a Mr. D. Bayley, of Newbury Port published a collection of sacred music under the title of 'The Essex Harmony,' and among the long metre hymns appears the tune now under consideration. The name of 'Wells' is assigned to it, but, in common with the other tunes in the book, no words are given:

'Essex Harmony,' 1785. D. Bayley.

The melody is placed in the tenor part, but its rhythm has been considerably altered, as a comparison with Ex. 1 will show. The change is not for the better, and the melody has a very halting and curious effect under the new conditions. Observe the somewhat unusual plan of giving a rest at the end of each phrase to the alto and tenor voices, while the soprano and bass hold on their notes for an extra beat. The harmony in the above example, although erratic, is correctly transcribed.

Many psalm and hymn tune books were issued during the next hundred years, and it is quite probable that 'Wells' may have appeared in some of them, but against this must be set the fact that few, if any, words are written in the metre of the tune. Further, anyone with an ear for rhythm would naturally refuse to assign an ordinary long metre hymn to a dactylic long metre tune, so upon the whole it seems reasonable to conclude that the tune was seldom republished, and that it remained practically unknown.

Its next appearance, so far as at present ascertained, was in 'The European Psalmist,' a collection of tunes brought out in 1872 by the celebrated Dr. S. S. Wesley. Many of the tunes are original, and a large number of standard melodies were arranged and reharmonized by the editor. Wesley evidently considered that the tune was worthy of preservation, for he takes the melody as it appears in Wilkins's book, and with the aid of slurs and the repetition of certain notes, converts it into a long metre tune. In this form it appears as No. 12 in the volume. One regrets, however, to find that a distinct change has been made in the third line, though it is effective. The added tenor and alto parts have a fair amount of movement given to them, and with the revised bass the arrangement clearly shows the hand of the skilled harmonist. The consecution of the two major thirds involving the interval of the augmented fifth in bar 10 of the tenor part seems somewhat unusual, and probably is not particularly grateful to the singer. Wesley has allotted the so-called New Metrical or Tate and Brady's version of the 47th Psalm to 'Wells,' the score of which is now appended:

'European Psalmist,' 1872. S. S. Wesley.

And with tri - umph - ant voi - ces sing;

No force the might - y pow'r with - stands

Of God, the u - ni - ver - sal King.

Under the same name the tune appears as No. 325 in the 'Oxford Hymn Book,' 1908, where it is given as the second setting to Michael Bruce's hymn:

Where high the heavenly temple stands,
The house of God not made with hands,
A great High Priest our nature wears,
The Patron of mankind appears.

The music is taken direct from 'The European Psalmist,' where many other tunes in the volume, and in the preface the compilers suggest that more attention should be paid to this fine work of Wesley's, a sentiment with which all lovers of hymnody will probably be in cordial agreement. So far the tune has been shown in its original form, where it was set to words of an unsuitable rhythm; and in later revisions which are not satisfactory, as the phrasing and sign have been altered, and thus the charm of the melody is to a large extent disappeared. Now it is time to see what can be done with the tune when it is accompanied by suitable four-part harmony—that is, avoiding both the imitations of the early writers and the seductive chromatic harmonies of recent composers. For this purpose recourse must be had to the 'Temple Tune Book,' compiled by E. J. Hopkins, originally published by Metzler & Co., and now to be obtained from Weekes & Co., Hanover Street, at the price of two shillings. Division I., all that was published of three projected parts, contains about 160 psalm and hymn tunes by old English composers from the time of Tallis and the early Psalters to about the year 1750. Many interesting items are included in the volume, and it is well worth obtaining by anyone interested in the history of our psalm and hymn tunes. It is perhaps needless to say that the revision and modernising of the harmonies have been carried out in a very beautiful and appropriate manner, though in too many cases Dr. Hopkins has thought fit to alter and simplify the rhythm and melody of these fine old tunes; the result being that many of their characteristic beauties and even their quaint touches are struck out, and the tunes are brought down to a monotonous level of (supposed) respectability. Fortunately he has allowed our tune to appear in its original rhythm, has reharmonized it in a tasteful manner, and renamed it 'Brooklands.' This is probably done to avoid confusion with the other tune called 'Wells,' which is for many people the standard setting or 'proper tune' to 'Rock of Ages' ('Bristol,' p. 176). Through the courtesy of Messrs. Weekes & Co.

I am enabled to reproduce 'Brooklands' as it appears in the 'Temple Tune Book':

'Temple Tune Book,' E. J. Hopkins. By permission of Messrs. Weekes & Co., on behalf of the Executors of the late E. J. Hopkins.

James Hasler.

Dr. Hopkins recognises the true rhythm of the melody and describes it as an 8.8.8.8. (Dactylic) long metre tune. He does not give or suggest any words to fit its peculiarities, but contents himself by saying that it is 'an admirable tune in an uncommon rhythm.' This, probably, will be the verdict of most readers when they have carefully examined 'Brooklands,' though of course the charm of the melody was apparent when Wilkins preserved the tune for us by including it in his book.

It will be gathered from the above notes that the great drawback to the adoption of the tune is and has been the finding of suitable words for it, and the suggestion is made that those readers who are poetically gifted should favour this journal with some hymns written in this metre. Meanwhile, as example is better than precept, a rendering of the 150th Psalm in blank verse is given above, which version has been specially made for 'Brooklands' by an old friend of the present writer.

Throughout the book Dr. Hopkins has classified the tunes by affixing in each case one of three words: Penitence, Prayer, or Praise, and naturally 'Brooklands' falls under the head of Praise. It seems therefore appropriate to set the 150th Psalm to it, for not only is it a song of praise, but assuredly it is the musicians' psalm, for it deals entirely with musical instruments and their consecration to the praise of God.

Here, then, closes 'The adventures of a long metre tune' which I have been so far privileged to chronicle. Possibly others may be able to add further details of this tune, which evidently took the fancy of Dr. Hopkins, though it only appears almost as an afterthought in his book, and quite out of its proper place in the volume.

The Fairy Queen. An opera. The music by Henry Purcell. Edited by J. S. Shedlock.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

That 'The Fairy Queen,' written by Purcell in 1692, and generally admitted to contain some of his best work, should have had to wait for more than a couple of centuries for publication in its entirety is due to the fact that the score was lost shortly after the composer's death. Previously (1692) only a few numbers under the title of 'Select Songs' had been published by Heppinstall. Although the patentees of Dorset Gardens Theatre offered a reward of £20 for the recovery of the score, it lay hidden until 1901, when the copy was found in the library of the Royal Academy of Music. In 1903 the whole work was edited by Mr. Shedlock, and published in full score by the Purcell Society. It has now been issued in Novello's Octavo Edition, and thus for the first time is accessible to the general public. For this edition certain modifications have been considered advisable. For example several of the soprano numbers have with advantage been transposed a semitone lower, while No. 37, originally for male alto, has been transposed from D to G, in order to make it available for a mezzo-soprano. The two remaining solos for male alto are in their original form not unsuitable for a contralto voice. While as a work for stage purposes 'The Fairy Queen' has perhaps no future, it contains much that as pure music will long be a source of pleasure. Its delightful little dance tunes, the fine bass song, 'Next wint comes slowly,' the soprano air, on a ground bass, 'O let me weep'—worthy to rank with the famous 'When I am laid earth,'—these and a dozen other characteristic numbers make the work one to be treasured by all admirers of Purcell.

Catalogue of Opera Librettos printed before 1800. 2 vols pp. 1674. Prepared by Oscar George Theodore Sonneck, Chief of the Division of Music, Library of Congress.

[Washington: Government Printing Office.]

This splendidly produced work is worthy of the Library of Congress, and is admirably edited by Dr. O. G. Sonneck. The first volume—Title Catalogue—runs to 117 pages, while the second (502 pages) deals with author list, composer list, and aria index. When it is borne in mind that this Catalogue gives an account of close on 14,000 libretti, most of the items being learnedly annotated, will readily be seen what a stupendous task has been achieved. The basis of the work is the magnificent Albert Schae collection, consisting of 12,240 libretti, inclusive of oratorio and cantatas. Added to this the Longe collection of 46 English libretti, and the acquisition of several hundred volumes by gift or purchase or copyright (in the case of American libretti), combine to enhance the value of the Catalogue. Dr. Sonneck notes the argument prefatory notes, dedicatory remarks, and the omission of inclusion of the name of the author or composer, in each of the items, while in some cases, e.g., 'La Dafne,' 'giocatore,' 'Calisto,' 'Thomyris,' 'Alfred,' 'L'Euridice' &c., the 'notes' are really critical articles. By way of frontispiece an excellent photograph of the late Mr. Albert Schatz is given, and there is also a photographic facsimile of Mr. Schatz's entry sheet. The Preface by Dr. Sonneck is scholarly, and sets forth with meticulous care the methods employed in describing the libretti.

As a specimen illustrating Dr. Sonneck's admirable method of cataloguing, here is the entry of the 1st edition of the famous 'Beggars' Opera,' as given at p. 206:

'THE BEGGAR'S OPERA. As it is acted at the Theatre Royal, Lincoln's Inn Fields. Written by Mr. Gay. . . . To which is added the musick engrav'd on copper plates.

'London, J. Watts, 1728. 58 [2] p., 16 p. (music) 20 cm. Three acts with Introduction. Cast. At end of text (2) p. of a list of "Books lately publish'd," the heading of the second page reading "Books printed for J. Tonson and J. Watts. Feb. 10, 1727." In third Act there are by error two "Scene X," one on p. 50, the other on p. 51. The airs are numbered consecutively for each Act: 18, 22, 28, total 68 not 69. The airs, by no means ballad airs only, are printed separately following the text, but without titles, merely with number corresponding to that in the text, where the tunes are indicated by title. John Christopher Pepusch, who composed the Overture and arranged the music, is not mentioned. First edition.

'First performed, as indicated, January 29, 1728.'

Incidentally, it may be observed that the Catalogue records seven different editions of the 'Beggars' Opera'—four with music, and three without.

In such a wealth of detail one expects to discover, and ready to pardon, slips and typographical errors, but from a close examination we only notice the following: p. 471, 'Re Moulton,' should be 'George Moulton'; p. 521, 'Domenico Corri,' should be 'accompaniments by Domenico Corri'; p. 572, the Dublin edition of 'The Governess' does not disguise the authorship as by Sheridan; p. 587, George Colman was not the author of 'Harlequin Teague'; the honour belongs to John O'Keeffe; p. 594, 'The Highland Reel' was first performed at Covent Garden on November 1788—but the added statement that it was given in Dublin at Smock Alley, in 1786 is a slip; p. 779, the music 'The Mountaineers' was by Arnold; p. 930, 'The Reprisal' was produced at Drury Lane in November, 1757; p. 94 'Author unknown to "Squire and Tufts":' this ballad opera was by Thomas Walker. Again, congratulations to Dr. Sonneck!

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Choirs of very moderate attainments are not often able to undertake the singing of Elgar's music for obvious reasons. Here, however, is a harvest anthem from his pen which will present but few difficulties to them. At the same time the music is so interesting and effective that well-equipped choirs will enjoy it. Easier still, though demanding a solo voice, is Richard Redhead's hymn-anthem setting of Joseph Anstice's well-known words. 'With all Thy hosts' is a smoothly-written anthem for a cappella singing, suitable for Christmas, in which the well-known chorale 'Vom Himmel Hoch' is treated as a canto fermo.

The late Mr. Gaul's anthem was composed for the unveiling of the reredos presented by the Freemasons of Warwickshire to St. Martin's Church, Birmingham, on November 24, 1876.

These sweeter far than lilies are; Love is a torment; Love's tranquillity; Magdalen at Michael's Gate; Fair and fine; Sing His praises; She is not fair to outward view; The Seven Virgins; The Holly and the Ivy; The cloud. Part-Songs. By Walford Davies.

[Sidney Riorden.]

The above are for various combinations of voices with and without pianoforte. While all more or less show the characteristic excellence to be expected of the composer, we may mention, as being specially noteworthy, 'Love is a torment' (four solo voices with pianoforte), 'Magdalen at Michael's Gate' (S.A.T.B. quartet with pianoforte), the vigorous 'Sing His praises' (S.A.T.B. unaccompanied), and 'The Seven Virgins'—a quaint and touching setting (S.A.T.B. unaccompanied) of an old carol.

La Forlane. Old Venetian dance. By Giovanni Vinci. Adapted by R. M. Crompton.

[G. Schirmer, Ltd.]

'La Forlane' is a Venetian dance which became popular some three hundred years ago. It has lately been revived, and this edition of the music, with a full explanation of the steps, &c., by Mr. R. M. Crompton, should be useful. Some English interest attaches to the dance from the fact of William Byrd having composed music for it.

Hungarian March. By Berlioz. Arranged for organ by A. Herbert Brewer. (Organ Transcriptions, No. 18.)

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

This popular March has been well laid out for the organ by Dr. Brewer, and should be useful to concert-players. The transcriber has not overdone things in the matter of registration, with the result that the work stands a good chance of being played without the irritating halts for stop-changing which so often result from arrangements being too faithful to their text in the matter of tone-colour.

Suite of Seven Pieces. By Giles Farnaby. Arranged for Pianoforte and Stringed Instruments by Granville Bantock.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

This delightful Suite is just the kind of music for performance at revivals of old plays and the like, though its inherent charm should make it acceptable to ears still capable of appreciating delicate and pure music. The pieces chosen for arrangement are 'A Toye,' 'Giles Farnaby's Dreame,' 'Giles Farnaby's Conceit,' 'His Rest,' 'His Humour,' 'A Maske,' and 'Tower Hill,' and the editor's name is sufficient guarantee that they have been treated with skill and taste.

Nocturne. By Thomas F. Dunhill. Original Compositions for the Organ (New Series), No. 30.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

An unpretentious but charming piece of organ music. The main theme is of the kind we expect from the title, with an accompaniment of greater interest than is usually forthcoming in works of the kind.

NONCONFORMIST CHOIR UNION AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

OVER 4,000 singers, selected from London and provincial Free Church choirs, assisted at the celebration of the twenty-sixth annual Festival of the Nonconformist Choir Union on June 27. A programme of sacred and secular items included compositions by Brahms, Bach, Festa, German, Parry, &c., and the 'Hallelujah' Chorus. Mr. Frank Idle handled the huge choir skilfully, and produced some excellent effects, notably in the lighter items, such as 'Down in a flow'ry vale' (Festa) and 'The three knights' (German). Miss Maud Wilby sang 'Let the bright Seraphim' and other well-known numbers. The instrumental music was provided by an excellent orchestra of over 200 performers, assisted by Mr. J. A. Meale on the great organ. An organ recital by Mr. Bernard Johnson preceded the concert. The prizes in the choral competitions were awarded by Mr. Allen Gill as follows: Class A (large choirs)—1st, Broad Street Congregational, Reading; 2nd, Tonbridge Wesleyan. Class B (small choirs)—1st, Bold Street Wesleyan, Warrington; 2nd, Trinity Congregational, St. Albans. Mr. Dan Price was the adjudicator in the solo events, the prize-winners being Mrs. Gertrude Yates (soprano), Miss Gladys Bray (contralto), Mr. Rees Dier (tenor), and Mr. H. R. Bennett (bass).

Correspondence.

HEART AND HEAD IN MUSIC (MR. ERNEST NEWMAN'S ARTICLE IN THE JULY NUMBER).

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—Possibly the testimony of an eye-witness may be welcome as bearing out what Mr. Newman says on the polarity of Rachel's manner of going from the extreme of tragic emotion to the familiarity of prosaic life.

I can never forget my astonishment at her sudden descent from heroics. I was standing in the coulisses within three yards of the heroine in 'Les Horaces' seated in a chair, her head in her hands, torn by a passionate grief couched in the never-to-be-forgotten tones which almost frightened me—I was then a very young man, and could hardly answer her, so petrified was I when, the scene closing, she left the chair and passed me with 'Bon soir: pas raté, celui là: hein?' in the most familiar everyday tone. It was an extraordinary bathos; and the two contrasted inflections of voice are ringing in my ears, though this happened somewhere about the year 1854-55.

On the same subject, but with a somewhat different inference, I may add that Miss Bateman once told me (partly, as it were, to account for the disfigurement by way of a broken bridge to the nose of an otherwise eminently beautiful face) that it arose from the injury to the lachrymal duct caused by a scene of weeping over a child in the tragedy of 'Leah' (Adelphi) which had a phenomenally and deservedly long run.—Yours truly,

32, Eaton Place, S.W.,
June 30, 1914.

EDWARD CUTLER.

Obituary.

We regret to record the following deaths :

SIR FRANCIS CAMPBELL, Principal of the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind, Upper Norwood, in his eighty-second year. He was himself blind from his early childhood. He supported himself for some time in America (where he was born) as a teacher of music, until, in 1871, he was in a position to join with Dr. Armitage in founding the Royal Normal College. The work of this institution has always been of interest to musicians by reason of the remarkable results attained by its music-teaching. He was knighted in 1909.

FRANKLIN SIEVEWRIGHT PETERSON, Mus. Bac., Professor of Music at Melbourne University since 1901, born at Edinburgh in 1861. Before he received his Australian appointment he was organist of Palmerston Place Church, Edinburgh, and music-master at Fettes and Edinburgh Ladies' College. He was the author of 'Elements of music' and a number of musical articles.

On June 15, at 52, West Hill, Wandsworth, S.W., HENRY WALTER WESTON, Mus. Bac., A.R.C.M., F.R.C.O., organist and choir-master of Holy Trinity Church, West Hill, aged forty-nine.

ENOCH SMITH, for eighteen years choir-master of Swindon Parish Church.

HARRY EVANS, at Liverpool, on July 23. A notice of his career will be found on p. 514, and appreciations of his work are given in our Supplement, the Competition Festival Record.

MODERN HARMONIC TENDENCIES.

At the Musical Association Meeting on May 19 Mr. W. Denis Browne read a paper on 'Modern harmonic tendencies.' He said that in its origin music was conceived entirely from the point of view of counterpoint, but after a while it became clear that concerted music must be regarded from another aspect as well as from the purely contrapuntal. It was the introduction of accented discords that gave music a new appeal to the emotions. Harmony, born by a sheer accident out of contrapuntal licences, grew until it threatened to stifle its parent. There was a vital connection between harmony and counterpoint, but there was a necessity nowadays for thinking contrapuntally.

The composers made the rules that were formulated in harmony books. At the present time things were moving so quickly that all the old harmony books were out of date, and there was nothing so far to take their place. Composers were frankly experimenting. Touching upon the influence of instruments in the development of harmony, the lecturer said that the organ was an important factor, more especially since the true nature of the instrument had been obscured by the modern application to it of a definitely pianistic technique. Once it was rightly treated as a medium for displaying counterpoint. It used to be the most diatonic of instruments; nowadays it was unfortunately one of the most chromatic.

The ear was extraordinarily adaptable. It was only a short time since Strauss was incomprehensible, and the earliest Debussy pieces puzzled everybody. Stravinsky and Scriabin were thought mysterious until quite recently, and Schönberg still bothered everybody. He was not likely to be understood so quickly as the others, because he thought contrapuntally first of all, and harmonically second, whereas they did just the reverse. It was more difficult to take in polyphony of any kind than harmony, for it required analysis all the time and very considerable alertness of mind. The modern ear was usually content to listen to music as harmony; it objected strongly at first to a new chord, but after a few hearings it became used to it. There seemed to be nothing that the ear could not be made to accept in time, though it was noticeable that it could endure novel harmonic effects at first only when they were soft, and could not bear them loud. Adaptable as it was, however, it demanded a logical progression from chord to chord. If the logic of chord progression went, tonality vanished and all sense of proportion was lost.

Tonality in the modern sense was something that could be felt all through as the permanent basis of the harmonies. In Scriabin's works we got this feeling. His main chord was associated with a scale. This chord, of which we heard so much in 'Prometheus,' was strictly a dominant 13th with a major 9th and a flattened 5th, having the property common to dominants of preparing the way for another dominant, and it was on this that the whole logic of Scriabin's harmony depended. He had only two definite moods, the languid and the fantastic, and he was eternally ringing the changes on these. Harmony with him was an obsession; he did not even attempt to combine harmonies on contrapuntal lines as did Stravinsky and Schönberg. Scriabin and Debussy were two experimentalists who, having each made a discovery—in neither case a very important one—had devoted themselves to elaborating and embroidering it to the exclusion of everything else.

Stravinsky wrote diatonically and had no artificial limitations. He was a composer without a cut-and-dried system, and the only things that could be definitely set down to him were characteristics that he had derived from other Russian and French composers. From the Russians he learned to write on a pedal, but he broke away from them by turning the pedal into a harmonic group, with the result that the moving parts above produced entirely novel harmonic combinations. From the French he got the habit of writing in blocks, but he did so more diatonically than they, and the effect was infinitely more brilliant and sparkling.

When Schönberg came, thinking people realised that here was a man who, however much he repelled at first, had a deeply earnest purpose. His mind was essentially contrapuntal. He was not, however, indifferent to harmony; on the contrary, he had studied all its possibilities, but he was chiefly concerned in its application on contrapuntal lines. That was to say, he wrote horizontal streams of harmony in combination with other horizontal streams, just as other composers wrote horizontal melodies. The principle was not a new one; it was common in Strauss, and indeed was the only reason why his harmonic ideas ever sounded abstruse to us.

In his book on harmony, which was not nearly as startling as one would expect, Schönberg described the system he had evolved. It was distinct from any other, and though many people might object to a composer definitely formulating the system on which his inspirations depended for expression, he clearly had opened up a new field for experiment. Instead of a system based on thirds, he offered one based on fourths, claiming that the harmonies were not so discordant as with the major common chord. He did not claim that his system was more simple than that of thirds, but he insisted that it existed and that composers have used it.

Busoni, who has identified himself so strongly with Schönberg propaganda, was equally interesting and perhaps less tentative as a composer. He held that the twenty-four keys were merely transpositions of the same key: major and minor as the same thing seen from two points of view. His harmonies, often simple in themselves, were generally combined with other moving harmonies, equally simple, but his methods were so individual that the result could not be mistaken for the work of anyone else.

After referring to the works of Bartók and Kodály, the lecturer concluded by saying it was clear that harmony as the mainstay of a musical education would have to be superseded by counterpoint before composers could accomplish anything. Our present harmonic resources were limited, and the day would come eventually when every possible combination of notes would have been tried, and when no chord, however ingenious, would be of any individual colour or stir any emotion. We were not likely to return to diatonic methods. What had been done with them we were never likely to surpass. If we went on we should some day come to the end of the resources of the twelve-note scale. As Busoni said, our Western scale was only a tiny portion of the circumference of the circle of music. Other lands had other scales and other intervals than ours, and we might yet be forced to subdivide our scale into lesser intervals than we recognised to-day.

We are informed that the Vincent Music Company having come to terms with Mr. C. H. Challen for the purchase of all interests held by them in the Challen business, Mr. C. H. Challen and partners have acquired these assets, and the old firm of Challen & Son is now quite independent of any other concern. Messrs. Challen have moved into other factory premises, situated in Archer Street, Camden Town, where in future the manufacturing and wholesale departments of this business will be carried on.

IMPRESSIONS OF THE PARIS CONGRESS.

BY CHARLES MACLEAN.

The man at the winch does not see much of the machinery. The present writer has been asked to give some impressions of the Paris Congress. Then they can be but sparks off the wheel.

Montaigne said of Paris, 350 years ago: 'I love her so tenderly, that even her spots, her blemishes, and her warts are dear unto me.' There are no warts on that fair face now. Even to one who stayed there as a youth forty-five years ago (unfortunately il prend de l'âge), the Ville Lumière of to-day is unrecognisable. A dynastic personage may have been reckless with national money to bring about the result, but the result is splendid. The motto of our city is a prayer, 'Domine dirige nos'; that of the city of Paris is an exultation, 'Fluctuat nec mergitur.' The Boulevards (German Bollwerke, bastion) are a puzzle to some, and a description here may help them. The Boulevards Intérieurs (otherwise Grands Boulevards) run west and east, and mark the old northern town boundary. Outside and south of that, the Boulevards Extérieurs are a crescent-moon lying on its back. Outside of that again, the twenty-one Boulevards de Ceinture are a complete ring encircling Paris. The Boulevards Neufs are Haussmann's great arteries running here and there irregularly, and it is these which confuse topography. The inhabitant of sober un-armed London finds it difficult to realise that the Ceinture is an actual ring of fortification, thirty miles long, with sixteen forts. There is also the Ceinture railway; above ground, and with upper seats as in a street car. A 'Métropolitain,' and a 'Nord-Sud' have thrown a net-work over Paris these last fifteen years; underground, but not deep enough. The Eiffel Tower is the highest thing made by man, 1,000 feet high; one can see from it fifty miles every way. West-End is rich, and East-End is poor, just as in London; so civilisation ever pushes against the whirling earth.

Paris is noisier than London, and the clatter of wheels is incessant. Amiable Gardiens de la Paix regulate the traffic with white batons in one or two of the very worst places, otherwise it regulates itself. 'Refuges' scarcely exist. The population of three-and-a-half millions must be acrobats from infancy, to judge by the way that men, women and two-year-old children cross the streets. They bide their time on the kerb, and then with an almost miraculous instinct choose a moment to thread their way through the shifting échelon movements. But pedestrianism on these terms is slow, and a population in a hurry would not tolerate it. The present writer was knocked down by a taxicab before he had been half-an-hour in the streets, and learnt the lesson that in Paris, if you are knocked down and hurt, you pay the cabman and he does not pay you. It is a standing wonder, when the men and women work, for after 4 p.m. (the 'absinthe-hour') the whole population seem to be sitting in the cafés and brasseries; the men with their newspapers, cards, chess, dominoes, &c.; the women with knitting and gossip. Or else all quietly doing nothing at all. In the evening there are the theatres, music-halls, 'café-concerts,' and 'cabarets artistiques.' On the other hand drunkenness is almost unknown. Paris of the 'Grands Boulevards' is miles and miles of brilliant shop-fronts. In men's dress, the chapeau haut-de-forme has disappeared; only the cape (bowler), chapeau-mou (soft felt), and chapeau-de-paille remain. In women's dress—alas! there is not much of it. French cooking is a joy, and you have early breakfast in your room as a matter of course.

The official habitat of the Congress was an elegant suite of four rooms at the top of 29 Rue Boétie. Accidental, but appropriate; for Boëthius, a Francis Bacon of the 5th century, was the sole link between ancient Greek music and the Middle Ages. These are the permanent quarters of the monthly Revue Musicale; a vigorous and omnivorous journal, which has absorbed the Mercur Musical, the Revue Musicale d'Histoire et de Critique, and the Courrier Musical. It is also the organ of the French 'Amis de la Musique,' a musical club without a club-house. It is also affiliated to the International Musical Society. Its director is Jules Ecorcheville. An opening ceremony was in the smaller hall of the Sorbonne (Paris University). A banquet was at the Grand Hôtel. The governing body met at M. Ecorcheville's house, where they received a sumptuous hospitality. All the lectures and business meetings were at the Hôtel des Ingénieurs Civils, No. 19, Rue Blanche, a plain but serviceable building in a street going up from the Trinity Church to Montmartre. The lectures are the ostensible raison d'être, if not the kernel, of the Congresses; and Paris had to hand what London searched for in vain, a building fitting the requirements like a glove. True, it was shared by a clangorous company-meeting one day, and by a conservatoire rehearsal the next day; but time was no great object, and patience, as the Turks say, is the key of Paradise.

The present writer did not hear more than a dozen lectures, for he had duties, but he could form some conclusions. The Parisians in some ways failed to follow up the great advantage given by the building. There was no 'lecture abstract' system, and that ought to be a sine qua non. Otherwise it is like taking a person to the opera, and not giving him a synopsis of the 'intrigue' of the play. At Vienna that system was carried out tentatively. In London fully. And in London,—at considerable effort, for it had to be done at the last moment,—all the eighty abstracts were translated into one language, English, and so put into the hands of the cosmopolitan congressists in advance of the lectures. The system of presenting 'sectional' reports to the general meeting at the end of the week was only partially carried out at Paris. This was fairly well done at Vienna, very well at Basle. It has its advantages, though it does not stand on a par with giving the congressists a printed clue to the orally delivered lectures. Again the local committee would have done well, apart from their general circular, to book definite lectures from specially distinguished men, as was done at the three previous Congresses. Also, if possible, to give a lead, by propounding some general theses. All these things were no doubt intended, but they ended res infectæ. And the moral is early organization. Paris herself took ten years to organize her great 1900 Exhibition. Of eighty lectures, many were only on paper, or at any rate the lecturers did not come. Nearly half may be credited with representing current subjects. Perhaps the most attractive were:—Joh. Biehle, 'Photography of intervals and chords'; Carl Claudius, 'Swedish hedge minstrels'; Henri Expert, 'Geneviève Library'; J. A. Fuller-Maitland, 'Bach transferred to the pianoforte'; J. Huré, 'Tuning of percussion-instruments'; Edgar Istel, 'Problem of the libretto'; R. P. Komitas, 'Armenian popular music' (the lecturer quite a comedian); Ilmari Krohn, 'Modern metrical feet'; Armas Launis, 'Folk-song study'; Eugénie Linev, 'Russian folk-song'; Gustave Lyon, 'Equal temperament, &c.'; H. Marage, 'Photographing the voice'; D. F. Scheurleer, 'Musical iconography'; J. Thiberge, 'Teaching by the blind'; Egon Wellesz, 'Science and history'; Philipp Wolfrum, 'Concert-room acoustics.' But most of them showed excellent self-devotion and learning. The educationists betrayed the usual impatience of each other, and there were one or two new-notation fanatics. Several persons not members of the Society read papers; this was not permitted either at Basle or in London. A new 'Orphéal' instrument was exhibited: half a pianoforte, half a harmonium with strong-toned orchestral stops; from this doubtless will proceed one day a mechanical 'chamber-orchestra-player.'

As pointed out by J. Percy Baker in the Society's July Journal, an undertaking in respect of the report-volumes containing these lectures must be come to between the local committees (who find the funds) and the Society. Fully nine-tenths of the members cannot get to Congresses, and two-thirds have no access to a meeting of any sort. These long-suffering people get nothing but the Society's Magazine and Journal for their money, and they have seen them of late years gradually handed over more and more to antiquarian articles of a depressing aridity. Now the Congress Report volumes step in, whip the cream by getting forty of the best articles a year, and present these to those only who have attended the Congress. From the Society's point of view this is impolitic to the extent of being suicidal. After all, if the Society contributes no funds to the Congresses, it has the wherewithal to bargain, for it contributes its name, its prestige, its labour, and its international organization.

The concerts and social functions were well reported in the last issue of the Musical Times, and there is no need to detail them here. The promised concerts of modern French orchestral and chamber music did not take place; but France has a noble record of church-music from the primitifs onwards, and an equally entertaining record of opera grave and gay. The dance at the end of Monsigny's Opérétta was written 150 years ago, but set even the grey-beards jiggling. By-the-by, the Paris theatres are having a bad time. The Kinema-show is everything, with the best actors and actresses on the films. The 'Parsifal' takings of £300 nightly in January had fallen to £50 in June. The beautiful Champs Elysées theatre failed lately under the experienced impresario Astruc. The lessees of the Grand Opéra, Broussan and Messager, have just thrown up their contract. In the social functions, want of a ladies' committee, or something equivalent, was sorely felt; the unofficial unintroduced stranger had to cultivate a 'crowded loneliness.'

In conclusion, some contrasts or curiosities. June, the rainiest month in the year, was chosen for the Congress. There was good luck the first week, but then came rain, and on June 8 the Champs Elysées were dead white, under an inch of sleet and snow, which are rare at Paris at any time. The Pont Neuf of Paris is the oldest, built in 1578. A waiting-room everywhere goes by the quaint name of Salle des Pas Perdus. Vincent d'Indy, of all people in the world, did not attend the Congress, or even the banquet. But to conclude the conclusion, two personal acknowledgments. Jules Ecorcheville was a distinguished chairman, a fluent and agreeable speaker, a willing interprète divin between the local committee and the Society, in all relations a tactful and most courteous personage; the Society owes him a deep debt of gratitude for this Congress. Henry Prunières stepped in where others turned truant, and was secretarially the life and soul of the business.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

An up-to-date and enterprising programme was selected for the students' orchestral concert of the Royal Academy of Music at Queen's Hall on the afternoon of July 14. The production of two new works by students—an individual and well-written Welsh tone-poem by Morfydd Owen, and a setting of Ernest Dowson's 'The Exile' for voice and orchestra by Eric Grant—showed that the creative work of the Academy maintains its standard. Among the notable solo performances of the occasion were Mr. Herbert J. Brine's interpretation of the opening movement of Elgar's Violin concerto, the violoncello-playing of Master Tito Barbirolli, and Miss Muriel Michell's singing of two of Elgar's 'Sea-pictures.' Pianoforte solos were given by Miss Frances Hooley and Mr. Vivian Langrish, and the vocalists were Miss Ethel Bilsland, Mr. Frederick Shaw, and Mr. Raymond Ellis. Sir Alexander Mackenzie conducted.

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

A programme of familiar music was given by students of Trinity College of Music at Queen's Hall on July 14. A thoroughly satisfying performance of Mendelssohn's 'Scotch' Symphony by the students' orchestra under Mr. Wilhelm Sachse supplied the chief interest of the occasion. Among the soloists conspicuous success was earned by Mr. Cecil Laubach with his performance of the opening movement of Mendelssohn's Violin concerto. Excellent work was also done by Miss Frederica Birch as the soloist in a movement from Saint-Saëns's G minor Pianoforte concerto, and Mr. Alfred Penn showed exceptional skill as a bassoonist in an Allegro by Mozart. The programme further included a Fantasia for two flutes (Op. 35) by Doppler, with Misses Bertha Laubach and Emily Lucas as the soloists. The vocalists of the occasion were Miss Frances H. E. Hall, who displayed a good voice in Puccini's 'Vissi d'Arte,' Mr. Roland Roberts in Gounod's song of Vulcan, and Miss Ethel Calow in Mozart's 'Non so più cosa son.' In addition to the Symphony, the orchestra played Beethoven's 'Prometheus' Overture and two of Dvorák's Slavonic Dances.

Mr. Gervase Elwes has been re-engaged by the New York Oratorio Society to sing in 'The Dream of Gerontius' on December 9.

MR. CLIFFORD HIGGIN.

Mr. Clifford Higgin has resigned all his engagements at Blackpool in order to take up an appointment as organist and choirmaster at the Brant Avenue Methodist Church, Brantford, Canada.

Mr. Higgin was born at Bacup, in Lancashire, on June 28, 1873. As a lad he had lessons in pianoforte-playing from Mr. Willie Lord, a well-known professor in the district, and later he studied under Mr. Charles Nuttall. In 1896 he went to reside at Blackpool. Here he studied voice-production and especially choral training. In 1901 he entered a ladies' choir at the famous Blackpool Competitive Musical Festival and won a first-prize. He became an organist and choirmaster, and year by year he developed unusual skill as a choir-trainer, gaining many distinctions and earning high praise from the best-known adjudicators of the day. For nine years he conducted the Blackpool Operatic Society. The most important of his compositions is a short oratorio, 'Calvary.' Canada gets a fine choir-trainer and we regretfully lose one.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

'FRANCESCA DA RIMINI.'

Of absolute novelty there has been but little in the programme of the closing month of the season at the Royal Opera, Covent Garden. One work only has been offered, making the total of the season of entirely new operas two. The novelty consisted of a setting of Gabriel D'Annunzio's version of the story of Francesca and Paolo, under the title of 'Francesca da Rimini.' This has been prepared for the stage by Signor Tito Ricordi, and the music is by Signor Riccardo Zandonai. He is already known to us through the medium of his 'Conchita,' produced a couple of years ago. The promise then displayed has come nearer to fulfilment, and there is more individuality and freshness in his 'Francesca' than is to be met with in any other post-Puccini Italian opera. Zandonai is not oblivious to the development of musical phraseology that has taken place all over Europe; and he is not to be blamed for the fact, since art is universal. Apart from the obvious truth that he is a little inclined to borrow from those two inventive minds, Richard Strauss and Georges Charpentier, he has something to contribute on his own part. It comprises a command of that all-precious gift, melody, a genius for devising figures of accompaniment, and an excellent sense of atmosphere. He is not yet capable of a really big climax, but as he is only just thirty years of age that may come, since in other respects his work is of an uncommon kind, expressing a strong personality and an original mind. It is not necessary to recapitulate the story. The portions used are the meeting of Paolo and Francesca, a most charming scene, strong in its old-world flavour and in its appreciation of sweetness; the battle at the Malatesta Castle; the treachery of Malatestino, who reveals to his brother Francesca's, his wife's, infidelity; the explanation between Paolo and Francesca that he was an unconscious instrument in representing his brother; and their final discovery and slaughter by Giovanni, the ugly and deformed husband. Just as the story varies in mood so does the music—and to such effect as to remove all possibility of charging the composer with monotony. The monotony was found in the performance, which was not very animated. Madame Edvina, who appeared as Francesca, treated it, as she treats Mélanide, Fiora, La Tosca, and others of her rôles, as being best served by a melancholy and restrained attitude. Consequently we scarcely had the real meaning of the part. Signor Martinelli also is not well suited to the character of Paolo. There was nothing poetic about him, and if his singing was supposed to be the attraction in the eyes of Francesca, then it is a matter of wonder that she ever thought anything about him. Signor Cigada was the husband Giovanni, but seemed to think that he could best represent the character by 'stumping' about the stage, bleating vicariously. His singing indeed was not beautiful, and degenerated into a roar at dramatic moments. Signor Paltrinieri as the younger brother Malatestino, sang in a very juvenile fashion. It was another newcomer, Miss Myrna Sharlow, who provided distinction by her interpretation of the small part of the sister Samaritana. The mounting was exceedingly good, the first scene exercising a charm rarely produced on the stage. Signor Panizza conducted. It was he who guided the work to success when it was produced at Turin at the beginning of the year, and he proved himself an important factor in the appreciation the Opera won on its initial hearing in England.

GENERAL RÉPERTOIRE.

For the rest the répertoire has been made up of repetitions of operas already seen, supplemented by a revival after ten years of Boito's 'Mefistofele'; and also Mozart's 'Don Giovanni' and 'Nozze di Figaro.' Boito's work, in spite of its undoubted merits and some Bakst scenery, did not impress the Covent Garden audience. Scenery in the 'impressionist' style of Leon Bakst in this connection proved vain foolishness. Mlle. Muzio, Mr. John McCormack, and Signor Didur (in his old part) did their best. The performance of 'Don Giovanni' was gratifying; that of 'Nozze di Figaro' was not. Signor Scotti made an excellent Don, M. Aquistapace was a surprisingly good Leporello. The ladies were Madame Destin, Madame Stralia, and Miss Maggie Teyte; and Mr. John McCormack as Don Ottavio and Mr. Murray Davey as the Commendatore completed the cast. 'Nozze di Figaro' found the company in an untuneful mood. The pianoforte used for the recitatives began it, and by the time the opera was ending the music took quite an up-to-date character, because the principals were singing in one key and the orchestra was playing in another. Signor Scotti, the Count, seemed conscience-stricken, possibly at the change of his voice, which was a tenor in 'Barbiere di Siviglia' and was now a baritone. And the others, Mesdames Raisa, Zeppilli, and Maggie Teyte, failed to show that they grasped the nature of the music. The repetition performances have brought some changes of cast: the assumption of the part of Radames in Verdi's 'Aida' by M. Paul Franz; of Cavaradossi in 'La Tosca' and Pinkerton in 'Madama Butterfly' by Mr. John McCormack, the former being a new part in which he did very well; and of 'Scarpia' by M. Dinh Gilly, who made him very much a man of the people.

Finally, as a last burst before the end of the operatic display, Verdi's 'Falstaff' was revived after a silence of many years. That neglect is thoroughly undeserved. Here we have an admirable setting of Shakespeare's play that is as free from offence as the original itself, and yet it is left on the shelf for years. This is due of course to the absence of any regular national effort in opera. It is to be said for the performance that it made ample amends for neglect, for it was uncommonly good. Everybody appeared as a humorist, some of them for the first time, but not the last. Signor Scotti gave us an admirable version of the fat knight. It was unctuous in its humour, and without any suggestion of the low comedian. The other characters were all excellent. All deserve mention, but the record must notice that Mlle. Muzio was a charming Alice, Madame Kirkby Lunn a roguish Quickly, and Mlle. Zeppilli a dainty Nanetta. The men were also excellent, ready with any amount of fun in the portrayal of their parts, Signor Armanini being the Fenton, M. Crabbé the Ford, M. Dua the Caius, Signor Paltrinieri the Bardolph, and last but not least, M. Didur the Pistol. The fun was fast and furious, but never outside the Shakespearean limit. With an excellent version of that wonderful score under the hand of Signor Polacco, who has done yeoman work during the season, the performance aroused enthusiasm that must make those in authority wish they had thought earlier of this somewhat belated observation of the centenary of Verdi. The season was due to close on July 30.

FRANCIS E. BARRETT.

THE BEECHAM OPERA SEASON.

'THE LEGEND OF JOSEPH.'

The production of Strauss's 'The Legend of Joseph' has been from the musical point of view perhaps the most important feature of the Ballet season. The work itself has caused great diversity of opinion, both as to the feasibility in the abstract of the experiment on which authors and composer embarked, and as to the success achieved. Opinions also differ as to the actual performance, some critics going so far as to say that the Russian artists were really out of sympathy with the very German atmosphere of the music, and to some extent failed to appreciate the nature of the task set them. Everybody is agreed, however, that the symbolic nuptial dance of the women at the beginning of the work, and the dance of exorcism at the end, were masterly achievements on the part of the dancers. The part of Joseph was mimed throughout by the young dancer Miassin, who was specially selected for it. He is certainly a clever and promising young dancer and mime, but he was a little overweighted by one of the severest tasks ever set before an interpreter. In the earlier performances the part of Potiphar's Wife was undertaken by Mlle. Karsavina, whose representation of the world-weary woman who later awakes to passion was very striking. In the later performances Mlle. Carmi took the part, and approached it from a somewhat different standpoint. She did not emphasise the note of abnormality quite so much, but was also very dramatic in the principal scene of the temptation. The first three performances were conducted by Richard Strauss, who came over purposely and received a great ovation on every occasion. Subsequently Mr. Thomas Beecham and M. Monteux undertook the direction, and on the authority of those most likely to know it can be said that the work has seemed to grow in popularity.

Only one novelty has been added to the répertoire of the Russian Company at Drury Lane since the last issue, and that was comparatively unimportant. Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Nuit de Mai' is an early work. It is a somewhat slight fairy-story, and the music is correspondingly unpretentious. While it is very graceful and charming, it shows but little trace of the originality and brilliance which characterise the composer's later works, the only number of outstanding merit being the peasants' dance at the end of the first Act. The mounting, as usual, was exceedingly picturesque and original. M. Smirnov, the Russian tenor, made his first appearance in England, and sang with a good deal of charm and temperament.

It should be put on record that the son of Rimsky-Korsakov made a public protest in the Press against the way in which 'Coq d'or' was presented, stating that it was entirely at variance with the composer's intentions. Notwithstanding this, and the obvious objections to the double cast, the work has continued to grow in popular

HARRY EVANS:

BORN AT DOWLAIS, GLAMORGANSHIRE,
SOUTH WALES, MAY 1, 1873.

DIED AT LIVERPOOL, JULY 23, 1914, AGED 41.

Wales lost one of the ablest and strongest of her musical personalities when Harry Evans died on July 23. I knew him well and was greatly attached to him, and I have every reason for the belief that he was attached to me. We were kindred spirits in so much of our life-work. He had a fine musical temperament: there was in it that intensity of emotion so characteristic of his race. But unlike so many of his compatriots, he was able to control this inward ferment by a strong intellect. He made it his servant; he never allowed it to become his master. His musical sympathies were broad, embracing all the best things in music from Bach—for whom, like many of us, he had a special veneration—to Brahms, and the later developments of choral idiom exemplified in the chief works of Elgar and Bantock. He was a born conductor, as the phrase goes. His genius in this direction had perforce to spend itself on great choral works, but I have no doubt from what he accomplished with a comparatively limited experience of an orchestra he would have been equally distinguished in that field if he had been afforded the chance of developing what was in him. Other conductors may have secured finer technique, but on the whole Evans was the most masterful choral interpreter I have ever come across. He possessed that peculiar, fascinating magnetism that focussed the attention of performers and compelled obedience. Conducting was sheer joy to him. I have seen his great eloquent eyes beam with anticipation when he left me in the adjudicators' box and mounted the platform. As an adjudicator at Eisteddfodau and British competitions he was unique. I often sat with him and admired, if I did not envy, his electric alertness, his power of seizing all the points of a performance, and duly relating their importance in the whole scheme of judgment. I have known less experienced and less vigilant listeners say that Harry Evans was too casual and too much of an impressionist, simply because they could not follow the operations of his quick mind. In adjudicating he was lucid and, before all things, educational. No one had a keener ear than his for discovering technical faults, but he never regarded these faults as being all important. The message of the music, the rhythmic treatment of the phrasing, and all that makes for fine interpretation were the factors that counted. Evans was greatly in demand at competition centres all over the British Isles. If I may say so without in any degree disparaging other eminent adjudicators, he was becoming, if he had not already become, the most powerful individual force in the progress of the competition Festival movement in this country. Why he should be taken at the age of forty-one, just as he was coming into his rightful inheritance, is among the perplexing mysteries of things. What will Wales do to show her recognition of his outstanding genius and her pride in its achievements? Perhaps we shall hear at the National Eisteddfod at Bangor in September. It will be meet that at this great gathering, where the artistic aspirations of the Welsh race are fostered and concentrated, the artist, Harry Evans, should be duly honoured. Then there are a brave, stricken woman and her two young sons to think of.

W. G. McNAUGHT.

Mr. Evans fulfilled his last public engagement on May 8, when he conducted the combined choirs at the Morecambe Festival in the Gloria section of Bach's B minor Mass. He was ill, but he resolutely braced himself up for this last task of his professional life—a fitting end to a choral conductor's career! He soon afterwards became weaker, and eventually a dangerous operation was decided upon, when it was discovered that there was a tumour on the brain that could not be removed, and his recovery was pronounced to be hopeless. It has been stated that his illness had been brought on by overwork, but the doctors consider that this excess had nothing to do with the cause of his death.

APPRECIATIONS.

From a letter written to Dr. McNaught:

... Evans's death is grievous. It is a great and irreparable loss both to English and Welsh musical Festivals. Liverpool loses a sure-handed, indefatigable choral conductor, who brought inspiration to his fellows. But the aspect that forces itself most upon me is the loss of an invaluable judge at our Competition Festivals. When penetration such as his conspires with kindness such as he loved to bestow, a good judge was likely. When these are combined, as they were in his case, with strength and facility of expression, an excellent judge stands complete, and this he was. He told me at Morecambe this year that he was asked to go to more Festivals than ever before. One loves to think of the hundreds of obscure village chorals who will remember him with love and gratitude. He could tell them their faults when they won, and give them encouragement and a working policy when they lost. You will miss him terribly, you who knew and loved him so well. I knew him less, but I would not willingly believe that I loved him less than his nearest friend. He went about from Festival to Festival doing good. And how delightful he was to work with. Perhaps we may hope that his memory will provoke other men to good works, for the Competition movement can ill spare so gifted and amiable a leader.—

II. WALFORD DAVIES.

It is hard to believe that the lovable and generous Harry Evans has passed away from us so suddenly, and I know that I am only one of many who feel this loss as a personal bereavement. There is but little consolation to be derived from the conviction that his memory will endure, while we, his fellow-workers and comrades, are left behind for a little time longer. The place of the departed friend must and will remain always vacant.

He was a brilliant conductor, and was respected by all who sang or played under his beat. He was one of the greatest interpretative musicians that I have ever known, and he was able to infuse his forces with the spirit of the music, and the fire of his own enthusiasm. Under his direction I have heard choral singing attain to heights of expression beyond description. I have never yet met a man who so easily earned and so richly deserved the affection and esteem of all the members of his choir.

As an adjudicator at the Musical Competition Festivals, he achieved signal success and the almost impossible task of satisfying audience and competitors alike. His judgment was sure and reliable, his criticisms convincing, and he had the happy gift of kindly speech that cheered the heart of the loser and made the decision appear inevitable.

I shall always cherish his memory, and feel a pride in the knowledge that for many years we held ideas in common, and shared mutual hopes with never a dissentient note to cause a jar in the harmony of our friendship.

GRANVILLE BANTOCK.

... It was as a choral conductor, and especially as the conductor of the Liverpool Welsh Choral Union, that he really set the seal upon his fame, and the writer of this memoir has no hesitation in describing him as the greatest of all the choral conductors of his time in England.

Harry Evans had undeniable genius. It is now many years since I first made his acquaintance at a Cardiff Festival, what time Evans was little more than a boy; he was born at Dowlais in 1873. We sat together through a long evening in the smoking-room of an hotel, the while a lengthy selection from 'Lohengrin' was occupying the attention of the Festival audience next door. During that evening Evans related his life's story in the delightfully modest manner that was as characteristic of him as of all the truly great; and though a mere youth of little experience of music, if even then of immense experience of life of a kind, he sketched for me a living picture of the future of music in Wales. Later we corresponded upon the subject, and one fine day when I can find the time I will unearth that correspondence for the benefit of others.

... He was what we call a 'born' conductor, or, as the Germans would say, 'a conductor by the grace of God.' He had a most winning personality, full at once of great mental strength and of a rare genial sympathy. He was full of ideas, which he clung to with the utmost tenacity, but he was always open-minded, nevertheless. As a companion I have only too rarely met his equal, for he was full of the milk of human kindness; his chiefly self-acquired knowledge was of the widest, and he could and would talk with a perennial freshness. He was a man of the rarest qualities, not one of which had been hardened by the rough and tumble of a life well spent, however strenuous it may have been. He was of the small tribe that makes of all men friends and never an enemy. His loss is so great to choral music that its magnitude will only be fully realised as time passes.—(From the Daily Telegraph, by Mr. Robin II. Legge.)

Mr. Harry Evans was one of the chief figures of the British choral 'renaissance.' Short as his career was, he influenced a much higher standard in choral technique in both the creative and the interpretative aspects, and a movement which he fostered in its infancy has come to a rapid and healthy maturity. The Liverpool Welsh Choral Union was his instrument, and he showed how a massive body of voices could build up an imposing volume of tone and yet be responsive to the most subtle of shades and phrases. With his name one is bound to associate that of Prof. Granville Bantock, principal of the Midland Institute of Music, Birmingham. Bantock has ministered to this choral advance by the provision of works of greater and greater complexity, and for some time there was a wholesome contest as to whether supremacy would lie with the composer or the interpreter, a duel which possibly reached its climax with even honours with the symphonic 'Atalanta in Calydon.' From this abstruse work there was an inevitable recoil, and it was to Mr. Evans and his choir—one of the few who had surmounted the composer's tasks—that Bantock dedicated, and charged with the first production in the spring of this year, his latest work, 'Vanity of Vanities.' Evans, moreover, exerted his influence not only as a choral trainer, but as an adjudicator at nearly all the competitive Festivals, where he was the inseparable companion of Dr. McNaught.

But amidst all these activities his hopes were centred in the music of his native Wales. Candid at all times, he pointed to the absorption of the country's interests in choral works as an unhealthy symptom, and criticised an outlook too narrow to know anything of Beethoven or Wagner. He went further still. Not only did he bemoan the Cymric lack of interest in orchestral music, but he criticised also its lack of creative gifts, inasmuch as in neither the vocal nor the instrumental sphere had it produced a first-class native composer. One remedy for this he had proposed—the formation of a national college of music for the training and the conferment of degrees on Musical Welshmen. But for his illness this project might soon have materialised.—The Manchester Guardian.

The news of the death of Mr. Harry Evans will be received with genuine sorrow by the many thousands of choral singers, and other classes of competitors, young and old, who have enjoyed the benefit of his judicial advice at musical competitions in various parts of the country. Next to Dr. McNaught, he was perhaps the best known, certainly one of the most trusted and popular adjudicators that the musical competition movement called into being. A sound musician himself, he had the happy knack of inspiring others with a desire to cultivate what is best in the art; for, while unsparing in his criticisms, he was ever ready to make allowances for temperament and for limitations of knowledge and capacity, and to give counsel calculated to encourage and help the student who relied on his judgment. This painstaking, combined with a genial manner, ready wit, and a remarkable flow of language, made him a general favourite at choral contests, and his services were in great demand at all the principal competitive festivals, as well as the numerous smaller fixtures.—The Yorkshire Post.

The funeral took place on July 27 at Liverpool. A short service was held in the residence of the family (26, Princes Avenue, Liverpool), which was conducted by the Rev. David Adams and the Rev. Penry Evans, and the interment took place at the Smithdown Road Cemetery, where several thousands of people awaited the funeral procession. In the chapel there were short addresses and prayers by the reverend gentlemen named above, and the hymns, 'Lead, kindly Light' (tune, 'Sandon') and, in Welsh, 'Trewen' ('Mi wn fod fy Mhrynwyr yn fyw') by D. Emlyn Evans, and 'Crugbybar' ('O Ffyniau Caersalem ceir gweled'). The chapel was crowded to its utmost capacity, and thousands waited outside. At the graveside the Rev. Dr. Owen Evans delivered a prayer in Welsh. Floral tributes were numerous, and one of the most beautiful was that sent by the members of the Liverpool Welsh Choral Union, many of whom attended. Amongst the musicians and friends present there were Prof. Granville Bantock, Dr. McNaught, Mr. Dan Price, Mr. Cyril Jenkins, Mr. J. S. Curwen, Mr. Roderick Williams (Cardiff), Mr. Wilfrid Jones (Wrexham), Mr. Herbert Whittaker (Blackpool), Mr. W. S. Nesbitt (Manchester), Mr. T. Hopkin Evans, Mus. Bac. (Neath), Mr. Tom Evans (secretary of the Cardiff Musical Society), Mr. W. T. Watkins (Dowlais), Mr. W. J. Evans (Aberdare), Mr. Edwin J. Evans (London), and Mr. John Cope (Stoke-on-Trent). Officers of the Welsh Choral Union, including Mr. Llew. Wynne (secretary) and Mr. J. D. Jones (treasurer) were also present.

A short account of Mr. Harry Evans's career is given on page 514 of the Musical Times. A longer account was given in the August, 1907, number. The portrait that was presented on that occasion is repeated (on a loose page) in the Musical Times for this month (August, 1914).

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of THE COMPETITION FESTIVAL RECORD.

DEAR SIR,—With reference to the following quoted from the Daily Telegraph in the COMPETITION FESTIVAL RECORD for June, it might interest some of your readers to know what Wagner has to say upon the translation of his own 'Tannhäuser,' which I quote from one of his letters to Frau V. Wesendonck (No. 91, p. 174, of 'Letters from Richard Wagner to Mathilde Wesendonck,' translated by Ashton Ellis).

The representative of the Daily Telegraph says, 'Debussy, of all composers, should never be sung in English, neither should Richard Strauss, neither should that greater Richard whose name was Wagner . . . and the imposition of a new language is not excusable, whether in opera or in song, unless it has the direct sanction of the composer himself, which is very unlikely if he meant what he wrote in the first instance.'

Wagner said, 'The young man who has made a translation of the "Tannhäuser" gave it to me to look through. After a fleeting glance I let it fall, and told myself, Impossible! Therewith a heavy load was shaken off, namely, the thought of a French "Tannhäuser," and I breathed anew. Yet that was only my person. The other, my demon—my genius?—said to me, "Thou seest how incapable this Frenchman is—or anyone else for that matter—for translating thy poem; consequently thou'lt simply prevent thy work being given in France at all. But how when thou art dead and thy works at last commence to live? How, when one has not to ask thy consent, but produces thy "Tannhäuser" in just such another translation as lies before thee, and has been wreaked already on the noblest German poems ("Faust" for instance) with just as little understanding?" Ah, child! such a possible immortality in prospect is a demon of peculiar sort, and lands us in the self-same cares that fasten a father and mother to the welfare of their children far beyond their own term of life. I alone can contribute to a perfectly good translation of my works. Therefore a duty lies in it I cannot forfend. So I seat myself with my young poet every morning, go over verse by verse, word after word, syllable by syllable; seek with him often by the hour, for the best turn of speech, the right word; sing it to him, and make him thus clairvoyant to a world that hitherto was wholly shut to him. Well, his zeal rejoices me, his rising enthusiasm, his frank confession of his previous blindness, and—we shall see! At least I know I am providing for the future of my child as well as I am able!'

Surely from this it is clear that though, much as he disliked the idea of his poem being translated into a foreign language, he recognised that it was inevitable if the world at large were to get to know his work as a whole; and to get to know it as a whole the words must be understood, even if that something be lost which assuredly always is lost (in poetry) however good the translation may be.—

Talgai, Albury Heath, . Yours faithfully,

Guildford.

ARABELLA WRIGHT.

THE ASSOCIATION OF MUSICAL COMPETITION FESTIVALS.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

The tenth annual Conference of this Association was held at Norfolk House, St. James's Square, London (by kind permission of the Duchess of Norfolk, president of the Association). In the absence of Lady Mary Trefusis (chairman of the executive committee), who is travelling abroad, Mr. Plunket Greene presided. There was a large attendance of representatives of Festivals from all parts of the kingdom.

In the report it was stated that eight more Festivals had formally affiliated themselves with the Association, bringing the number up to thirty-nine. The movement continued to show great vitality.

After a short discussion, it was recommended that judges should be free to adopt any system of marking they pleased.

A very interesting demonstration of what can be achieved by systematic training of children was given by pupils of the London Academy of Music under Dr. Yorke Trotter. The children extemporised and harmonized (by writing on the blackboard and by playing), and generally showed remarkable musical alertness. A half-dozen previously unseen pianoforte pieces were distributed amongst the same number of children, and they were sent away to a room in which there was no instrument and told to learn the pieces by looking at the copy. They were allowed about fifteen minutes for this study, and after delivering up the copies they sat down at the pianoforte and played the pieces from memory with remarkable accuracy. A short melodic theme was written on the board by Mr. Thomas Dunhill, and each child in turn developed it, harmonizing as they proceeded.

The demonstration was followed by the audience with great interest and elicited warm applause.

Mr. C. L. Graves read two short papers, one dealing with the ever-green topic, 'The choice of music,' and the other with the relation of the old-established musical Festival to the new competitive Festival; and later on Mr. Kennedy Scott read a paper on 'Conducting,' with illustrations by the Oriana Madrigal Society. (We have these papers in type, but are compelled by the pressure on our space this month to hold them over until September.)

At the afternoon meeting a most interesting feature was the admirably-arranged and carried-out demonstration of the Jaques-Dalcroze Rhythmic Movements by the pupils of the Home School, Ilighgate, under Miss M. Bischoff, who is a certificated student of the Dalcroze College (Hellerau). The demonstration was accompanied by explanatory remarks by Mr. Percy B. Ingham, the director of the London School of Dalcroze Eurhythmics.

DIEPPE.—July 5, 6.

With memories of the Paris competitions of 1912 still fresh in the mind a peculiar interest attached to the international concours at Dieppe last month. In both cases the surviving impression has been the extreme cordiality with which the English visitors were welcomed by their French hosts. The town was en fête. Buildings and streets were lavishly decorated, and the dieppois abandoned themselves to the spirit of gaiety. The Festival was admirably managed from a business point of view, and as to that, was far ahead of the Paris event. At Dieppe, too, where the rush of events and participants was less overwhelming, more attention could be spared from acclaiming and disposing of the visiting choirs for the appreciation of their singing ability. For instance, we read in L'impartiale de Dieppe the following tribute to the choral attainments of the British choirs:

'Special mention must be made of the success won by the English Societies, who brought to our notice an appreciably original style. They are most to be admired in the music of their own choice—English works conspicuous for their musical quality—which they deliver with consummate art: 'The long day closes,' 'O peaceful night,' 'You stole my love' [or 'Yon stole my love' as the French composer preferred it]; these are choirs that can be heard with interest and applauded with enthusiasm.'

The English choirs,—Chesterfield and District Musical Union and Newport Co-operative United Choir,—first competed amongst themselves in sight-reading and in the execution of a prescribed piece and two own-choice pieces. In each case Chesterfield were first. Their chosen tests were Elgar's 'Go, song of mine' and Macfarren's 'You stole my love.' The two choirs met again in the 'Concours d'honneur' with the Galin-Paris-Chevé Choir from Paris as a third competitor. The Chesterfield choir were met with a surprise and a difficulty in that they were not allowed to sing a test previously used in the lower class, and had to substitute hastily Mackenzie's 'A Franklyn's dogge.' The decision of the judges placed Newport first, Chesterfield second, and the French choir third. In a division for ladies' voice choirs the Newport Ladies' Choir had a walk-over in the absence of competitors. In the contest not open to English choirs, some splendid singing was given by the chief prize-winners, the Union des Travailleurs de Roubaix.

High praise is due to these two choirs and their conductors, Mr. Tom Stephens (Newport), and Mr. J. F. Staton (Chesterfield) for their zeal and enterprise in thus upholding the reputation of British choral singing.

CLEETHORPES.—June 18, 19, 20.

This comparatively new Festival has made rapid strides in public favour. The entries were extraordinarily numerous. The classes were comprehensive both as regards instrumental and vocal music. The results were as follows:

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS (5 entries).

Tests: 'The death of Trenchard' (Brahms).
'The Nightingale' (Bateson).

1st. Cleethorpes Pupil Teachers' Centre.

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (4 entries).

Tests: 'O Mariners' (Coleridge-Taylor).
'The Spectres' dance' (Schubert).

1st. Garibaldi Choral Society, Grimsby.

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (5 entries).

Tests: 'Flora gave me' (Wilbye).
'The Cheshire man' (Anderton).

1st. Garibaldi Choral Society, Grimsby.

In the school choir sections there were eleven entries. Bursar Street Boys, under Mr. T. G. Patterson, gained 93 (out of 100) marks, and Welhome Girls, Grimsby, under Miss P. Market, 92 in one class, and Garibaldi P.M. Sunday School, under Mr. P. Wilson, 90 in another class. Prof. Granville Bantock adjudicated.

BOURNVILLE (BIRMINGHAM).—June 27.

This was the second annual competition held under the auspices of the Bournville Works employees. It met with extraordinary success. There were no fewer than fifteen female-voice choirs, eighteen mixed-voice choirs, and the—so far as we are aware—unprecedented number of thirty male-voice choirs, besides a great number of smaller events. Mr. J. A. Rodgers adjudicated in place of Mr. Harry Evans, whose untimely death we record in another column. The choral results were as follows:

LADIES' CHOIRS (15 entries).

Test: 'The bells of Aberdovey' (arr. by P. E. Fletcher).
1st. Station Road Girls' School Choir, Aston (Miss A. L. Toye).

2nd. Madame Gell's Choir, Birmingham (Mr. Appleby Mathews).

MIXED CHOIRS (18 entries).

Test: 'By Babylon's wave' (Gounod).
1st. Willenhall Mixed Choir (Mr. E. Dutton).
2nd. Dudley Madrigal Society (Mr. Joseph Lewis).
3rd. The Johnson Peters Choir (Mr. W. J. Peters).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (30 entries).

Test: 'The martyrs of the arena' (L. de Rille).
1st. Mr. Wassell's Birmingham Male-Voice Choir.

BRISTOL EXHIBITION.—July 1.

Notwithstanding financial difficulties that threatened to wreck this enterprise, the chief choral competitions have been carried through. On July 1 nine male-voice choirs competed, comprising some of the best organizations of the kind in the country. The following is a list: Swansea and District (Mr. Llewellyn R. Bowen), Barry (Mr. D. J. Thomas), Cleveland (Middlesbrough) Harmonic (Mr. Cavin Kay), Plymouth Orpheus (Mr. David Parks), 'Eroica' (Bristol) (Mr. Robert Simmons), Cardiff (Mr. Roderick Williams), Williamstown (Mr. T. Lewis), Ebenezer Mission, Swansea (Mr. Llewellyn Bevan), London Welsh (Mr. Gannor Morgan). The test-pieces were Hegar's 'Phantom Host' and 'Cyril Jenkins's 'The Assyrian came down.' Prof. Granville Bantock was the adjudicator. There was a large audience.

Cleveland gained the first place with 184 marks out of 200, the London Welsh came next with 180, and Plymouth next with 169.

Prof. Bantock said the singing had been of a very high standard indeed. The choirs were formed of the finest material they had in England and Wales. This made the adjudication all the harder, and he had to look at small things which would otherwise not be regarded. It was unfortunate that the two pieces were so much alike, and gave little opportunity for legato singing. He commented upon the use of the copies of music by some choirs, and said that such capable singers should learn to perform without the music copies. He had many times heard 'The Phantom Host,' but rarely more satisfactorily rendered.

STOCKSBRIDGE (SHEFFIELD).—July 10, 11.

This event was held in a marquee. Fortunately the weather was very fine. The late Mr. Harry Evans was to have adjudicated, Mr. Dan Price taking his place. Dr. W. M. Robertshaw, a musical amateur who has often shown special skill in choir-training, was as usual very successful. His female-voice choir, his Congregational Church, and his Choral Union won first-prizes; Mr. F. W. Hill's choir won a rose bowl. The cup offered to junior choirs was won by Mr. G. E. Britton's choir. We regret we have not space to record other results.

A/E 'THE BRITISH BANDSMAN'—MR. W. J. PARRY-JONES AND DR. W. G. McNAUGHT.

In The British Bandsman dated June 13, p. 546, I made the following statement with reference to Dr. McNaught:

'I remember him referring to a certain ladies' choir as that one composed of a front row of females of uncertain age. That was unkind, wasn't it—front row and all? Perhaps after this the doctor will be extra careful what he says.'

In The British Bandsman dated June 27, p. 579, I also, unfortunately, renewed this statement after I had seen Dr. McNaught's indignant denial that he was capable of making such a rude remark to a choir.

I recognise that the circulation of this statement in a widely-read journal is calculated to damage Dr. McNaught's reputation as an adjudicator and as a gentleman.

I now have to admit that there was not the slightest foundation for my statement, and I apologise to Dr. McNaught for having made and repeated it, and I regret greatly the inconvenience and trouble to which he has been subjected in order to refute an unjust accusation.

MARY EGERTON MEMORIAL.

This laudable scheme for perpetuating the memory of the late Miss Mary Egerton, who was one of the late secretaries of the Association of Musical Competition Festivals, is making progress. About £400 has been so far subscribed, but it is hoped that much more will be raised. It is proposed to invest the fund, and to aid village choirs and Festivals in every part of the country with the proceeds. A large number of influential ladies and gentlemen have joined the general committee. Lady Alice Wentworth Fitzwilliam is the president, and the honorary secretaries are Mrs. Herbert Peake, Bawtry Hall, Yorkshire, and Miss Nora Byron, 'Cophthorne,' Croxley Green, Herts.

BLACKPOOL.—October 12 to 17. Mr. Lionel H. Franceys, Musical Festival Offices, Blackpool.

THREE TOWNS (PLYMOUTH).—October. Mr. J. H. Lucas, 62, Hill Park Crescent, Plymouth.

KEIGHLEY ('SUMMERSCALES').—October 24 and 31. Mr. Allan Bradley, 96, Cavendish Street, Keighley.

NOTTINGHAM.—October 31. Mr. F. Purdy, 1, Claremont Terrace, Francis Street, Nottingham.

favour, and has been recognised as one of the most brilliant additions to the Company's repertoire. It is a sign of the times that during the season we have had three new methods of solving the difficulties which beset the composer of modern music-drama—three new attempts at creating a proper balance between stage and orchestra. We have had the arrangement of singers in tiers on the proscenium in 'Coq d'or'; we have had the singer placed in the orchestra in 'Le Rossignol'; and we have had Strauss cutting the Gordian knot by dispensing with the voice altogether. It is too early to say yet which is the most successful device. It is equally absurd to hail every new experiment as the one road to musical salvation just because it is new, and to condemn every new device without fair trial. Every experiment made in good faith should be judged in equally good faith.

Since the last issue several of the old favourite ballets have been revived, and all have proved immensely to the taste of the public, which has filled Drury Lane to overflowing at nearly every performance. 'Cleopâtre,' 'Narcisse,' and 'Le lac des Cygnes' have been revived. The most notable change in the cast of these works has been the appearance of M. Fokine in place of M. Nijinsky, and he has gained a firm hold on the public favour.

'DYLAN: SON OF THE WAVE.'

A DRAMA IN THREE ACTS (IN ENGLISH) BY T. E. ELLIS.

MUSIC BY JOSEF HOLBROOKE.

Dylan, Son of Elan and the Sea King	Frederic Austin
Sea King	Edmund Burke
Gwyddno, King of Geredigion	Frank Mullings
Govannon	Robert Radford
Gwydion	Robert Maitland
Seithenin	Frederick Ranalow
Elan, Daughter of Don	Doris Woodall
Chorus of Wind Spirits, Sea-Folk, Waves, and Wild-Fowl.
Conductor—Thomas Beecham.
The Opera produced by Charles Fairbairn.

Mr. Holbrooke is a very fortunate composer, although he does not always appear to realise the fact. It is no small advantage to him to have his grand opera produced under the most favourable auspices, with a cast including several of the most accomplished British singers of the day, and with a splendid orchestra, and all under the direction of a brilliant conductor. We gave, in our July issue, an outline of the story of 'Dylan'—the second part of the Trilogy of which 'The Children of Don,' produced last year, is the first. It cannot be said that the idiom of the poem lends itself generally to musical declamation. The imagery is often interesting and really poetical, but its verbal expression is not easily intelligible over the footlights. We regret to have to confess that although well placed we could not hear three or four successive words throughout the whole performance. But this, of course, is a difficulty of all opera in any language and with any singers. You only hear what you know previously you are going to hear.

Mr. Holbrooke's music is very unequal. There are longueurs that are oppressive, but on the other hand there is much that is impressive, and that reveals more power than any other dramatic music we have heard by this composer. There is a future for him if he can apply his talent to a really dramatically-written book. The first Act is the least interesting. The second Act provides better opportunity, but some of the finest music is to be found in the third Act. The music that accompanies the ominous flying of the Water-fowl (whose movements were ingeniously shown by the aid of the cinematograph) was specially attractive. The staging was generally adequate, but the feeble realism of the final catastrophe, in which an overwhelming flood was indicated by a few jets and splashes, was a sorry climax. The chorus-singing was excellent, although the music is not melodious or flowing. It must be said, too, that the soloists' parts are often very, and surely needlessly, unvocal. All the artists were highly competent; Miss Woodall and Mr. Burke may be specially mentioned. The orchestra played admirably, and Mr. Beecham conducted masterfully.

Three performances were given—the first on July 4, and the third on July 17.

MR. DONALD BAYLIS.

We quote, by permission, the following well-deserved tribute to the genial and able manager of Sir Joseph Beecham's wonderfully successful opera season at Drury Lane Theatre:

And the Master Niblung, the manager of the whole concern—what of him? He, Mr. Donald Baylis, is probably the proudest man in Drury Lane to-day. Look at his career, and you will know why. From eleven to twenty-five he was supporting himself in Sir Joseph Beecham's business in Lancashire, where he rose from office boy to secretary to the general-manager. One fine day the latter heard Mr. Baylis sing in a church choir, and told Sir Joseph of it. Sir Joseph thereupon paid for the musical training of Mr. Baylis in opera, in German, and in music generally, under a nominee of Mr. William Shakespeare. Mr. Baylis learnt the chief tenor rôles in the Wagnerian operas, in Puccini's operas, Verdi's, and so on, and 'made his début' upon the stage (the first time he had ever seen one) after Mr. Thomas Beecham had heard him, more or less accidentally, sing in the chorus at Covent Garden in the season in which Mr. Beecham produced 'Elektra.' Mr. Baylis sang in Delius's 'A Village Romeo and Juliet,'

'Tristan,' 'Ivanhoe,' and then drifted into the managerial department. Next he went to His Majesty's Theatre with Mr. Beecham, and was chorus leader in the revival of 'Shamus O'Brien.' In the following season at Covent Garden, when 'Salome' was produced, Mr. Baylis, who is still a mere youth (happy man!) of thirty-one years, became assistant acting-manager. Meanwhile he was producing what he calls 'tabloid' operas at various music-halls all over the country; he also produced two fairy-plays.

In 1913 came his great opportunity. In that year Mr. Beecham started the season at Covent Garden in which he gave us our first glimpse of 'Rosenkavalier.' Precisely three years to the very day after Donald Baylis had first set foot in Covent Garden as a chorister he re-entered its portals as general-manager for Sir Joseph and Mr. Beecham! That is surely a record to be proud of. But it is not yet all. In January last year Mr. Beecham opened yet another season at Covent Garden with Russian ballet; yet another later, when 'Ariadne auf Naxos' was produced, also in a theatre where Mr. Baylis had been a chorister. This short season ran from May 24 to June 8. On June 24 he rang up the curtain at Drury Lane with the first performance in England of 'Boris Godounov,' a chief attraction of a season that lasted five weeks and was arranged entirely in sixteen days. At the end of last October Mr. Beecham went to the rescue of the Denhof opera in the provinces, and following on that came this absolutely unrivalled opera season now in course of its triumphant career. Till 1910 Mr. Baylis had never been inside a theatre. He stands to-day at the head of one of the greatest organizations in opera that exist, and he has accomplished this feat in less than four years! Indeed, he has the right to be a proud man to have achieved so much and never to have known defeat, though the obstacles have been often abnormal.—(Mr. Robin Legge, in The Daily Telegraph.)

THE PATRON'S FUND CONCERT.

The annual orchestral concert of the Patron's Fund, which took place at Queen's Hall on July 10, was neither more nor less interesting than usual. The general impression was again that of fertile powers of imagination and advanced technique, ready to be put to the service of great ideas, would the great ideas only come. The programme was as follows:

Tone-poem	'Punchinello' ..	John Greenwood
Concerto in C minor for pianoforte and orchestra	}	Herbert Howells
Mr. Arthur L. Benjamin.
'Prelude to an unwritten Symphony'		Percy Fletcher
Scene for baritone	'Fra Giacomo' ..	Cecil F. G. Coles
Mr. Charles Knowles.
'Carnival,' from Suite 'Scènes de ballet'		Gustav von Holst

The performances were directed by the composers, except in the case of the Concerto, which Sir Charles Stanford conducted.

The tone-poem, 'Punchinello,' illustrative of Hans Andersen, is aptly compounded of fun and pathos; it is freely and independently flowing music, although not highly significant. Some of Punchinello's witticisms had a curiously Scotch flavour. Mr. Howells greatly taxed his powers of imagination in attempting a Pianoforte concerto; in aiming at breadth and dignity he only arrived at a certain stiffness of manner that did not engage the hearer's interest. There is no doubt of Mr. Howells's great ability, and no reason why he should put it to such ascetic use.

The next composition in the list is far from ascetic: in one section of it we would have welcomed a more austere mood. The programme is ingenious and suggestive: A popular composer, in a mood of artistic dissatisfaction, conceives a theme for a Symphony, and proceeds to build fine passages upon it in an ecstasy of creation, only to discover that his theme is, after all, only a perversion of one of his popular valse-tunes. He cannot proceed, for the Valse haunts and mocks him, and the Symphony is abandoned. Mr. Fletcher has portrayed the successive phases of this story with a great measure of success. In contrast to the bulk of the evening's music Mr. Fletcher's work has the merit of being built on simple, broad outlines, by which decorative, elaborative, and descriptive work is regulated. By this alone, without reaching a high pitch of imagination, and without drastic originality, the work made its distinctive appeal. The symphonic episode seems to call for music of a stronger cast than Mr. Fletcher has conceived for it. His symphonic style is somewhat tinged with sentiment. The later passages, however, depicting the composer's despair and the obsession of the Valse-tune, are extremely well devised.

Mr. Coles's setting of a dramatic episode from a poem by Robert Buchanan is vigorously-conceived music, but it was clear that the composer has much to learn in the fitting of a vocal line of melody to the meanings, accents, and verbal rhythm of a text.

Mr. von Holst's work brought the concert to an end in a note of gaiety. It 'goes straight to the point,' it is bright and full of character, and it is brilliantly scored.

Both Mr. Benjamin and Mr. Knowles did their share of the evening's work admirably.

A civil list pension of £50 has been granted to Miss Edith and Mr. John Hipkins in recognition of the great services to music rendered by their father, the late Mr. A. J. Hipkins.

THE MOODY-MANNERS SEASON.

Wilhelm Kienzl (born in Austria, 1857) has written several operas, among which 'Der Evangelimann' (1894) and, more recently, 'Der Kuhreigen,' have achieved immense popularity on the Continent. Having been greatly attracted by their quality and by their possibilities for the English operatic stage, Mr. Charles Manners determined to add them to his repertory, and accordingly he produced 'Der Kuhreigen' on January 23, and 'Der Evangelimann' on April 17, at Kelly's Theatre, Liverpool, both with English versions of the texts. The former was given for the first time in England.

On July 13, Mr. Manners opened a seven weeks' season of opera at the Prince of Wales's Theatre, London, with 'Der Kuhreigen.' The straightforward translation of the title being 'The cows' procession,' he preferred to adopt the title 'The dance of death,' the reference being to the final scene, wherein imprisoned aristocrats are dancing minuets to keep up their spirits while awaiting the summons to the guillotine. The 'Kuhreigen' is a familiar Swiss song, so unsettling to the discipline of homesick Swiss soldiers in the French service (under the expiring ancien régime) that it is put under ban. A young Swiss officer arrested for singing it is released at the request of the gay Marquise Blancheleur Masimelle, who, without success, invites the innocent youth to her château. Afterwards the officer, as a revolutionary, offers to protect the Marquise; but, gaily dancing the minuet with the rest, she refuses and is soon summoned to death. Such melodrama demands powerful and vital music to capture serious interest, and Kienzl's music is neither. It is capably written, free in expression, and often melodious; but taken in conjunction with the plot, there is a self-consciousness in its pathos, tragedy, and sentiment that makes it impossible to be thrilled by them. The production owed a great deal to the vivacious acting and vocal ability of Madame Fanny Moody as the Marquise. Mr. Frank Christian as the Swiss, and Mr. Charles Moorhouse as a French officer, were also excellent. One must also make due mention of a particularly spirited and ferocious chorus of revolutionaries.

On July 20 Mr. Manners gave the first English performance in London of 'Der Evangelimann,' as 'The pious Beggar.' The opera had been given in German at Covent Garden on July 2, 1897. The Wagnerian reminiscences that drew notice seventeen years ago are still more strongly evident to-day. Both in action and music the opera has that unintentional unsophistication which can undermine the most earnestly conceived effects. The cast included those mentioned above, and Madame de Kleno. While neither 'Der Kuhreigen' nor 'Der Evangelimann' has proved worthy of critical admiration, we are none the less grateful to Mr. Manners for the opportunity of making their acquaintance. Both performances were conducted by Herr Hans Winter.

London Concerts.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A notable series of symphony concerts came to an end on June 22, when Herr Arthur Nikisch conducted Weber's 'Euryanthe' Overture, Strauss's 'Don Juan,' Handel's Concerto in G minor, and Brahms's first Symphony. Herr Nikisch showed again that he can give new vitality to works that have never seemed wanting in it; and the understanding between conductor and orchestra was complete. With such powers fully exercised the concert proved a worthy ending to the series. However severely the policy of excluding all but familiar works may be criticised on various (non-commercial) grounds, no one can deny credit for the superlative way in which the season's programme has been carried out, or approval for the financial success upon which the existence of the Orchestra depends.

THE SWEDISH NATIONAL CHOIR.

A type of choral-singing almost completely unfamiliar to Londoners was illustrated at Queen's Hall on June 23 by the Swedish National Choir. This is a body of picked voices representing the chief choral Societies of Sweden, and trained with evident experience and skill by Mr. G. Hultquist. The voices are admirable—especially the basses—and make a perfect blend. The clearness with which the words were defined showed the value of unified vowel colour. The discipline was perfect. Countless sforzandos, crescendos, diminuendos, pianissimos, and like effects were made with exemplary precision. Occasionally an atmosphere was created, but in general technical effect was the objective, and in this direction the attainments of the Choir were remarkable. The programme contained a number of occasional pieces, many of which had a folk-song basis. Some were charming in their freshness, simplicity, and refinement. Songs, occasionally with choral accompaniment, were given by Dr. S. Hybbinette and Mr. A. Wallgren.

QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA.

The chief event of the concert season was the concert of the Queen's Hall Orchestra conducted by Dr. Richard Strauss on the evening of June 26. Strauss appeared at his post both as a composer and a conductor, for the programme included his 'Don Juan,' 'Tod und Verklärung,' and 'Till Eulenspiegel,' and Mozart's G minor Symphony—a master-work of a master of whom Strauss is well known to be an ardent admirer and a specially gifted exponent. The performance of the Symphony was perfect in its rhythm and careful phrasing. We could not fully approve of the liberties taken with the tempo of the last movement, but no other individual idea—the finishing of the Minuet with a repetition of the G major Trio—was much to our taste.

In his own works, the conductor always made the most of their musical quality; he made little attempt to underline their dramatic meanings, but he emphasised everything that could add to their musical beauty and significance. The interest of the concert was heightened by the singing by Miss Elena Gerhardt of songs by Strauss with orchestral accompaniment specially provided for her by the composer. 'Cécile' was so dramatically sung that an encore was necessary. There was an exceptionally large audience, and enthusiasm ran high.

THE BEECHAM SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A high compliment was paid to Mr. Frederick Delius by the above organization at the Duke's Hall on Wednesday, July 8, when a programme drawn from his works was played. Splendid performances were given of the 'Brigg Fair' Rhapsody, the 'Dance Rhapsody,' 'On hearing the first cuckoo in Spring,' 'A Summer night on the river,' 'In a summer garden,' and the Entr'acte and final Scene from the opera, 'A Village Romeo and Juliet.' The solo parts in the latter were sung with due intensity by Miss Agnes Nicholls and Mr. Frank Mullings. Miss Nicholls also gave charming performances of three songs. A couple of unaccompanied part-songs, 'On Craig Dhu' and 'Midsummer song,' were in the programme, but owing to lack of sufficient rehearsal, were omitted. A one-composer programme is a severe test, and it may be said at once that Mr. Delius came out of the ordeal with distinction. Any lack in the matter of melodic invention is more than atoned for by a wealth of glowing harmony and poetic fancy. Moreover, his music has the ring of genuine emotion. Possibly the short notice at which the concert was arranged, and the counter-attraction of a warm summer afternoon, were responsible for the meagre attendance. Those present, however, made up for lack of numbers by enthusiasm, and at the close the conductor (Mr. Thomas Beecham), the Orchestra, and the composer received an ovation.

One would have liked to see a larger audience at the Albert Hall on June 29 on the occasion of the big concert in aid of the Lord Mayor's 'Empress of Ireland' Fund, not only in the interests of charity, but because of the great musical attraction of the event. An orchestra of 400 was formed by combining the Royal Opera, Philharmonic, Queen's Hall, London Symphony, New Symphony, and Beecham Orchestras. The conductors were Sir Henry Wood, Mr. Landon Ronald, Mr. Emil Cooper, Mr. Thomas Beecham, M. Mlynarski, Signor Polacco, and Mr. Percy Pitt.

The programme was familiar, but the effect was always novel. The 'Trauermarsch' from 'Götterdämmerung' sounded more impressive than ever before, but the Prelude to 'Tristan' did not gain by the augmentation. The third movement from the 'Pathetic' Symphony had a colossal climax, and Berlioz's 'Carneval Romain' Overture, under Mr. Beecham, was exhilarating. Sullivan's 'In Memoriam' Overture, the 'Walkürenritt,' and the Overture to 'Tannhäuser' completed the programme.

The 'Empress of Ireland' Fund was also benefited by the concert of the London Shipping Orchestral Society at Queen's Hall on July 8. Mr. Clive Parsons conducted the orchestra in Sullivan's 'In Memoriam' Overture, Schubert's 'Unfinished Symphony,' and other works, and a number of soloists took part.

An 'Empress of Ireland' concert was also given by Miss K. B. Prinsep at Æolian Hall on July 6.

The advancing capacity and ambition of the Great Eastern Railway Musical Society, the now well-known body of amateur choralists and instrumentalists conducted by Mr. William Johnson Galloway, provided an excellent concert at Hamilton Hall on June 24. The inclusion of Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony, Beethoven's Overture 'Leonore,' and the Prelude to Act 3 of Lohengrin, showed that the orchestra of the Society has risen to a full sense of its responsibilities. The performances were on a level with the high standard of the chief amateur playing in London. The male-voice choir gave Herbert Oliver's 'Cries of London,' and unaccompanied part-songs, and songs were given by Miss Gertrude Blomfield.

In a 'star' season of exceptional brilliance one of the conspicuous luminaries was Signor Pasquale Amato, the great baritone who had hitherto been known in England only by name. He shed lustre on Signor Camilieri's second orchestral concert (with the London Symphony Orchestra) at Queen's Hall on June 25. In the Prologue to 'Pagliacci' and Rossini's 'Largo al factotum' he sang with an easy command of all their variety and with unfailing beauty of tone that fully entitled him to the epithet 'great.' Signor Camilieri conducted Dvorák's 'From the New World' Symphony and Glazounov's 'Overture on Greek Themes.'

Madame Clara Butt and Mr. Kennerley Rumford drew a large audience to the Albert Hall on Sunday afternoon, June 28. The songs given by Madame Butt included two by Sir Edward Elgar—'Oh, soft was the song' and 'The chariots of the Lord.'

It is a pleasure to record that the concert given at Bechstein Hall on July 7 by a number of well-known artists for the benefit of Mr. C. Carlyle, who has for some time been incapacitated for his teaching and critical work, was highly successful, a balance of over £300 being realised.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The third and last concert of the Gabriel Fauré Festival, which took place at Æolian Hall on June 19, maintained the standard and success of those that preceded it. The Pianoforte quartet was played by Lady Speyer, Mr. Frank Bridge, Mr. Ivor James, and the composer; pianoforte works were given by Mr. Robert Lortat, and songs by Miss Germaine Sanderson.

On June 23, the third of Mr. Dunhill's chamber concerts at Steinway Hall brought forward a new Phantasy Trio by A. von Ahn Carse for violin, viola, and violoncello, and two older works that proved of greater interest—Mr. Dunhill's Pianoforte quartet in B minor, and that of Gabriel Fauré in C minor. Considerable creative talent was revealed in some songs by Malcolm Davidson, sung by Miss Dilys Jones, and some violoncello pieces by F. Purcell Warren, played by Miss May Mukle.

VOCAL RECITALS.

One of the greatest living coloratura singers, Frieda Hempel, gave unbounded pleasure to a large audience at Queen's Hall on June 19. Her Mozart singing was unsurpassable. Accompaniments were played by the Queen's Hall Orchestra under Mr. Percy Pitt, and the programme was varied by Miss Isolde Menges's violin-playing.

Miss Alma Gluck, another singer of international renown, was heard at the same hall on June 20. Her programme consisted largely of unfamiliar songs, among which was one by Herr Zimbalist.

The ever-welcome Yvette Guilbert gave a series of recitals at Bechstein Hall on June 23, 26, and 30, and July 3, when large audiences appreciated to the full the charm and inexhaustible variety of her style.

Madame Tetrassini made a second appearance at the Albert Hall on June 23, having for support the London Symphony Orchestra under Herr Nikisch. Two contrasted but equally notable illustrations of her powers were given by the Polonaise from 'Mignon' (Thomas) and Mozart's 'Voi che sapete.' In the Aria 'La Canzon quest' è ch' ogni' from Meyerbeer's 'L'étoile du Nord,' the double flute obbligato was played by Mr. D. S. Wood and Mr. W. H. Hollis. The Orchestra was heard alone in Tchaikovsky's 'Francesca da Rimini.'

'Chansons de Montmartre' were sung and acted by M. Edouard Garceau in his inimitable style at Bechstein Hall on June 25.

Vocal recitals were also given by Miss Loraine Wyman (New Theatre, June 19), Miss Ilma Lloyd (soprano) and Señor José de Moraes (tenor) (Steinway Hall, June 19), Mr. Whitney Mockridge (Æolian Hall, June 20), Miss Beatrice Hughes-Pope, and others (Queen's Small Hall, June 27), Mr. Carlton Brough (Æolian Hall, June 22), Mr. Louis van Hes (Bechstein Hall, June 23), Madame Kate Ravoth (Æolian Hall, June 24), Mr. Geoffrey Gwyther (Æolian Hall, June 24), Madame Ida Drummond (Æolian Hall, June 25), Miss Irene St. Clair (Ritz Hotel, June 25), Madame Lenke Viola (Bechstein Hall, June 26), Madame Alice Esty (Bechstein Hall, June 27), Mr. Brabazon Lowther (Æolian Hall, June 27), Madame Juliette Autran, in old French songs (Bechstein Hall, June 29), Mr. Roberto Biletta, in 'Chansons dites' (Steinway Hall, June 29), Miss Clarice Howard (Steinway Hall, June 30), Mr. Bertram Binyon (Æolian Hall, July 1), Madame Mackenzie Fairfax (Æolian Hall, July 1), Miss Mary Hessel (Leighton House, July 1), Señor José R. Garcia (Queen's Small Hall, July 1), M. Arnoide Lecomte (Æolian Hall, July 6), Miss Rodolfa Lombino (Bechstein Hall, July 7), Madame Nina Phocas (Bechstein Hall, July 8), M. Vladimir Rozing (Æolian Hall, July 7).

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

At Steinway Hall on June 19 Miss Emma Barnett introduced some pleasant new pianoforte compositions by John Francis Barnett. Mr. Max Pauer gave a recital at Bechstein Hall on June 22 at popular prices. Beethoven's 'Moonlight' Sonata was the chief number in a programme that fully displayed his great and many-sided ability.

The extraordinary development of Master Solomon's powers of technique and musical insight as a pianist was shown in two orchestral concerts at Queen's Hall on June 23, when accompaniments were played by the Queen's Hall Orchestra under the direction of Sir George Henschel. His grasp of Brahms's D minor Concerto was far from childish, and it was thus made clear that his intellectual progress is keeping pace with the advance of his technical powers. A similar concert was given at Queen's Hall on July 1, when Master Solomon tackled the Tchaikovsky B flat minor with assurance and much success, and the Orchestra played Sir Hubert Parry's 'Overture to an unwritten tragedy,' under Sir George Henschel.

M. Pachmann gave a very vital and interesting performance of Schumann's 'Faschingsschwank aus Wien' at Queen's Hall on June 24. His playing throughout the recital was of the quality best described as Pachmannesque.

Mr. Percy Grainger drew up an agreeable light programme for his recital at Æolian Hall on June 30. His own 'ramble on the first four bars of 'My Robin is to the greenwood gone,' short works by Debussy and Ravel, and some folk-tune pieces by Grieg were played with the proper sense of delicacy and fancy.

Pianoforte recitals were also given by Miss Katie Bacon (Steinway Hall, June 18), Mr. Ralph W. Parker (Æolian Hall, June 23), Mlle. Gasta Svejkovska (Æolian Hall, June 26), M. Wladimir Cernikov (Æolian Hall, June 26), Mr. Hans Ebell (Bechstein Hall, June 30), Miss Marjorie Adam (Bechstein Hall, July 1), Mr. Herbert Fryer (Æolian Hall, July 3), Mr. Godfrey Gardner (Queen's Small Hall, July 8).

OTHER RECITALS AND CONCERTS.

An all-Russian programme given by Madame Elly Heschelin (pianoforte) and M. Grigorovitch (violin) at Bechstein Hall on June 18 consisted of Sonatas for pianoforte and violin by César Cui, Op. 84, and Leonide Nicolaiev, Op. 11, and a Pianoforte sonata by Glazounov in B flat. The performances were on the highest level throughout.

Miss Maud Pargeter (pianoforte), Miss Doris Oldroyd (violin), and Miss Ethel Martin (violoncello) gave a joint recital at Bechstein Hall last night, the chief feature being a performance of Schubert's Pianoforte trio in B flat.

M. Jacques Thibaud's violin playing at Bechstein Hall on June 24 had its customary distinction. He was ably accompanied by M. Georges de Lausnay, who also gave pianoforte solos.

For her third subscription concert at Steinway Hall on June 25, Miss Johanna Heymann (pianoforte) had the assistance of Miss Monique Poole (violin) and Miss Jessie Brett Young (vocalist).

Several well-known artists took part in the concert given at Æolian Hall on July 2 by the Mayfair School of Music in aid of a Railway Orphan and Benevolent Fund. Miss Connie Bee, a violinist of tender years, made a successful appearance.

An interesting number in the programme of the 'Afternoon of music' given by Madame Alexia Bassian (vocalist) and Madame Adelina de Lara at Claridge's Hotel on June 26 was Madame de Lara's Pianoforte suite 'In the forest,' played by Mr. Algernon Lindo.

The programme of the concert given by the Society of Women Musicians at Æolian Hall on June 30 represented the work of Madame Chaminade, Miss Marion Scott, Miss Katherine Eggar, Miss Hearne, Miss Lucie Johnstone, Miss Mabel Smith, and Miss Bluebell Klean.

At Æolian Hall on July 2 Miss Daisy Kennedy gratified a large audience with her admirable violin-playing. She was heard in Mr. John Powell's 'Sonata Virginianesque,' accompanied by the composer.

Recitals were also given by Miss Winifred Smith (violin) at Steinway Hall on June 18; Mr. Ernesto Rocco (mandolin) at Æolian Hall on June 18; Miss Gwenhilda Birkett (violoncello) at Bechstein Hall on June 22; Miss Winifred Hicks-Lyne (vocalist) and Miss Grace Smith (pianoforte) at Æolian Hall on June 23; Mr. Arnold Trowell (violoncello) at Bechstein Hall on June 24; Miss Ada le Marchant (vocalist) and Mr. John Wilmot (pianoforte) at Æolian Hall on June 25; Miss Felia Dorio (vocalist), Miss Erna Schulz (violin), and Mr. Carl Budden-Morris (pianoforte) at Bechstein Hall on June 25; Mr. Mario Lorenzi (harp) at Steinway Hall on June 25; M. Zimbalist (violin) and Miss Alma Gluck (vocalist) at Queen's Hall on June 27; Miss Violet Anderson (vocalist) and Miss Auriol Jones (pianoforte) at Æolian Hall on June 29; Miss Sarah Fennings (violin) and Miss Annie Corrie (pianoforte) at Æolian Hall on June 29; Miss Tara Wallace (violin) and Miss Sarita Benaton (pianoforte) at Bechstein Hall on July 1; Miss Daisy Kennedy (violinist) at Æolian Hall on July 2; Mr. Alfred Kastner (harp) at Leighton House on July 3; Madame Carreras (pianoforte), Mr. Vernon d'Arnalé (vocalist), and Signor Livio Boni (violoncello) at Bechstein Hall on July 10; Madame Kitty Berger (harp-zither) at 45, Egerton Gardens, on July 10.

Students of Mr. Sterling Mackinlay's operatic class gave a successful concert at the Duke's Hall, Royal Academy of Music, on June 18. The chief feature of the programme was a selection from Liza Lehmann's 'The Vicar of Wakefield.'

For his annual concert at the Empress Rooms, Kensington, on June 23, Mr. Wilhelm Ganz had the assistance of a distinguished company of artists, among whom may be mentioned Mlle. Zélie de Lussan, Miss Ruth Vincent, Madame de Crossley, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Maurice Farkoa, Miss Mary Mukle, and Miss Daisy Kennedy.

Nineteen soloists appeared at the Students' concert of the London College of Music on July 1. Mr. F. Sewell-Whitgate's choral class gave part-songs, including Eaton's 'The miller's wooing.'

At the Arts Centre, on July 15, a performance was given of 'phantasy of life,' the title given by M. Zacharewitsch to his setting of parts of the 'Rubaiyat' for vocal solo, reciter, violin, violoncello, and pianoforte. The singer, representing the Philosopher, was Mr. Gwynne Davies, the reciter was Miss Joan Saxby, and the instrumentalists were the composer (pianist), Mr. David Syssermann (violoncello), and Miss Clara Hamaton (pianoforte).

The close of the season has as usual been marked by a number of pupils' concerts, of which a few claim record. Soloists instructed by Mr. Isador Epstein were heard at the Empress Rooms on June 18; Miss Lucie Johnstone's singing pupils gave an unusually interesting programme at Steinway Hall on June 24; vocalists taught by Mr. Gregory Hast gave a concert at Bechstein Hall on July 6; at Steinway Hall, on July 6, Madame Amy Sherwin included a series of Monday evening concerts given by her pupils; Mr. Carl Weber's pianoforte pupils showed their talent at Bechstein Hall on July 8; operatic work, singing and action-songs, as studied at Miss von Etlinger's Operatic and Dramatic School, were exhibited on June 17; demonstrations of the pianoforte-teaching work at the Cheltenham Matthey School were arranged to take place on June 2, 15, and 23; and pupils of Madame Amina Goodwin's Humann Pianoforte Studios gave a recital at Kensington Town Hall on July 16.

Reports of the Festivals of the Tonic Sol-fa Association, conducted by Dr. Coward, and the Festival of Empire's Choir, conducted by Mr. Filmer Rook, both at the Crystal Palace, are given in the School Music Review for August.

Suburban Concerts.

A concert by the string orchestra of the Croydon Conservatoire of Music was given in the large Public Hall on June 26. The programme included Bach's Suite in D; Martini's Concerto in D minor for violin and string orchestra, the solo part being played by Miss Norah Wheeler; Mozart's pianoforte concerto in D minor (first movement), played by Miss E. Bertha Sutcliffe; and songs given by Miss Violet Miller. Miss Ursula Humphery played Chopin's Impromptu F sharp, and Mr. William H. Reed conducted.

At the thirty-first annual general meeting of the Corporation of the Royal College of Music it was stated by the chairman (Sir Francis H. Champneys) that in 1914 87 candidates entered for the A.R.C.M. Examination, as against 447 in the previous year. The following presentations were made: The Challen gold medal, for pianoforte-playing, to George T. Ball; the gold medal presented by Maharajah Sir Surendro Mohun Tagore, of Calcutta, for the most generally deserving pupil of the year, to Elsie M. Pudding; the John Hopkinson gold medal, for pianoforte-playing, to George T. Ball; the John Hopkinson silver medal, for pianoforte-playing, to Kathleen I. Long.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BOURNEMOUTH.

With Mr. Dan Godfrey and the members of the orchestra enjoying a hardly-earned holiday, all music-making of a serious kind is in a state of suspension. The interregnum is but a short one, however, and very soon the Winter Gardens will again invite the attention of such audiences as thirst for music of a dignified character.

Meanwhile, those Symphony Concerts that took place prior to the orchestral exodus presented us with an opportunity for renewing acquaintance with several choice works, such as Massenet's 'Phedre' Overture, Elgar's second 'Wand of Youth' Suite, Beethoven's eighth Symphony, Bizet's 'Patrie' Overture, Saint-Saëns's 'Danse Macabre,' Haydn's 'Oxford' Symphony, Schubert's 'Rosamunde' Overture, and Cowen's 'Suite of old English dances.' The concert on July 1 was directed by Mr. F. King-Hall, deputy-conductor, in the absence of Mr. Godfrey. The soloists have been as follows: Miss Lilian Burgess, Mr. Joseph Cheetham, Miss Gwennie Llewellyn (vocalists), Madame Francesca (harp), and Miss Kirmse and Mr. S. Coelho (of the Municipal Orchestra), who presented a duet for two violoncellos.

With the exception of Miss Constance Drever, who, at a concert on June 26, sang some popular items in a brilliant manner, no artists of standing have recently visited the town.

The series of amateur vocal competitions, already alluded to in our last report, has been extended to baritones and basses, together with a second competition for contraltos. The results—arrived at by the votes of the audience—prove that the public's decision places the quality of the voice far in advance of general intelligence and interpretative instinct, a conclusion greatly to be deplored.

On July 10 St. Peter's Hall was the venue of the terminal concert of the Bournemouth School of Music, that rapidly advancing institution controlled by Mrs. Farnell-Watson and Mr. Hamilton Law.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

Apart from the summer season of entertainments no music has been publicly performed during the last month. The Plymouth Orpheus Male Choir have been active, but outside the home locality. On June 20 a hundred of the members gave two concerts at Torquay Municipal Pavilion, and had a cordial and encouraging reception. Their special achievement, however, was the gaining of third place in the Bristol International Exhibition musical competitions on July 1.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

Music in the Torquay Municipal Pavilion has been varied and always of excellent standard. Madame Blanche Marchesi has given a vocal recital in conjunction with the Municipal Orchestra. Mr. Basil Hindenberg has arranged special Wagner, Tchaikovsky, and Dvorák programmes, and matinées of national music have provided unusual interest.

At Exeter two concerts were given on June 19 by the band of the Worcestershire Regiment (Bandmaster J. G. Worms conducting), Exeter Oratorio Society being responsible for the enterprise. The Operatic Society were able to record a profit of £120 on the recent performances of 'Dorothy,' and £100 was voted to charities. Mr. Allan Allen was re-elected hon. conductor, with Mr. F. Gandy Bradford as assistant. 'The Emerald Isle' was selected for performance next February.

In affiliation with the Exeter Diocesan Choral Association the unions in the Plympton Deanery and Tavistock Deanery held their annual Festivals on June 24 and July 14 respectively. The former event, in Ivybridge Parish Church, brought a total of 160 singers from seven parishes. Mr. T. Roylands-Smith conducted, the diocesan book being used. A special impression was made by the hymn 'St. Patrick's breastplate,' sung to Sir Charles Stanford's arrangement of a beautiful Irish melody. Six parish choirs at Tavistock produced a total of 130 singers, and in this case the singing of the psalms and of the anthem ('This is the day,' Turle) were the noteworthy features.

Selections from 'Elijah' were given at Fitzford Church, Tavistock, on June 30, by the choir, assisted by friends. Miss Mary Groser, who sang the soprano solos, was largely responsible for the training of the choir.

CORNWALL.

The annual Festival of Truro Diocesan Choral Association, held in the Cathedral on June 23, was one of the most successful in the history of the movement, the singing of the 627 choristers reaching a high level. The deaneries represented were Pydar, Powder, and St. Austell, choirs coming from twenty-four parishes. Dr. Monk, chief conductor, was assisted by Messrs. Brennon Smith, A. W. Gill, G. L. Hall, R. M. Hardwicke Paterson, and J. Carlyon. Mr. Gilbert was at the organ. The anthem, 'I was glad' (Dr. Brewer) was well sung, the Cathedral choir giving the verse part with excellent effect; and the hymns, excellently chosen, had an inspiring influence.

On the following date, the same 'book' was used at the Kerrier Deanery Festival in Breage Church. Seven choirs were conducted by Mr. Quintrell. St. German's was the rendezvous of the seven choirs representing the Deanery of East on June 25, producing a total of 161 voices. Mr. E. J. Somes conducted, and Mr. H. Hodge was at the organ.

The organ in St. Peter's Church, Landrake, after restoration and enlargement, was dedicated on June 24, when Mr. H. Moreton gave a recital, and selections from oratorios were sung.

A miscellaneous concert of unusual excellence was given in the small fishing village of Cawsand on June 22, concerted vocal music forming an important feature. Marazion Male Choir visited the flagship 'Orion' on June 22 and sang ballads and choruses under the baton of Mr. J. H. Trudgeon. So much appreciated was the singing of the choir that a suggestion was made by Admiral Sir R. K. Arbuthnot that a class should be formed on the ship.

Delabole Junior Male Quartet sang several part-songs at a sacred concert held at Hightown on July 15, in connection with the dedication of the new organ in the United Methodist Church.

LIVERPOOL.

A movement has been set on foot among Church choirs in the Diocese of Liverpool, to provide the choir gates for the new Cathedral. About £500 will be necessary, and in the provision of this amount 225 choirs will co-operate. A representative committee has been formed, which includes organists and choirmasters in all parts of the Diocese, and it would appear that the proposal commends itself generally. Thanks to the work and influence of the Liverpool Church Choir Association there is a strong esprit de corps among choirs and choristers in the city, and it is felt that the proposed gift affords a welcome opportunity for choirs to be prominently and permanently identified with the fabric of the great building which is now arising in solemn majesty on St. James's Mount. During the ten years which have elapsed since the foundation-stone was laid by King Edward, the beautiful Lady Chapel has been completed and the construction of the choir, transepts, and Chapter house has proceeded at a pace consistent with safety and age-lasting workmanship. The Lady Chapel, in itself an exquisite miniature cathedral, was consecrated as the Cathedral Church of the Diocese on June 29, 1910. The original plan provided twin towers which were to have crowned the transepts, but in the new design they are superseded by one massive single tower, in order to provide a large central space, 190 feet by 87 feet, involving an extra expenditure of £25,000. The construction of the choir has been an immense undertaking, and dimensions in figures convey only a slight conception of its majestic proportions. The great east window will probably rank as one of the largest in the Kingdom, the subject for the stained glass being the Te Deum.

A remarkable feature of the new Cathedral will be the height of the vaulting of the nave and choir—measured to the barrel-vaulting, 116 feet, and in the transepts, 140 feet. No other cathedral in the country approaches this height. The nearest is Westminster nave, 102, York 99, Salisbury, 84, Lincoln 82, while Chester reaches only 78 feet.

Considerable discussion has been excited over the details of the splendid organ which is to be placed in the first bay on each side of the choir. With its six manual departments, 16 speaking stops, and 48 couplers it is considered to be relatively none too large for the great building. In addition to being claimed as the largest organ in the world, it is also to be remarkable for the extent of its 'families' of contrasted tone-colours.

According to the report of the executive committee which was recently presented to the members of the Liverpool Welsh Choral Union, the past season proved a most successful one, both musically and financially. Each of the four concerts given showed a profit. The total receipts for the season, inclusive of a balance of £73 from the previous season, amounted to £1,203, while the expenditure was £1,029, leaving a credit balance of £174. Musically the choir very signally upheld its reputation by the performance given of Granville Bantock's 'Vanity of Vanities,' a work expressly composed for and dedicated to Mr. Harry Evans and the Welsh Choral Union. The president, Mr. Robert Roberts, in complimenting the committee on the financial success of the season, remarked on its agreeable feature in these days when so many musical organizations were complaining of lack of support.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

In the summer examinations at the Royal College of Music, three songs of unusual excellence by Miss Mabel Moss, of Congleton, were sung by Miss Mabel Hurst; the accompaniments combine technical cleverness as well as poetical suggestive power. The second night's work (July 9) was mainly devoted to chamber music, in which the College professors excel. In Brahms's A minor String quartet and the Pianoforte trio in B, each movement brought a change of player. Mr. Harold Warburton, Mr. Frank Tipping, and Mr. Anderson-Tyrer revealed themselves as chamber players of more than average power. On the third evening the slow movement of the Elgar Violin concerto was played by Miss Gertrude Barker, accompanied by Mr. R. J. Forbes on the organ, and in this form had great nobility of effect.

Mr. Arnold Perry, Lancashire County Council scholar, a member of Dr. Walter Carroll's composition class, was the chosen representative of the student composers.

Dr. J. Kendrick Pyne has resigned his position as organ teacher at the Royal Manchester College of Music which he has held from its foundation; this takes effect at the end of the summer term. Meantime, Mr. Forbes fills the post; possibly this may lead to a permanent appointment.

The twenty-first birthday celebrations of the College have brought some grist to the mill in the shape of increased annual subscriptions to the extent of £73 and rather over £2,600 to its endowment.

On June 30 Dr. Keighley's pupils gave rhythmic exercise at the Gaiety Theatre. The rhythmical illustration of Bach's Fugue in C minor, a separate dancer being allotted to each voice of the fugue, was most interesting on account of the polyphonic variety of rhythm and the happiness of its suggestive expression, due to the strong rhythmical character of the music.

Madame Frieda Hempel, Germany's famous operatic soprano, will sing for the first time in the provinces on October 10, at Mr. Brand Lane's first concert in the Free Trade Hall.

Rehearsals for the first performance by Mr. Lane's choir of 'Gerontius' are in full swing, and on July 22 Sir Henry Wood, who is to conduct, took charge of the choir.

The experiment of open-air vocal concerts in the congested areas of Manchester has been resumed after a lapse of several years. Early in July, under the auspices of the Parks Committee of the City Council, Miss Say Ashworth's Ancoats Mill Girls' Choir sang for an hour and a-half to a couple of thousand folk, who spent the cool of the evening—after the day's toil in mill, foundry, or machine-shop, amid the drabest and dingiest surroundings one can conceive,—listening to the finest music Miss Ashworth's Choir could give them. Luckily the air was quite calm, and the concert an unqualified success. It is of interest to learn that this ar this Choir takes a short holiday in Germany; on two occasions in recent years these mill-lassie singers have travelled in Switzerland.

During the Covent Garden opera season just closed, a large section of the orchestra, particularly wood and brass, has consisted of members of the Hallé band, and many critics have thought the opera orchestra strongest in these departments where Hallé men are most numerous. The first flute, oboe, cor anglais and bassoon, tuba and pianist, besides others of the rank and file, are included.

The visit of the Quinlan opera to the New Theatre for a fortnight from September 28 holds out promise of a well-varied repertory: French art in Charpentier's 'Louise' and Saint-Saëns's 'Samson and Delilah'; Italian in Verdi's 'Ida' and Puccini's 'Tosca,' 'Bohème,' and 'Butterfly,' and culminating in a carefully graded series of Wagnerian dramas ranging from 'Flying Dutchman,' 'Tannhäuser,' 'Lohengrin,' 'Götterdämmerung' and 'Parsifal.' The cast for the first-named includes: Parsifal, Mr. John Coates; Kundry, Miss Edna Thornton; Gurnemanz, Mr. Robert Parker; Isolde, Mr. Graham Marr; Titurel, Mr. William Anderson. The conductors are Messrs. Beecham, Eckhold, and Voghera, and among other artists taking part are the vocalists Percival Allen, Jeanne Brola, Agnes Nicholls, and Isabel Dennis, Adelaide van Stavelen, Messrs. Maurice Oisly, Frank Mullings, Sydney Russell, Spencer Thomas, Charles Magrath, and Robert Radford.

Mr. Thomas Quinlan is a native of East Lancashire, having been identified with various industrial enterprises before entering on a career as musical and operatic impresario.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents. Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

HARLECH.—The annual choral Festival was held on July 2 in Harlech Castle. The morning and afternoon sessions were devoted to part-songs, glees, and choruses by the different choirs, and to combined singing of Welsh hymns. The evening concert consisted of the performance of a Welsh work, 'Dw sydd noddfa' (God is our refuge) by T. Rees, and Part I of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul.' The united choirs, numbering 2,000 voices, and an orchestra of fifty (led by Mr. Vasco V. Akeroyd) were under the control of Mr. J. Charles McLean, who took the place of Mr. Harry Evans as conductor. The soloists were Miss Stiles Allen, Miss Annie Davies, Mr. David Ellis, and Mr. David Brazell. The Castle, which accommodates about 8,000 people, was crowded, and the singing was magnificent, especially the brilliant being a performance of 'Men of Harlech' as arranged by the late Harry Evans.

HASTINGS.—At St. Mary's Star-of-the-Sea, Hastings, a very successful performance of Mendelssohn's 'Lauda Sion' (in Latin) was given on June 21. The solos and quartets were sung by Miss E. M. Hawkins, Miss M. Sinden, Miss K. Whetton, and Mrs. Hudson, and Messrs. L. Jeffrey, E. Stace, F. G. Harman, and A. J. Gregory. Mr. Henry Poole, organist and choirmaster, played the accompaniments in the organ.

JOHANNESBURG.—Gade's 'The Erl-king's daughter' was performed by the Johannesburg Choral Society, under Mr. F. W. Peters, on June 10. The Orchestral Society, besides assisting in the Cantata, accompanied Madame Wedlake in Grieg's Pianoforte concerto, and played a Dramatic Overture, 'Cleopatra,' by Mancinelli. The vocal soloists were Miss Sophie Gimkewitz, Mrs. Harold Fraser, and Mr. Robert Hunter.

SHERINGHAM.—An opera, 'Helda,' written and composed by Mr. Henry Brett, organist of St. Peter's Church, was produced with success on June 16.

Foreign Notes.

ANTWERP.

Emil Wambach, the director of the Conservatoire, has discovered two hitherto unknown works by Peter Benoit, the national composer—an Andante for trombone and pianoforte, and a Sonata.

ATHENS.

A class for rhythmic gymnastics (on the method of Jaques-Dalcroze), under the direction of Mlle. Dys Ritter, a pupil of Hellerau, has been opened at the Lottner Conservatoire.

BERLIN.

Arnold Schönberg's new work for chamber-music 'Pierrot Lunaire,' will be performed under the composer's conductorship by the Zehme-Sextet on February 2 next, at the Beethoven-Saal. The same composer's 'Gurre-Lieder' will be introduced here early in 1915, at the Circus Busch, no concert-hall being able to accommodate the 860 executants. —Strauss's 'The Legend of Joseph' is to be given at the Opera House under Diaghilev next October. —It is stated that the original manuscript full score of Wagner's 'Rheingold' which the great master left as pledge to the Wesendoncks, and which afterwards came into the possession of King Ludwig II. of Bavaria, is to be found at Wahnfried, whereas it is well-known that this full score has been missing and searched for during forty years! —The new tone-poem, 'Friede,' for choir and orchestra, by E. R. von Reznicek, is to be produced here by the Philharmonic Society. —The next congress of the International Musical Society will be held in this city in 1916.

BOSTON.

The first American performance of 'Cain and Abel,' the new opera by Felix Weingartner, is to take place here under the direction of the composer.

BREMEN.

'La Vallière,' a new opera by M. Oberleithner, will be produced early next season at the Stadt-Theater. Leoncavallo's new work, 'Die Zigeuner,' Humperdinck's 'Die Marketenderin,' and Schmidt's 'Notre Dame' are included in the programme.

BRUSSELS.

The first performance in French of Weingartner's 'Cain and Abel' will be given at the Théâtre de la Monnaie. The other novelties are: 'Marcof, der Schuster' (Henry Rabaud), 'Boris Godounov' (Moussorgsky), Verdi's 'Otello' and 'Falstaff,' and Berlioz's 'Faust.'

FRANKFORT-ON-MAIN.

The prize of the Mozart-Stiftung of the Liederkrantz has been awarded to Werner Wehrli (born 1892 at Aarau, Switzerland). There were no fewer than ninety-eight competitors. Dr. Ethel Smyth's new opera-comique 'The Boatswain's Mate' will be produced here during next season.

GENEVA.

Bernhard Stavenhagen has arranged to perform during the forthcoming season all the symphonic works written by R. Strauss, the nine Symphonies by Mahler, and the 'Lied von der Erde' by the same composer. —'La Fête de Juin,' the patriotic cantata by Jaques-Dalcroze, performed during the great Festival, obtained an immense success.

HANOVER.

In connection with the inauguration of the new town concert-hall a great musical Festival has taken place. The programme included works by Reger and Siegfried Wagner. The large hall accommodates an audience of about 4,000, a choir of 600, and an orchestra of 120. The small hall, for the performance of chamber music, &c., contains accommodation for 600. The total expenditure has been four million mark.

HELSINGFORS.

Jean Sibelius has written the music to a pantomime, 'Scaramouche.' The work is to be produced in this city during December next.

LICHTENBERG.

A German chamber-music Festival of three concerts is announced to take place on August 1 and 2, under the direction of Henri Marteau.

LÜBECK.

The posthumous musical play 'The Ghost of Horodin,' by Hermann Zumpe, will be produced next month at the Town Theatre.

MADRID.

'Marusca,' a Spanish opera composed by Vives, has been produced here with success.

MILAN.

At the Scala Theatre two new one-act operas by Pietro Mascagni, 'Faida del Comune' and 'L'Alodoletta,' will be produced at the beginning of the season.

MUNICH.

By order of the King a bust of J. S. Bach will be installed in the 'Walhalla' near Regensburg.—The town council have decided to name one of the principal streets Richard Strauss-Strasse.—It is stated that the performing fees on Wagner's works from the death of the composer (1883) to 1914 amount to over six million marks.—Dr. Ethel Smyth's opera 'The Wreckers' is to be given at the Court Theatre.

ROME.

The 'Hymn to the rising Sun' by R. Mandl has been produced here with marked success. The performance was given under the direction of Oscar Nedbal.

ROUEN.

The much-coveted 'Grand Prix de Rome' has been awarded to Marcel Dupré, the son of the well-known organist of this city. The winner is the assistant of the great organist-master Ch. M. Widor.

WIESBADEN.

The two-hundredth performance of Weber's 'Oberon' was announced to take place last month.

Miscellaneous.

We are informed that Prof. Xaver Scharwenka has definitely left the board of directors and the professional staff of the Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatorium, and will open on September 1 a new Academy and Training College for teachers devoted to the cultivation of high-class music and to the training of fully-qualified pianoforte teachers. A prospectus may be obtained from Messrs. Breitkopf & Härtel, 21 Potsdamer-Strasse, Berlin, W., and particulars from the Secretary, Meisterschule, Blumenthaler-Strasse 17, Berlin W57.

At the unveiling of the statue to Mr. Andrew Carnegie at Dunfermline, a Festal Ode, specially composed for the occasion by Mr. David Stephen, Director of Music to the Carnegie Dunfermline Trust, was performed. A choir of 600 voices formed of the local choristers and the choral Societies in Fifeshire that have benefited under Mr. Carnegie's Fifeshire Choral Society scheme undertook the vocal part, while the accompaniment was played by the full band of the Carnegie Dunfermline Trust, supplemented by six special trumpeters. Mr. David Stephen conducted.

On the occasion of Dr. Richard Strauss's recent visit to this country, the Degree of Doctor of Music was conferred upon him by Oxford University.

Mr. Arthur G. Matthew has been appointed classical and music master at Sutton Valence School, Kent.

COMPLETION OF A Modern School for the Violin

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ AND JAMES BROWN.

THE purpose of this Work is to provide, in one systematic and comprehensive scheme, all that is necessary for the acquirement of the Art of Modern Violin Playing.

"A Modern School for the Violin" consists of Six Books devoted to Daily Technical Practice, Six Books of Studies for Violin alone, and a large number of Pieces with Pianoforte Accompaniment, the Violin parts being specially edited for the purposes of teaching.

SECTION A.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE. IN SIX BOOKS.

The foundation of "A Modern School for the Violin" is laid by means of a series of Six Books dealing exclusively with the important subject of DAILY TECHNICAL PRACTICE. The First Book of Technical Practice (Book 1A) is limited to the 1st Position; the Second Book (2A) to the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the Third Book (3A) to the first five Positions; and so on. Bowings and other technical devices are introduced in a similarly progressive manner throughout. Each Book of Technical Practice is divided into "Lessons" (or Chapters), and each Lesson contains a number of short repeating Exercises on some definite point of Violin Technique—as Fingering, Bowing, &c., with the needful explanations. Included in each Book will be found a complete set of Scales and Arpeggi, arranged according to the particular stage of advancement reached.

Taken as a whole, this Section is intended to facilitate, and to insist on, a thorough, steady, and continuous progress in the mastery of the Instrument, this being the only possible means of preparing the groundwork for artistic achievement with all its lasting delights.

SECTION B.—STUDIES. IN SIX BOOKS.

Section B is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in Six Books. Each Book of Studies (Section B) is carefully co-ordinated, in respect of difficulty and range of subject, with the correspondingly numbered Book of Technical Practice (Section A). Thus the First Book of Studies (1B) is written in the 1st Position; the Second Book (2B) in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the 3rd Book (3B) in all Positions up to and including the 5th; and so on. It should further be explained that the two Sections are designed to complement one another, and that the "School" must be practised, not in single Books of Technical Practice and Studies alternately, but in pairs. Thus, Books 1A and 1B are to be taken concurrently, then Books 2A and 2B, 3A and 3B, and so on, and the appropriate pairs are now issued bound together in cloth (see Cloth Bindings below).

THE EVE OF ST. AGNES

CANTATA

FOR SOLI, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

THE WORDS BY JOHN KEATS.THE MUSIC BY JOHN FRANCIS BARNETT.PRICE TWO SHILLINGS AND SIXPENCE.
Paper Boards, 3s.; Cloth, gilt, 4s. 6d.
Vocal Parts, 1s. each.
(Tonic Sol-fa in the Press).

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

The vocal writing is always admirably smooth and fluent, the music abounds in graceful passages, both vocal and orchestral, and there is something refreshing in its complete freedom from affectation. . . . 'The Eve of St. Agnes' is bound to find favour with choral societies in search of an unpretentious, straightforward, and eminently singable work.

MORNING POST.

Mr. Barnett, like Verdi, moves with the times in notable fashion. His cantata is designed on the modern continuous plan, and his music itself is of to-day in its freedom of utterance and in the vividness and richness of orchestral colour. He seems to revel in the freedom allowed, and does not hesitate to take advantage of every opening. Yet with it all there is the touch of the experienced craftsman who understands the voice and can write gratefully and well for it singly and in groups.

SUNDAY TIMES.

His music is written in continuous plan, and his orchestration has often a modern richness of colour. The chief characteristics of his work are the facile flow and suavity of his melodies and the clear and refined technique.

MONTHLY MUSICAL RECORD.

There is no reason why this work should not have as wide a popularity as the same composer's "Ancient Mariner," for it repeats the same characteristics of tunefulness and unpretentious workmanship.

THE GLOBE.

It is still, as it has always been, impossible for Mr. Barnett to write anything that is not suave, mellifluous, and musicianly.

THE ORGAN

BY

WALTER G. ALCOCK,

M.V.O.,

Mus. Doc. Dunelm., A.R.C.M., F.R.C.O.

Organist and Composer to His Majesty's Chapels Royal and Assistant-Organist of Westminster Abbey.

Published as a Net Book.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS NET.

THE ATHENÆUM.

A fine work . . . and is admirable at all points.

YORKSHIRE POST.

The name of Dr. Walter G. Alcock is in itself a sufficient guarantee of the sound teaching of organ-playing, and his book, "The Organ," more than sustains his reputation. . . . There are many useful exercises on various technical points, and some short original pieces which serve as further illustrations of the author's teaching. It is very clearly printed on good, stout paper, and from every point of view is a desirable book.

YORKSHIRE OBSERVER.

A treatise on the instrument by so eminent an authority as Dr. Walter Alcock is likely to become a standard text-book. The young student could ask for none better.

THE SCOTSMAN.

The work is a distinctly useful addition to books of musical instruction.

THE BRISTOL TIMES AND MIRROR.

Although many books of instruction about the organ have been published, the latest is among the best. Its merits are sundry. . . . If the book be thoroughly mastered no other one is needed for the purpose of tuition, for it is the key to everything that has been written for the king of instruments. The print is exceedingly clear, and the book itself neat and attractive.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS.

This is not an "instruction" book in the ordinary use of the term, for its scope is too wide, and the information given is so largely the result of personal experiment and experience that those who have already advanced in the art of organ playing will find many hints and suggestions which will prove of practical service. The book is admirably divided into sections dealing with the elements of organ art; and a very important chapter is that on hymn-playing.

THE SUNDAY TIMES.

Every young organ student will find himself greatly helped by "The Organ," a new manual of the instrument by Dr. Alcock.

THE CHOIR.

We congratulate Dr. Alcock on having produced a work which will rank with the best of its kind.

THE MUSIC STUDENT.

The work is up-to-date in every way, it is well arranged and graduated, and begins at the beginning. . . . One must look a long way to find a work which unites as much sound instruction with so much good music of all grades, all under one cover.

THE BOOKSELLER.

Dr. Alcock has produced a very helpful and useful book which the ambitious player will do well to study with great care and attention; he who follows the directions here given will undoubtedly find his work as an organist very materially assisted.

CHURCH FAMILY NEWSPAPER.

Written by a master of his subject, "The Organ" makes an immediate appeal to organists of all descriptions, for the matter contained in the book embraces all that is necessary from simple pedal exercises—called by some "first steps"—up to pieces requiring all the resources of modern organ technique.

A PRACTICAL GUIDE TO THE THEORY OF MUSIC

CONTAINING

NUMEROUS TEST-QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS.

BY

JULIA A. O'NEILL

Composer of "EXERCISES FOR THE WEAKER FINGERS" (Progressive Studies, Edited by FRANKLIN TAYLOR, Book 53) and of "MELODIOUS TECHNIQUE."

Price One Shilling. Paper Boards, 1s. 6d.

THE TIMES.

It is in its clear statement of facts, both in writing and by the use of simple diagrams, that Miss Julia O'Neill's book excels.

THE MORNING POST.

Her manner of putting down the facts is concise and clear. An immense amount of ground is covered in logical sequence, and the book is one of the most helpful publications as yet made. It is satisfactory to note that ear-cultivation is touched upon.

MUSICAL OPINION.

It is really surprising the amount of useful matter that Julia A. O'Neill has managed to compress within the covers of her primer, "A Practical Guide to the Theory of Music." Teachers who wish to keep abreast of the times in an educational sense will find this well-written guide calculated to help them to a knowledge of the latest and most accepted method of elementary theoretical instruction. We are pleased to note that the all-important subject of ear-culture has not been neglected in the present primer.

THE LADY.

Is a thoroughly praiseworthy attempt to present the cardinal facts of musical theory in a plain and straightforward manner to the beginner. Wholly admirable is the way the gradual formation of our present-day clefs is explained.

NEW EDITION (1912).

A

HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS IN MUSIC

CONTAINING

600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS

BY

ERNEST A. DICKS,

FELLOW OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

The scope of this book covers the whole ground of theoretical examinations in music. It supplies an invaluable equipment to candidates entering for the various Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge held periodically throughout the country, and it will be found extremely useful to those who are preparing for the higher grades of Diploma and Degree Examinations.

The book is therefore very comprehensive. Its range includes questions and answers in Theory, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form, Fugue, Acoustics, Musical History, Organ Construction, and Choir Training.

By no means the least valuable part of the volume is that section, consisting of upwards of one hundred pages, which contains reprints of past examination papers set by the Associated Board, Trinity College, and the Incorporated Society of Musicians; the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, London, Dublin, Durham, and Edinburgh, and the Victoria University; The Royal Academy of Music, The Royal College of Music, and The Royal College of Organists. The advantage of having so many specimens of these actual examination papers within one cover is too obvious to need further comment or commendation.

PREFACE TO THE NINTH EDITION.

The author desires to acknowledge his great indebtedness to the authorities of the London University; The Royal Academy of Music; the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music; The Royal College of Organists; Trinity College of Music, London; and the Incorporated Society of Musicians, for their kindness in allowing him to incorporate copies of their latest Examination Papers in Parts II. and III. of his Handbook, in order that he might present their latest examination requirements.

THE WAR AND THE FUTURE OF MUSIC.

BY ERNEST NEWMAN.

It is already a commonplace among journalists that whatever be the military result of the present war it is a very different Europe that we shall know when it is over. There will be new political eliminations, and as a necessary consequence, in course of time, new cohesions of social ideals and habits. It goes without saying that art of every kind will be profoundly affected by the intellectual outcome of all these changes, and music, perhaps, more than the other arts. Upon the immediate consequences of the war to music it is hardly necessary to dwell. For purely economic reasons the whole business of music performing and music publishing is bound to suffer for years to come; and of course the better kinds of music will suffer most. The German publishers in particular will almost certainly be so hardly hit that they will be unwilling or unable to speculate in new music of the higher sort. If the war continues for a year or two, every musical undertaking that at the best of times has hard work to keep its finances on the right side will cut down all superfluous expenditure; one effect of which will be that composers must either abate the extravagance of their present demands for performing fees or do without performances. In England our concert life will suffer greatly, and our operatic life even more, for in the most prosperous days good opera in the provinces is a precarious business. But these and other economic results of the war are so obvious that it is superfluous to detail them. Nor need one say very much of the sentimental implications of the war. No class of people can regret it more than musicians. Of all arts music is the most cosmopolitan; the regular daily interchange not only of compositions but of performers has made Europe virtually a single country so far as the practice of music is concerned. Musicians may well doubt the sanity of a world in which Kreisler is in arms against Ysaye and Thibaud, in which it is the business of those of us here who owe some of the finest moments of our life to the great living German composers to do all we can to prevent their pouring out any more of their genius upon us. If, as some optimists imagine, this war means the end of the diplomats and the militarists, none will rejoice more sincerely than musicians. We, at any rate, believe as we may in the political necessity and inevitability of the war that has been forced upon us by a handful of men with whom none of us has any real concern, have no hatred for the great German race. 'How could I write songs of hate without hating?' said Goethe, when he was reproached with not having placed his muse at the service of the German patriotism of his day against the French, 'and how could I, to whom the only distinctions that matter are civilization and barbarism, hate a nation that is one of the most civilized on earth, a nation to which I owe so much of my own culture?' How, we musicians may ask, can we contemplate without alarm and regret a possible set-back to the culture that, be its faults what it may, has given us Wagner and Brahms and Strauss and Hugo Wolf?

In other fields than the political the war, if it be prolonged, will mean the drawing of a line across the ledger and the commencement of a new account. It is impossible for the Continent to pass through so great a strain as this without a setting free of great funds of dormant emotion, and a turning of old emotions into new channels. These tremendous crises always have a far-reaching nervous effect. Sensitive and delicately poised brains they may drive into a sort of insanity, as the troubles of his time drove Burke towards the end. These nerve-racked periods generate a nervous race. The bizzareries and morbidities of the French romantic movement were the direct outcome of the Napoleonic wars; how could these men have healthy minds and healthy bodies, conceived as they were, as De Musset said of his generation, between two battles? And we have only to read De Musset's 'Confession d'un Enfant du Siècle' to realise how inevitable were the cynicism and the materialism of the France of 1830 after the reaction that followed the fever of the Napoleonic epoch. We may depend upon it that this war will have its profound effects on the finer musical minds of the Continent. There will be new horizons to envisage, new hopes and fears and joys and despairs to be sung. Were we writing about the situation as if it were five hundred years behind us, and so a subject merely for unimpassioned scrutiny of forces and correlation of causes and effects, instead of something blindingly and terrifyingly near to us, we might perhaps say that some such war was necessary for the re-birth of music. For there is no denying that of late music has lacked truly commanding personalities and really vitalising forces. Now that Strauss has failed us there is no one of whom we can think as having the seeds of the future in him. German music as a whole has settled into a complacent tilling of an almost exhausted field: a few discontented spirits like Schönberg have aspirations towards something new and more personal, but without the capacity to realise them. The French are all small people,—very interesting, but indubitably small. Italian music is strangling in the grip of a commercial octopus. Russia is divided between men who see the wisdom of building upon the classical tradition but are not quite big enough to give the tradition an unmistakably new life, and men who reject the past before they are sure of the future, or even of the present. In England Elgar is still the one figure of impressive stature; the men who are almost contemporary with him are not fulfilling their early promise, while in the crowd of younger men it is impossible to distinguish one who has the least chance of making history. Never has there been an epoch of such general musical capacity, but great figures and great ideas are not so plentiful. It is hard to believe that out of the new order of things there will not be born the figures and the ideas we long for. German music will be rudely shaken out of its complacency; much of the present facile Teutonic music-making will be as impatiently thrust aside by the coming generation as the French school of pseudo-classical painting was thrust aside by Géricault, Delacroix, and their associates. They will say of a work like 'The legend of Joseph,' and the whole culture phase of which it is a symbol, what Stendhal said, in the name of the French youth of his day, of the poetry and prose of the 18th century—'It is like a clock that points to mid-day when it is four in the afternoon.' It will be interesting to watch the lines of development of German music during the next ten years. Will the older men such as Strauss find in this tremendous emotional shock the stimulus that their music has plainly been in need of for years if it was not to degenerate into mere Musikmacherei, or will some flaming new spirit be born out of the needs of the new time?

But there is one danger of which we must not lose sight,—the danger that a bad political settlement may keep the old national animosities alive till they once more find their inevitable outlet in war. French music is still suffering in all sorts of ways from 1870. It is so small because it is so bent on being exclusively French. By its refusal to fertilise itself with the great German tradition it deliberately cuts itself off from permanent spiritual elements in that tradition that would give it a wider range and a deeper humanity. The German tradition in its turn would be all the better for some cross-fertilisation from modern France; but again Chauvinism intervenes, and new harmonic possibilities are not developed as they might be because they are associated primarily with French music. It is just possible that each of the great nations, swollen with vanity or blindly nursing a grievance, may build round itself a wall more impassable than exists at present; and if that happens music will have to wait another twenty years for the new flight that we have all lately felt to be imminent. The day has gone by when one country can build up a school in ignorance or contempt of what is going on in other countries; it will reject a foreign culture at its peril. We can only hope that the result of the war will not be a perpetuation of old racial hatreds and distrusts, but a new sense of the emotional solidarity of mankind. From that sense alone can the real music of the future be born.

MUSIC AND WAR.

BY EDMONDSTOUNE DUNCAN.

Music—like a sword that has long been beaten into a ploughshare—is become an instrument of good husbandry, stirring the mind to fruitfulness and riches. She no longer deals in wounds and death, though there was a time when she could stir up battle and other mischief, as the Welsh Bard discovered to their cost. Some of the old heroic strains have been known so to inflame men's passions as to move them to draw a sudden sword and make indiscriminate war on their nearest neighbours. Happily the medium which awakened such extraordinary excitement contained also an allaying antidote. Thus if its fiery air was a sword, its peaceful notes were a buckler. In old battles, men would as lief have gone unarmed as without pipes, trumpets, drums, and flutes. Minstrelsy in such times played a triple rôle. It first fanned a martial flame. It was then in the van of the march to the field where it spurred the actual fight. And afterwards when the deed was done, it became song in the victors' mouths. The most civilized nations accepted music as the natural complement of action which it could stimulate or quench. The Greeks made it a part of their martial games and war dances. The Pyrrhic dance, which Plato praised as a harmless presentation of the strategy of war, demanded the best that music could furnish. So late as the second century Athenæus speaks of this martial exercise requiring all 'the most beautiful airs.' The Romans practised a similar war-dance, and added to it one of their own, which commemorated the Rape of the Sabine women.

The secret of the matter lies in the historical fact that all ancient civilizations made music and dancing an important part of their ceremonial religion. Nothing was done without them. The Bards and Hymnners of Druidical creation may be cited as a case in point. The Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans carried on the custom until it became absorbed and annihilated by the Christian Church. Both arts were reluctantly admitted by the early Christians; and while dancing became detached and discredited, music gained a new impetus, and eventually grew to finer issues.

The Scalds, soldier-minstrels of the 10th or 11th century, went singing into battle. They were also the historians of their day, since they chanted the feats of arms they witnessed. Cnut brought many such minstrels in his train; and the early part of the 11th century witnessed the mingling of native and Scaldic melody. Troubadours and Minnesingers formed more civilized classes of minstrel, and though they joined in wars and crusades, theirs was a nobler and more ideal service. Relics of all these mediæval movements are found scattered in the French and German Histories of Music, and to a smaller extent, in our own. They are now as the crumbling churchyard memorial to the teeming life around it.

The early battles all had their songs—if we could but recall them. But tradition and printing, between them, squandered many a rich treasure, which either, alone, might have secured; for printing scared away tradition before making sure of her booty and war which provoked so much melody afterwards not uncommonly ate up her own brood. The Wars of the Roses, for example, besides destroying whole libraries, almost totally effaced old John Dunstable. The Thirty-Years' War, it is said, put a period to German folk-song.

Dunstable, in all likelihood, wrote the famous Agincourt song which is preserved in a fine 15th-century MS. of Trinity College, Cambridge. The song is remarkable in that it was suppressed. The field had been so dearly won that the vision of blood left even the victors mute. Shakespeare has immortalised the incident.

Mediæval music has gone by the board; and few of the European national or the patriotic anthems can now boast any real antiquity.

'God save the King' dates from 1619, being the work of Dr. John Bull. Its first form had more musical interest than has that we now employ—in spite of Beethoven's eulogy and the set of uninteresting variations:

From an early 17th century MS.

Arne's 'Rule, Britannia,' an Accession ode of 1740, in the first phrase of which Wagner pretended to read the whole English character, is more worthy of being considered a great representative song, though its roulades, high pitch, and blustering verse militate against its final permanency. Handel's fine stroke of humour in linking its chief phrase with thoughts of peace (in the 'Occasional Oratorio') has become inseparable from the song's history.

Our most jolly strain is that which Boyce wedded to Garrick's neat verse, 'Come cheer up, my lads, 'tis to glory we steer,' which, like the last piece, is pitched too high for the multitude, and has topical allusions to the year 1759—truly a 'wonderful year'—making it out of date in 1914. Quebec was of that year; and although, as Johnson observed, seldom is it that any splendid story is wholly true, General Wolfe is said to have composed it on the eve of the famous siege. In all likelihood he sang it then, for a certain inconvenient record of thirty years earlier announced its performance at the Haymarket.

Here is a stanza, the air to which is no less brave:

Why, soldiers, why
Should we be melancholy, boys?
Why, soldiers, why?
Whose bus'ness 'tis to die?
What! sighing? fie!
Damn fear, drink on, be jolly, boys!
'Tis he, you and I,
Cold, hot, wet or dry,
We're always bound to follow, boys,
And scorn to fly.

The reason the song has dropped out appears in the sixth verse with its vinous allusion.

Some of the little songs which flashed into sudden prominence with a political cause, and died down when that failed or was fulfilled, still figure in our musical anthologies. Of this class are the Stuart songs, for and against the royal house—for the King and against the Pretender. 'Lilliburlero,' a smart quickstep by Purcell, weighted with a meaningless jargon for text, has dropped out of fashion. In 1688, it was known to have contributed not a little to the Revolution. 'When the King enjoys his own again,' which is English, Welsh, or 16th-century Dutch—as you please, whatever its nationality, worked such wonders that Ritson declared that nothing fed the enthusiasm of Jacobites down to his day in every corner of Great Britain more than that same song. Over the Border, our Scottish friends' enthusiasm crystallised into such spontaneous melody as 'Over the water to Charlie,' and the fine strapping air of 'Charlie is my Darling.'

The French, on the whole, have the biggest variety of war music. Their national airs are altogether more imaginative than those of any other country in the world. What can compare with 'La Marseillaise,' which Rouget de Lisle composed in 1792? 'Partant pour la Syrie,' Queen Hortense's fragrant romance, followed a few years later. 'La Carmagnole,' one of the choicest airs imaginable, was born of the Great Terror! But whether in fire or slaughter, or under the shadow of the guillotine, our gallant neighbours could always muster a brave song. Just as night leaves behind it the gottymar or 'morning gossamer,' so black events sometimes bequeath occasional lyric pearls beyond price to succeeding ages.

No one has a quarrel with the Germany of Beethoven. Her national songs are wholesome and vigorous, without the precious beauty of melody which belongs to Gallic art. 'Die Wacht am Rhein' grew into favour during the war of 1870. The chorale (probably Crüger's) 'Nun danket alle Gott' and Luther's version of Psalm xlii, 'Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott,' much sung during the Thirty-Years' War, are also of national significance. The Battle-prayer of Himmel, to verse from 'Leyer und Schwert,' by Körner, the soldier-poet, and other settings (from the same work) share in the country's war music.

Austria has Haydn's great hymn 'Gott erhalte,' which was founded on the Croatian folk-air, 'Stal se jesem.'

The Russians commissioned a patriotic air, though they had a thousand years of song to draw upon. Thus Lvov, in 1833, composed the gentle but rather colourless Russian national hymn, to which Chorley fitted the words 'God the All-terrible.'

War rarely or never springs from the people; courts and emperors, officers and diplomats pull the strings which arouse implacable Mars. Hence it is that most martial music has its origin in anything or anybody, rather than the very folk whom it plunges into deadly strife. Napoleon, terror of European armies, was the bogey of nursemaids and children. 'If you're not good, Boney shall have you' soon quietened a naughty child. Did they lag, 'Boney's coming!' quickened the reluctant steps. Such things were in the vulgar mouth. And the songs, apart from their music, were little more sensible. Below I give an example of one that traversed England, creeping into the Folk-song Journal, among other places. But the tune, as may be guessed from its superb melodic lines and breezy rhythm, is indisputably Irish. Our version is from the 'Feis Ceoil,' whose rare little first publication (of the present year) contains it.

There were many such airs. Here are a few titles

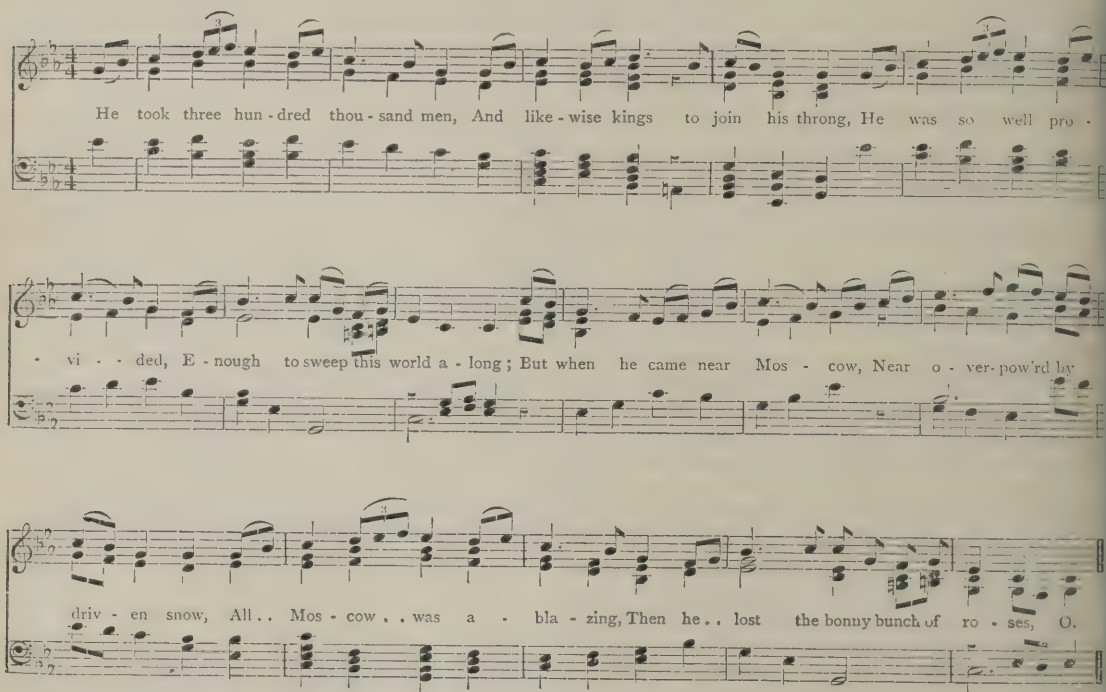

- 'Boney's lamentation.'
- 'The Island of St. Helena.'
- 'The deeds of Napoleon.'
- 'Grand conversation on Napoleon.'
- 'Napoleon's farewell to Paris.'

And this is a fair sample of their doggere contents :

Though so bravely he fought, he at Waterloo was bought,
He was took to St. Helena, where he pin'd away and died,
Long time he there did lay, till Soult did come this way,
To beg the bones of Bonaparte ! the Frenchman's pride.

"LITTLE BENCH OF RUSHES."

(The bonny bunch of Roses, O !)

He took three hun-dred thou-sand men, And like-wise kings to join his throng, He was so well pro-

- vi-ded, E-nough to sweep this world a-long; But when he came near Mos-cow, Near o-ver-pow'rd by driv-en snow, All.. Mos-cow.. was a-bla-zing, Then he.. lost the bonny bunch of ro-ses, O.

No tune just now can be more pleasing to a French or English ear than the sprightly Belgian national song, 'La Brabançonne.' It is one of the many ballads which sprang up in the very heat of battle. Its author, Jenneval, was killed during the progress of the revolution. The composer was François van Campenhout, a Brussels tenor singer and maker of operas. The merits of the piece appear in its joyous snatch of melody and pleasing rhythmic resource. Its weakness is a certain harmonic poverty, which three chords seem intended to compass. The song dates from the Belgian independence of 1830.*

Liège, so much in the public mind just now, has been a former centre of music and learning.

* An arrangement for S.A.T.B. and a unison edition with an English translation have just been published by Messrs. Novello & Co.

Here Charlemagne was born. In the same district the famous school of Dufay and Binchois made history. From no other place came César Franck and Ysaye.

War music will probably never again lift its boastful head in actual fight. She will pass, with gay plumage and scarlet coats, into the limbo of the impracticable. War nowadays crawls on hands and knees in the colour of inanimate things with no light or sound. It is no longer the place for music. Hers the rôle to refresh and invigorate—to nerve man to fight the real battle of life—to provide him with fresh visions of eternal beauty: things which Bach and Beethoven do better than all the battle-hymns and patriotic songs in the world.

Occasional Notes.

THE WAR AND MUSIC.

The immediate effect of the great war which is now raging in Europe is disastrous to all who depend for subsistence upon musical doings in all their manifold ramifications. It is not only that the sudden and alarming restriction of means on the part of practically every section of the community forces even hitherto well-to-do people to question expenditure, but that the intense obsession of the mind in following the evolution of stupendous events produces a sort of stupor and a feeling that the ordinary concerns of individual life are jejune and insignificant. This psychologic condition is one to which music or any other art does not readily minister. But we believe it is hardly likely that such aloofness will continue for very long. The craving for music is a wholesome distraction and a solace will gradually assert itself. Symptoms of a true perspective of social and individual needs and of a buoyant and confident feeling born of the belief in our national security are not lacking. The success that has so far attended the Queen's Hall Promenade Concerts is one of the most encouraging signs of the times. The directors of this generous scheme have earned the thanks of the community for the courage and faith they have shown. Let us hope that their brilliant example will be followed in as far as it is possible throughout the country.

But while we trust that the general musical outlook will gradually improve, we fear that for some time to come concert-performers and music teachers will suffer. The public cannot be asked to continue to support these workers on anything like charitable grounds. The only hope of real value is that both performers and teachers will receive at least a share of attention because they fulfil educational and creative needs. Concert-performers are likely to be placed in a position of special difficulty. On the one hand they will be told that the public does not want them, and on the other hand they will be besought to give their invaluable services in order to raise funds for the support of others. There are always a number of people who at these emergencies generously interest themselves in organizing concerts for charitable purposes. On the principle that charity begins at home, we suggest that the situation demands that the artists, high and low, who make these concerts possible, should have at least a moiety of the receipts.

The Musical Festivals that were to have been held this autumn at Worcester, Sheffield, Norwich, and Bangor (the National Eisteddfod), have been indefinitely postponed. Cardiff had not announced a decision up to the time of our going to press.

It is announced that the Committee appointed by the College of Wales, AND FRENCH Aberystwyth, to report on the offer of MUSIC—£3,000 a year that has been made for the purpose of founding a school of TEACHERS. instrumental and vocal music at the College, has recommended that the offer be accepted. The scheme contemplates the engagement of teachers from the Schola Cantorum, Paris, an institution with which M. Vincent d'Indy is associated. The names of M. Gaston Le Fevre (as principal), of Paris, M. Henri Delange (of Brussels and Paris), and M. Charles Turbour and M. Camille Delobelle, of the Schola Cantorum, are mentioned. Some reasoned justification for this clean cut of all British influence is surely called for.

The Canadian Journal of Music CHORAL MUSIC (Toronto) is a newcomer in musical IN journalism. If we may judge its CANADA. prospects by the contents of the second number (June, 1914) and the programme outlined for future issues the venture should prove to be a welcome force in the cause of music in the great Dominion. It is well printed, the articles are well written and interesting, and, following the fashion of the United States musical journals, they are adorned with numerous portraits. We feel most interest in the special article on choral music in Canada, which surveys the recent and future schemes of choral Societies in Ontario, Quebec, the Maritime Provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia. Naturally, the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir, conducted by Dr. Vogt, figures largely as the most important organization of its kind in Canada, and the exploits and intentions of the National Chorus of Toronto, under Dr. Ham, are duly recorded. These choirs we all know, but what is peculiarly gratifying is the revelation of activity going on in remote districts of the country and the character of the music selected for performance. The Journal comments as follows:

Mere statistics, of course, are of little value in estimating artistic conditions. But choral music, above all other musical forms, is for the general—is democratic. There can, perhaps, be too many choirs and too many conductors: there cannot be too many chorists, too many auditors, too much support. To bear bloom in the finer, more individual branches of the art, the musical life of a people must have its roots in the firm soil of a wide popular interest in some collective and not difficult musical activity. For this, choral singing has the great advantage of providing an endeavour in which large numbers can contribute their simple, neighbourly parts toward the creation of a beautiful whole. And, sooner or later, the chorus demands skilled direction, an orchestra, new literature, original composition. Viewed in this light, the following totals are impressive assurances of Canada's ultimate individuality in music.

We have mentioned seventy-eight choirs, excluding church choirs (which would frequently duplicate secular Societies), but including a few glee clubs and children's choirs. We have noted more than fifty choral conductors, six festivals for this year, seven good orchestras. Two choirs have visited the United States, one almost annually; a choir goes to the British Isles this year; a choir tours the Isles and Continent next year. Our most conservative estimate of the number of Canadians now active in secular choirs would reach close to 8,000. Of significant works performed we have more often had occasion to cite the moderns than the classics.

There are evident reasons for this wide choral interest in Canada. The British tradition, religious needs, in many new districts the absence of equipment for other musical forms, and (for the New World) a comparatively homogeneous population which encourages banding together, in contrast with the transplanted foreign colonies to which the United States owes its rather clannish choral societies—all these have contributed. But beneath them all is somehow a native musical spirit which demands choral expression. When the expression shall have achieved original composition of high merit, we shall be able to bandy 'nationalism' and 'choral school' with the best.

In drawing attention to Canadian musical journalism it must be noted that another Toronto journal, Musical Canada, has been established for some years, and has reached its ninth volume. The number (August) before us has some attractive matter bearing chiefly on musical doings elsewhere than in the Dominion. This outlook may at least be claimed to escape insularity.

CHARLES DIBDIN.

BORN MARCH 13, 1745. DIED JULY 25, 1814.

Although only a few of Dibdin's 1,500 printed songs and none of his numerous entertainment items now survive, the centenary of his death deserves some notice. In his generation and for a considerable time afterwards Dibdin's songs were undoubtedly a salutary and patriotic influence. It was said that the songs brought more men into the Navy than the press-gangs did.

In the preface to his edition of selected songs by Dibdin* the late Dr. W. A. Barrett says:

No collection of English songs, worthy of the title, would be complete without a few examples of the genius of Charles Dibdin. Many of his compositions have won their way into the hearts of the people, and may be fairly quoted as national. The particulars of his life have been frequently told, and it is therefore needless to recapitulate them here. It is sufficient to say that he was born at Southampton on March 13, 1745. He was the eighteenth child of his father. His elder brother Thomas, a sea captain, was the original 'Poor Tom' of the 'Sailor's Epitaph.' Of the rest of the family little is known that is interesting. Young Charles Dibdin was a chorister in Winchester Cathedral, and studied music under Peter Fussell, the deputy of James Kent, organist of the Cathedral. Some of Kent's anthems, with treble solo parts, were written for young Dibdin. By his own account he learnt little from either of these musicians, and owed all his musical knowledge to himself. The absence of scientific knowledge in the construction of melody is apparent to every musician who has studied Dibdin's songs. His airs are very original, but the difficulty of harmonizing them properly was never solved by the composer himself, for many of his own arrangements lack the continuity and polish which are found in the works of trained writers. It is chiefly for the wealth of poetic sentiment which his songs contain that they have fastened themselves upon the sympathies of the people. This quality made his sea-songs—though he was never a sailor himself—so great a power in maintaining the prestige of the English Navy, and has invested his name with the nobility of gratitude as great and as honourable as a ducal patent. His life was a continuous struggle with straitened means. His genius was many-sided. He made so great a success as an actor in the part of Ralph in Bickerstaffe's 'Maid of the mill' that 'Ralph' handkerchiefs were woven and sold in his honour. He invented the plan of giving monologue entertainments, and wrote a large number of pieces for these purposes. He was the author of over seventy operatic pieces, produced at various theatres between the years 1762 and 1811, and about thirty-five entertainments in which he was the sole performer. He wrote the words and composed the music for more than a thousand songs, besides supplying words for other composers. His ideas were new and fresh, and have formed a mine which has furnished material for much 'original' work done by later authors. He died at Camden Town on July 25, 1814, and was buried in the graveyard in Pratt Street, where a monument covers his remains.

The particulars of his career have been told by himself in his 'Professional Life,' four vols., 1803; by George Hogarth in a Preface to a collection of the words of his many songs and a selection of his music, 1842; and by the editor of the present work, in the Musical Times for 1886, and by his great-grandson, James C. Dibdin, in a series of articles in the Scottish Art Review.

For fuller information as to Dibdin's life and works we must refer readers to the article alluded to above which appeared in our issue for February, 1886. The following is an extract:

The extended compass of many of the songs is due to the peculiar method with which it was the custom to sing them. The popular form of voice in Dibdin's day was the baritone, with a superstructure of falsetto. Dibdin's own voice was of this character.

Unlike many of the singers of his time, he gave his song without elaborate vocal ornamentation, but with taste and simple expression. He accompanied himself 'with facility and neatness.' In his entertainments he employed an instrument 'combining the properties of the pianoforte and the chamber organ, and so constructed that the performer could produce the tones of either instrument separately, or of both in combination. To this instrument were attached a set of bells, a side-drum, a tambourine, and a gong, which he could bring into play by various mechanical contrivances so as to give a pleasing variety to his accompaniments.'

There is one fact concerning Dibdin as an accompanist which is of interest to the musical student. He was the first who played upon the pianoforte in public. On May 10, 1767, at the Theatre Royal, in Covent Garden, 'The Beggar's Opera' was played for the benefit of Miss Brickler. A copy of the playbill, in the possession of Messrs Broadwood & Sons, informs us at the 'end of Act I. Miss Brickler will sing a favourite song from "Judith," accompanied by Mr. Dibdin, on a new instrument, called Piano-forte.'

Dibdin desired to pose as a scientific musician, but he did not possess the necessary qualifications. He published a superficial text-book in rhyme, called 'The Harmonical Preceptor,' and two other books of instruction 'The Musical Mentor,' and 'Music Epitomised,' which are valuable as curiosities connected with him, but for nothing more. He wrote a 'History of the Stage,' in five volumes, and published his 'Professional Life' in 1803, in four volumes. The first shows little research, and the second, fecundity of imagination almost as great as is exhibited in his songs.

His songs will keep his name alive so long as the English language is spoken. They are manly and healthy, their diction is eloquent; their music lends charm to their eloquence, and enforces the emphasis of their meaning. There is nothing mean or vicious in their simple imagery, even if their mode of utterance is cast in common and unpretentious language. Therefore, as long as men have hearts to feel and minds to appreciate, the lyrics of Charles Dibdin will never lose their hold upon the sympathies and affections of Englishmen.

If the distinctions given for valuable services to the country were in all cases impartially distributed according to merit and ability, the name of Dibdin would be inscribed among those whom the nation delighted to honour by title and rewards. If he had been a foreigner, 'fair statue would be gracing' each place associated with his name and artistic career. As he was only an Englishman, his tombstone bears a half-obliterated inscription*; and the 'national monument' is a simple bust, procured by subscription and placed in an out-of-the-way corner in Greenwich Hospital. There is a portrait of him in the National Portrait Gallery, but beyond these memorials there is nothing to show that the genius of Dibdin has ever received due recognition from his countrymen.

CHOPIN AS A MASTER OF FORM.

BY A. REDGRAVE CRIPPS.

CHOPIN'S WORK IN THE LARGER FORMS.

So far, however, it may be said that we have done but little towards the establishment of our main point,—since hitherto we have spoken only of Chopin's smaller forms, and his superiority here is in no way questioned. On the contrary, it is rather loudly asserted; for it is part of the orthodox view that Chopin's supposed helplessness in the larger forms is thrown into the stronger relief by contrast with his absolute perfection in the smaller. Thus Dr. Hadow, from whom we have already quoted writes:

* Twenty-one songs by Charles Dibdin. Edited by W. A. Barrett. One shilling and sixpence. (Novello & Co., Ltd.)

* Since this was written the monument has been repaired.

His limitations are plain and unmistakable. For the larger types of art, for the broad architectonic laws of structure on which they are based, he exhibits almost total disregard. His works in 'sonata-form,' and the forms cognate to the sonata, are, with no exception, the failures of a genius which has already overstepped its bounds.

And again (dealing here, however, more particularly with the question of Chopin's nationality as shown in his choice of keys), he says :

Not only in his efforts at sonata-form does he show himself unable to hold together a complex scheme of keys, but in works of a more loose structure his choice seems to be regulated rather by hazard than by any preconceived plans. . . . He allows his modulations to wander where they will, and is so intent on perfecting each phrase and each melody, that he has no regard left to bestow on the general principles of construction.

How far this can be maintained we shall see in a moment. For the present it may be remarked that so long as Chopin's perfection in the smaller forms is attributed merely to a 'felicitous phraseology,' instead of an exquisitely delicate sense of design, this contrast may be said to be almost inevitable. As a matter of fact, however, Chopin's works cannot thus be divided into two classes,—the smaller pieces in which he succeeded and the larger in which he failed. Precisely the same principles of construction which he makes use of in his smaller pieces are exhibited also in the larger ; with the only difference that it is in the larger pieces that they find their fullest application, and at his absolute mastery, therefore, is the most triumphantly displayed. It is because of this uniformity of method, this essential similarity of type, that we have approached the larger pieces through the smaller.

'FORM' NOT NECESSARILY 'SONATA-FORM.'

It may be admitted at once that so far as Dr.adow's charge has reference only to Chopin's actual attempt in the sonata-form, it is not without a certain force. Chopin's two (mature) sonatas are not really very any means so weak as they are generally supposed to be ; but they do not show his genius at its best. It is obvious that the sonata-form was uncongenial to him ; probably he looked upon it as a framework to be filled up, and felt hampered and uncomfortable accordingly. But to identify the notion of any particular 'form' such as 'sonata-form' with the notion of 'form' in general is surely unjustifiable.

ESSENTIAL FACTORS IN 'FORM.'

What, after all, does 'form,' in the largest sense, imply? Is it not simply this,—that the various elements of which music is made up are so adjusted to each other, and compounded together, as to produce an effect which, to the hearer, is complete and satisfactory? Let us look a little more closely into this. If we inquire what are the chief elements that enter into 'form,' we find that in the last resort they can all be reduced to two : variety of thematic material, and variety of key. As regards the former it is obvious that, in a piece of any length at all, one theme or idea cannot go on for ever ; sooner or later the hearer will get tired of it and crave for something fresh ; and inasmuch as a mere succession of different ideas would be equally unsatisfactory in another way (in producing merely a feeling of confusion and irritability), the mere introduction of some such contrasting idea almost implies that the first idea shall be heard again. The problem of the form then, on this side, is obviously to introduce each new theme or thematic repetition at exactly the right moment, i.e., at the moment that the hearer expects it. But just as the continuance of one theme would in time become intolerable, so would the continuance of one key. Here, then, we have a double problem : and it is in the way that these two claims—the claim of theme-change and of key-change—are met so that each is satisfied and yet neither independently of the other, but only as it were as part of it, that the highest mastery of form is shown. The sonata-form, no doubt, shows one way in which the problem may be solved, but there is no reason to suppose that is the only possible way. And suitable as it has proved for ideas of a certain type, it is quite possible that ideas of another type may demand a different solution altogether.

ANALYSIS OF CHOPIN'S BALLADE IN A \flat .

Bearing this in mind, let us examine one of Chopin's larger pieces somewhat in detail. The Ballade in A \flat may be taken ; and as the most simple way of showing the succession and relation of themes and keys, it may be well, first of all (even at the risk of appearing pedantic), to draw out a scheme of the whole piece, using the symbols already employed (A, B, &c.) to denote the form :

	Bars.
1—51	(1—25)	A	$\{a$ (A \flat).
	(25—37)		$\{a^1$ (modulating).
	(37—51)		$\{a$ (A \flat).
52—115	(53—65)	B	$\{b$ (F major).
	(65—103)		$\{b^1$ (F minor).
	(103—115)		$\{b$ (F major).
116—135		C	(begins A \flat : modulating).
136—143			Connecting passage, founded partly on phrase from b .
143—182	(143—156)	B	$\{b$ (D \flat).
	(156—182)		$\{b^1$ (C \sharp (D \flat) minor).
	182—211		Connecting passage, b and a worked together.
212—229		A	(A \flat mostly).
230—233		C	(A \flat).
234—238			Phrase from a^1 (A \flat).
238—240			Conclusion.

What is the ordinary academic musician to make of this? There is indeed a suggestion of the so-called 'rondo' form in the way the theme we have marked b recurs, and it is quite possible that anyone with sufficient ingenuity might make out some resemblance to some other 'forms.' But all this, we instinctively feel, is beside the point. The justification for the piece on artistic grounds, lies, not in the fact that it can be twisted into some apparent conformity with the regular forms, but in itself—in its effect on the hearer. It 'comes off' in the best sense of the words—in the same sense that Beethoven's finest sonatas 'come off.' To show this in any real sense on paper is of course impossible ; but at least it may be useful to indicate, in some rough way, how the fundamental necessities of form, just spoken of, are met. The first section, which we have called A, is in no sense complete in itself. It consists of three sub-sections (a , a^1 , and a), of which the third is a repetition, with some extension, of the first. Nevertheless the total effect is distinctly introductory ; it leaves a sense of expectancy of something to follow. That something is supplied by b , which, though very definite in character, is purposely somewhat indeterminate as regards key ; it may be said to alternate between F major and minor ; the effect on the hearer as a matter of fact being simply that of a passage over C felt as a dominant. The mind is thus irresistibly led on to the next section b^1 , where all doubt as to key is set at rest by the clear definition of F minor ; b^1 is developed at some little length in order to establish the key, and leads back to b, which, from its charm and assertiveness (as well as its brevity), the hearer naturally wishes to hear again. Then, just at the right moment, when we might be expected to have had enough of B, and the key (F major-minor) in which it is set, a new passage (which we have marked C) is introduced. This is sufficiently well marked in character to serve as a contrast to what has gone before, and is also very well knit together in itself. It enters in A^{b} major, and after passing rapidly through several related keys (by which means relief is given to the mind after the somewhat stationary character, tonally speaking, of the preceding section), settles down on E^{b}, felt as a dominant, whence a 'bridge-passage,' suggested by (or at least suggesting) a phrase from b leads back to b, which enters now a major third lower (on A^{b}). (As a very subtle point it is worth mentioning that here the bass note (A^{b}) is not felt, as C was before, as a dominant, but owing to the way in which the passage is approached, as a tonic.) To give further variety, b^{1} when it appears, though it is kept in the same key-relationship to b, is given a varied form. By this time b has already been heard three times, and a further repetition would probably be felt as just one too many; though therefore it is introduced again (as it is over B in the bass, by a slight change in the end of b^{1}), it enters not alone, but in conjunction with what at first appears a new phrase, but which really (as it slowly dawns on the hearer) is the first phrase of the introduction (or a, as we have labelled it). These two phrases are worked together over a bass which works up by steps from B to E^{b}, this gradual advance clearly subserving an emotional as well as a formal purpose. The effect on the hearer is as of a struggle between the two phrases b^{1} and a, the excitement rising all the time, until finally a emerges alone in its original key (A^{b}). It is slightly extended (to emphasise the key), and is followed by the opening phrase of the episodal section D. Then as a last touch we hear again two bars from a^{1} (bars 7 and 6 before close), and so the movement ends.

It is to be feared that this necessarily dry analysis can give but a faint idea of the extreme perfection of the movement. It is as perfect, in an entirely different way, as any movement of Beethoven. Not a single phrase is wasted: there is no padding, all is golden throughout. Every phrase comes in at exactly the right moment; every smallest change of tonality has its raison d'être. Most important of all, it must be particularly noticed that the extraordinary closeness or connectedness of the movement of which we have tried to convey some faint idea is the result of no mere mechanical dexterity or calculation, but arises inevitably from and reflects its emotional purpose.

MUSICAL NOTATION.

PRACTICAL WAYS OF EXPRESSING DETAILS OF MUSICAL COMPOSITION.

By H. ELLIOT BUTTON.

SECTION IV.—SLURS, EXPRESSION MARKS, AND DOUBLE BARS.

In adding slurs, make sure, firstly, that they are necessary, and secondly, that they are of exactly the required length. Remember that the engraver or compositor cannot be expected to guess where a slur is intended to begin and end, and much trouble and expense are saved if the composer's MS. is precise in this respect. Remember also that all passages otherwise marked will be sung or played legato.

Many of the phrasing slurs one sees in voice-pieces are unnecessary, because the average singer, singing in a language he understands, could not possibly phrase otherwise than as marked.

In the following examples the slurs serve no use purpose, and should therefore be omitted. See 'Preliminary hints' (p. 445): 'Use no unnecessary ambiguous signs':

"Tale of Old Japan." COLERIDGE-TAYLOR.

At the same time phrasing slurs may be most useful in making the composer's exact meaning quite clear where otherwise there might be obscurity.

In such passages as the following, for organ pianoforte:

the slurs to the inner parts are wholly unnecessary since they make the composer's intention no clearer but rather tend to confusion. How much simpler and more easily read is the same passage printed thus:

Notice also, that by making one slur serve to phrase all the parts, the difference between slurred and tied notes is more apparent. The following passages will make this plain:

If slurs are inserted to each part in the latter example, thus:

the passage is not so easily read, nor are the structural notes so readily distinguishable from the held notes.

NOVELLO'S PATRIOTIC PART-SONGS.

A CALL TO DUTY.

RISE ! for the day is passing,
And you lie dreaming on ;
The others have buckled their armour
And forth to the fight are gone ;
A place in the ranks awaits you,
Each man has some part to play ;
The past and the future are nothing,
In the face of the stern to-day.
Rise from your dreams of the future,
Of gaining some hard-fought field ;
Of storming some airy fortress,
Of bidding some giant yield ;

Your future has deed of glory,
Deed of honour (God grant it may !),
But your arm will never be stronger,
Or the need so great as to-day.
Rise ! for the day is passing ;
The sound that you scarcely hear
Is the enemy marching to battle—
Arise ! for the foe is here !
Stay not to sharpen your weapons,
Or the hour will strike at last,
When, from dreams of a coming battle,
You may wake,—to find it past !

These stirring words are to be set as a choral song (S.A.T.B.) by Sir Edward Elgar, and will be published shortly.

THE REVEILLE.

Words by BRET HARTE.

Set for Male Voices (T.T.B.B.) by EDWARD ELGAR.

HARK ! I hear the tramp of thousands,
And of armed men the hum ;
Lo ! a nation's hosts have gathered Round the quick alarming drum,— Saying, 'Come,
Freemen, come !

'But when won the coming battle,
What of profit springs therefrom ?
What if conquest, subjugation,
Even greater ills become ?'

But the drum
Answered, 'Come !

Ere your heritage be wasted,' said the quick alarming drum.

You must do the sum to prove it,' said the fateful answering drum.

'Let me of my heart take counsel :
War is not of life the sum ;
Who shall stay and reap the harvest
When the autumn days shall come ?'
But the drum
Echoed, 'Come !

'What if 'mid the cannon's thunder,
Whistling shot and bursting bomb,
When my brothers fall around me,
Should my heart grow cold and numb ?'
But the drum
Answered, 'Come !

Death shall reap the braver harvest,' said the solemn-sounding drum.

Better there in death united, than in life a recreant,— Come !

Thus they answered,—hoping, fearing,
Some in faith, and doubting some,
Till a trumpet-voice proclaiming,
Said, 'My chosen people, come !'
Then the drum,
Lo ! was dumb,

For the great heart of the nation, throbbing, answered, 'Lord, we come !'

THE COMRADES' SONG OF HOPE.

Words by J. S. STALLYBRASS.

Music by ADOLPHE ADAM.

HARK ! what strains of solemn gladness
Are heard filling the air !
Sweet as hope that dawns on sadness,
The gloom of doubt dispelling,
A joyful day foretelling,
To follow the night of despair.

Falsehood and malice may assail you,
And hell dismay ;
He that is mighty will not fail you,
He will be your stay.

Men that toil in the battle of life,
List to strains that will sweeten the strife !
The righteous cause alone is glorious,
And wins the fight.
The friends of truth shall be victorious,
For truth is might !

When the kindly country that bore you,
When broad mankind your valour needs ;
When the good and great before you
Look down to mark your noble deeds ;

For the love of fatherland and freedom,
For truth and right stand in the van !
Fling wealth and pomp to those who need them,
Be staunch and bold, and play the man !

Truth your standard, holy your cause,
Be faithful to death for your freedom and laws ;
Your cause is right, and right is might,
Then play the man, and win the fight !

COMPETITION FESTIVALS AND THE WAR.

There can be no doubt that the preoccupation of the public mind with the progress of the great war, the depletion of the male singers in choirs, and the prospect of a lack of public support, are reacting seriously on the Competition Movement. It is too early yet definitely to decide what should be done with regard to the numerous 1915 Festivals already fixed. We can only buoy ourselves up with the hope that before that time arrives the British Nation and her Allies will have triumphed in their righteous cause. Meantime we must steel ourselves to carry on our grim task.

The Royal National Eisteddfod, which was to have been held at Bangor in September, has been postponed until 1915.

THE ASSOCIATION OF MUSICAL COMPETITION FESTIVALS.

In our last issue we gave a brief report of the proceedings at the Annual Conference of this Association, which was held on June 27 (the date was not given in our report). The papers read by Mr. Graves and Mr. Kennedy Scott on that occasion are now given.

THE CHOICE OF MUSIC.

By Mr. C. L. GRAVES.

Mr. Graves said that his experience, although limited, had led him to form strong views. The element of novelty in the choice of music was eminently desirable, but there was a danger of advanced classes in the chief competitions being converted into a school of gymnastics rather than a means of promoting the higher artistic interpretation. He had consulted one of the most successful choir-trainers in the kingdom, who told him that composers should not be encouraged to write music with the set purpose of severely puzzling singers, and leaving them with no reward for their labour. 'Freak' pieces tended to spoil the voices, ears, enthusiasm, and confidence of singers. But this trainer went on to say that there was no inherent vice in difficulty, and that in fact one of the greatest pleasures derived from choir training was in the mastery of difficult music. Mr. Ernest Newman said recently that 'Hardly without exception the composers who write specifically for the competition Festivals have degenerated into mere traders supplying a market.*

The other matter on which he wished to comment was the over-hasty 'scrapping' of pieces simply because they had been performed before, irrespective of their intrinsic merits. No doubt there was the consideration that repetition may give an old choir an advantage over a new one. This might be met by imposing a time limit of two or three years upon repeated pieces. He again quoted Mr. Newman as saying that 'in the almost complete absence of really good modern choral music on a small scale, we shall have to rely more and more on the giants of the past. There are, for example, the "Fest- und Gedenksprüche" of Brahms that have never been heard at Birmingham, and there are other motets of his with which Festival competitions and conductors should be made familiar as soon as possible.' He (Mr. Graves) dissented strongly from the wholesale condemnation of modern choral music on a small scale, but he entirely applauded the recommendation of the motets and the glorious 'Fest- und Gedenksprüche,' which had the special recommendation in his eyes of having been abused by Mr. Bernard Shaw.

* It would be fair to add that in the notice quoted by Mr. Graves, Mr. Newman went on to say that 'Elgar's new part-songs, published recently, show that he at any rate has not been dragged down with the rest. They are eloquent personal expressions, and though they make excellent competition pieces they have none of the vices of the average English work written with that object in view. But Elgar does not write a part-song until he has something in him that really must be said.' The choral songs here referred to are 'The Shower,' 'The Fountain,' 'Death on the hills,' 'Love's tempest,' and 'Serenade.'—Ed., C.F.R.

THE OLD FESTIVALS AND THE NEW.

He said his point of view was that of an old fogey who had derived great profit and pleasure from the old régime and yet was immensely impressed by the possibilities and the vitality of the new. At the older Festivals, owing to the engagement of a full professional orchestra and 'star' soloists only the well-to-do could afford to subscribe, yet on this basis heavy losses were incurred. When we turned to competitive Festivals we found their general policy included social reform and recreation. The organization was democratic in the best sense of the word, and it tended to promote the fusion and not the antagonism of classes. But to the non-performer there were drawbacks—monotony of the repetition of pieces, absence of 'stars,' and of orchestral music. These things weighed against the coalition of the two systems. The point of contact was in the combined work of the choirs and the growth of local orchestras. The difficulty was to induce competitive choirs to pay as much attention to the preparation of the music chosen for combined work as for the test-pieces. The trainer from whom he had already quoted said, in reference to the performance of the 'Gloria' from Bach's B minor Mass, at the last Morecambe Festival, 'I would rather have made that night's performance a success than have won all the shields in England.' That was the true spirit. At Birmingham (the Midland Festival) recently the crowning feature and climax of the Festival was the performance of Bach's unaccompanied Motet for double choirs, 'Singet dem Herrn' ('Sing ye to the Lord').†

Mr. Newman (who was not easily pleased) said 'that not only did it almost drive out the memory of everything else, but it made the subsequent applause, that would have been deafening under ordinary circumstances, seem curiously shadowy and remote.' It was dangerous to prophesy, but he would not be surprised if the problem were solved by a compromise in which the two Festival systems were merged, the tests being retained and more importance being given to the combined work. As for orchestral music, it would take a long time before amateur bands could grapple with the intricacies of modern transcendental music.

In the short discussion that followed, Dr. McNAUGHT said he hoped that the impression would not go abroad that the imposition of difficult tests was general. Of course, such tests were given in the most advanced classes, and were heard perhaps eight or ten times. But it must be remembered that they were only one or two amongst fifty or sixty pieces. Then certainly most of the tests that excited criticism were not written to order. Strauss, Max Reger, Debussy, Delius, not to mention certain English composers, had provided choral music that presented extraordinary technical problems, and Festival committees should not be severely blamed if they said, 'These world-famous composers have written this music; surely English choirs of all choirs should be able to interpret it.' At the same time he agreed that some of the tests admitted in order to give a chance to the comparatively unknown British composers had too often presented only difficulty and no interest. As to the repetition of pieces, there were difficulties, and there was the danger of endless repetition which was exemplified by the Welsh Eisteddfodau, where the same pieces were used year after year for a generation. Mr. Graves's suggestion of a time-limit might meet the case.

* Three eight-part choruses dedicated to the Burgomaster in Brahms's native city, Hamburg. One was a test at Blackpool in 1907.—Ed., C.F.R.

† The whole Motet was the test-piece in the chief choral class. The seven best-known prize choirs from various parts of the country were massed after being individually tested. Many musicians in the audience stated that the performance was one of the most memorable musical experiences of their lives.

MR. PLUNKET GREENE opened the discussion by saying that, in his opinion, the whole question of the choice of music was of great importance. Some of the older Festivals were in a precarious state, and it was possible the competition movement could fill the gap.

MR. DANKS said he was on the committees of two competition Festivals and one of the older Festivals. Something would have to be done with the older Festivals if they were to continue; we owed them a deep debt of gratitude. The committee of a competition Festival came into touch with a large body of musicians, quite apart from those who formed the orchestra and choir of the older Festivals, and by uniting with the older Festivals they might assist them.

LADY WINEFRIDE ELWES said that in Lincolnshire some years ago some of the best of the choirs in a competition Festival were asked to take part in the Lincoln Cathedral Festival.

MR. DUNHILL said he had never heard of a British composer who set out to make phenomenal difficulties, but composers wrote in a different idiom from that of fifteen or twenty years ago. Music had advanced in technique more than in any other way, and should not be described as 'freak' music because it was of our generation. The standard of technical difficulty had been raised, and if competition Festivals were to be of use their choirs should be trained to sing some of the more modern works; though, he would add, simpler music was often a greater test.

MR. PLUNKET GREENE said he greatly objected to the excessive use of expression marks. Schubert wrote practically all his songs without expression marks. His personal feeling was to let expression marks go into the fire and to interpret in your own way.

HINTS TO CONDUCTORS.

BY MR. KENNEDY SCOTT.

Though later on I shall hope to illustrate one or two technical points about conducting, I feel that I may do well to preface them by a few general principles. It is important to know how to conduct, to know how best to use the body that it may express the spirit that should pass into whatever performance we are undertaking; but it is still more important to realise what is required before conducting will be of value at all.

THE NEED FOR SELF-EXPRESSION.

All art is the interpretation of life through the medium of an individual. The painter sees some natural scene or object before him and he records his emotion towards it in terms of colour. The composer records his emotions towards some aspect of his own or external life in terms of sound. The interpretative artist, though he does not originate the ideas which he interprets, nevertheless displays his emotions towards them in a distinctly original way. He does not reproduce; he recreates.

Nature never repeats herself; art likewise abhors imitation. For certain purposes reproduction may be good, but such a process cannot concern the artist. What we want from him is his view of life, his reaction towards situations and ideas; and this can never be the same as another's if it is sincerely his. As conductors, therefore, we must bring original feeling to our work, or it will be of little account.

But though originality is to be desired we do not want it to run in channels foreign to those of common life; we do not want freaks. Differences between individuals there must be; but, paradoxical though it appear, it is similitude with his fellows that marks the great man. The great man is not he who differs most from others, but he who most resembles them. 'I am great,' says Whitman, 'I contain multitudes.' Therefore, although it is absolutely true to say that ideas can only be expressed through personality, even after this has been done we require to ask another question: 'How big is that personality, how much of human nature, of nature itself, does it include?'

Let us see a little more closely into that which as interpreters we are required to do. Let us ask ourselves what thought is, and what we mean by the understanding of thought.

A thought may be defined as a mental image of some feeling or emotion. It is always about something,—the objective of our thought; so that a living thought represents what Prof. James calls 'a thoroughgoing dualism.' Such current phrases as 'body and soul,' 'form and emotion,' give us the characteristics of all thought at the moment of its creation or recreation. Now when a thought is created it, so to speak, takes the place of the object of our feeling. In contemplating it we no longer feel towards the object which brought it into being, but towards the thought-form itself. The thought-form becomes the object, a new creation, and as such is external to us. But this thought-form is not thought itself, any more than a dead body represents a human being. Human feeling must suffuse the thought-form before it has any meaning whatsoever, and it is this meeting of the waters of subjective feeling and objective reality that constitutes what we term understanding. To understand a thing is to enter into emotional relationship with it.

But there are different kinds of understanding: there is the mere perception of externals, and there is sympathy with the inward life of things. In a sense, of course, both depend on feeling. We cannot say 'the sky is blue' without some feeling towards the sky; we have the intellectual satisfaction of discrimination as to place, colour, &c. But as yet it has not touched the deeper springs of our nature; it has not fused itself with our emotional life; we have not wondered at it, seen its beauty. So that I think we should be justified in saying that an artistic thought is some aspect of life or existence emotionally perceived; not merely perceived (which is science), but emotionally perceived (which is art). And hence we arrive at the mission of the artist, which, according to Ruskin, is to express clearly that which he feels deeply.

Now an artist may do this—he may make clear to us in statue, painting, poem, or music, that which he has felt deeply (which will be his thought); and in the case of statue or painting his emotion will be enshrined in it for all time or at least as long as his work lasts. But with poem or music we have forms of artistic expression which are of a momentary nature. Strictly speaking a poem or piece of music exists only at the moment of its utterance; for it is then alone that the conditions of thought are fulfilled that we have the manifestation of thought and feeling. We only know the poet's or composer's thought when he is presenting it to us himself in the living sound. He alone can tell us what he means. By a series of symbols the poet or composer can record his thought-form; but only in a very imperfect way his thought-emotion. And indeed we do not want it from him, because his thought-emotion can never be our thought-emotion; and unless we can supply it for ourselves we cannot be said to have a real understanding of the thought-form at all.

A thought-form is a universal thing. It is not the private possession of its originator. If it were it would be useless to us. It is because it may become my thought that it is of value. This is what the composer does for us, he gives us the chance of expressing ourselves; but we have not done this when we have merely reproduced the thought-form. From life it came, in life it must subsist. It came from the thinker's living consciousness; it must implant itself upon ours.

The emotion applicable to a thought-form, however, may be infinitely varied, though the form itself is rigid. A thought-form adapts itself to the individual, or vice versa, whichever way is preferred. The composer himself views his own work differently from time to time. It is well-known that Beethoven twice 'metronomed' the eighth and ninth Symphonies, and that there was considerable variation in the markings; and this is to speak of elementary expression only. The truth is that the sense of an idea varies with each repetition of it, and that the composer himself is subject to the same law. With Heraclitus, we never descend into the same stream (of thought) twice, for each experience we have modifies the experience which follows. There is, in short, no exact expression of an idea. The formula is constant, but that is all. The complete expression of an idea could only be if all humanity read its meaning into it. 'Not one man of all men is God,' says Swinburne, 'but God is the fruit of the whole.' The God-like or perfect idea would be none other than that in which the experience of humanity had emptied itself. But the composer certainly has no notion of their full power when he gives us his thought-forms. He always builds 'wiser than he knows.' He may even be astonished at his own work. Liszt once played to Schumann one of the latter's compositions in such a way that Schumann exclaimed, 'I never knew it was so beautiful.'

I think I have said enough to show that we cannot (save by mimicry) reproduce a composer's thought; for feeling, the necessary concomitant of thought, is and must be an original thing. We may reproduce a composer's formula—the mere intervals and time-proportions—but we must recreate his thought, and then it will not be his but ours, and ours will be different from his.

What we have to ask of an interpreter, then, is that he give us his feeling, his original reaction to the composer's formula. None other will serve the interpreter himself if he is to derive any true satisfaction from his work; none other can satisfy us if we are to have something which we recognise as the true expression of an idea. What is wrong with most performances is that this original reaction is absent from it. We get mechanical adherence to metronome marks, and expression signs, in the realisation of which little more than memory is engaged; but we do not get just that something which matters, the revelation of the individual soul. We see that each man has a different face from his neighbour. We know far less often, in his music at any rate, that he has a different heart. We get the semblance of expression from him, a mere deference to external authority. If he be one of an orchestra or choir we have perhaps admirable obedience to the conductor. If he be the conductor himself we may get an obedience to the printed sign. But all this is without life. It is expression at secondhand, stuck-on. It does not represent spontaneous organic reaction, and it can be perceived at once, for it leaves us unmoved.

It is in fact these reactions of the individual towards the musical formula that constitute the expression of a piece. We talk of the expression of a piece, of the tempo of a piece, as if it existed in the notes themselves. We talk as if the piece expressed itself, whereas it is we who give expression to it.

By a curious method of reasoning, doubtless based upon some idea of original wickedness, many of us, I think, admit that sentimentalising on notes, the abuse of Rubato, and the general dislocation of strict time, depend upon us, constitute our personal contribution to the expression of a piece. We credit ourselves with every enormity of taste, but we do not imagine that the good alike comes from us; that strict time is as much expression as shading, tenuto, &c.

Expression is the complete reaction of the human being, intellectually and emotionally, towards that which he contemplates, in this case the musical composition.

A composition may be likened to a landscape of sound—or shall we call it a music-scape?—across which we travel, spiritually. If the course is easy to us, if the rhythm, harmonies, modulations, &c., are easily understood, we shall bowl along merrily in more or less strict time. If there are difficulties as to these things, our progress will be delayed. We shall have a tendency to wait when we meet with what is relatively strange and unexpected, for it will take us time to grasp it; and it will involve mental strain as well (equivalent to effects of accent and nuance). But so far we are merely in the domain of the intelligence. Understanding goes deeper. It sees the meaning of this land o' sounds. It feels its correspondence with our emotions,—with love, hate, pity, joy, power—and leads us to express them.

But all this must be done by each one of us individually. No one can do it for us. No one can supply what must be our own feelings. All that the great conductor, or interpreter can do is to place us in the best position in which those feelings may occur. He leads us sympathetically across the music-scape; stops where we may stop; shows the kind of feeling we may feel. But he does not pour his feelings into us. Thought is never transmitted like this, though the ancients used to think so.

THE NEED FOR SELF-REPRESSION.

I have sufficiently insisted, I think, on the need for self-expression, but it must be allied to an opposite principle, that of self-repression, if our interpretations are to be of the highest order. Though as individuals we have the right to our feelings, we must not indulge them to the extent of obliterating the thought-form, a thing easily possible. The latter has its rights as well as ourselves, and a perfect performance would seem to be a perfect balance between the objective and subjective elements of thought, i.e., between the thought-form and our thought-emotion. If we supply no feeling we get merely the dead bones of the thought, mechanical proportions of time and tone; if on the other hand we allow our feelings to run riot, we shall fail to discover the thought-form at all. Emotional 'gush' is a sorry substitute for thought.

The true function of the artist is to use his personality in the expression of the idea. The idea must discipline his feelings. It is, as it were, the external guiding principle, the mould which he is required to fill, but whose shape is lost if there be an overflow. The person who makes his feeling paramount is generally self-centred, self-sufficing; his motive is self-advertisement. We have no common ground with such a man, for the law he acknowledges affects him only. He knows nothing of the subordination of the parts to the whole; the part to him is the whole. And so, if he is consciously self-centred and anti-social, he gives us the abuse of rubato; the dwelling upon notes in order to make his own cheap effects, in order to display himself. If he is merely incapable or undeveloped we get much the same features, though the objectionable motive is of course absent. But about all indifferent art the same thing asserts itself, an ignorance or violation of the larger laws of being. Such a law is the law of strict time, which might be formulated somewhat as follows: Once movement has been given to a body, that movement, unless there is reason for its discontinuance or modification, will persist.

I have said that a piece itself has no time, though we talk of the time of a piece. When we perform it, it is we who have a certain tempo in regard to it. Our judgment and imagination will decide what the rate of our movement will be, how quickly we may go while giving ourselves full time to understand the beauty presented to us in the particular piece; but, once set a-going, we are committed to the movement, obedient to the law of strict time, unless there is good reason to modify it. This reason will never be based upon our caprice or inclination, but always upon some feature of the composition. We must never alter our pace without full justification in the nature of the music; and we shall cheerfully obey this law if we are sincere artists. We shall not obey it because of some external command, but because it is the law of our being at the highest development; and it will be our constant endeavour to approximate ourselves to it.

Mr. Kennedy Scott then dealt with some practical features of conducting, and his points were illustrated by thirty singers of the Oriana Madrigal Society, who performed the following items under his baton:

Madrigal	'Love not me for comely grace' ..	Wilbye

Passages in the inner parts are often wisely slurred to draw attention to points of imitation that might possibly be overlooked by the less experienced executant.

Old English Song.

Arr. by H. E. B.

Drink to me on - ly with thine eyes and I'll not ask for wine.

Slurs, and sometimes other marks of expression, such as \wedge , $>$, dots, dashes, &c., are often more usefully placed over and under the pianoforte part, thus enclosing it. By this means the staves can be brought nearer together, the music is more quickly grasped, and much confusion is obviously avoided.

The grouping of notes by means of quaver-ties recommended in Section I. should never be interfered with to show phrasing. This can always be done by means of phrasing slurs. One example will show the importance of this :

H. E. B.

sf

Should be written thus :

Fantasie, Op. 49. CHOPIN.

fz

The same principle will also apply usually to pauses, a pause between the staves being seldom either necessary or advisable. It should be placed exactly where it is intended to be made, e.g. :—

Compare these with the clearness of the following :

H. E. B.

sf

Two of these four pauses are unnecessary, because those placed to the treble and bass are in a wrong position, being on the first beat of the bar when they should be on the third beat, thus :

Fantasie, Op. 49. CHOPIN.

fz

It is now evident that two pauses are sufficient.

In organ music written on two staves, it is sufficient to place pauses over and under the chord, thus :

To place another pause over the left-hand notes is unnecessary, as the pauses over and under the chord evidently apply to all the notes in that chord. One might, with equal reason, argue that a pause to each note of the chord, if it were possible, is necessary. Exception may perhaps be claimed in such a passage as the following :

but even here the passage may advantageously be written so as to show the pause where it really occurs :

Benedictus in F.

JOHN E. WEST.

The change of signature to one flat would almost certainly be overlooked were it not for the fact that attention is drawn to it by the double-bar.

Its eye-catching quality is also most useful in hymn-tunes, where it is generally placed at the end of each line. It enables the singer to find his place again in the music after looking down at the words printed below. If the double-bars are omitted—as they are in some books—such 'place-finding' becomes difficult when the eyes and the attention of the singer have repeatedly to oscillate from music to words and back again. The complaint that they suggest a pause at the end of each line hardly seems justifiable, as a double-bar is never used to indicate a pause.

The last bar in a piece should always have its full time-value, unless there is a repeat. It has no connection whatever with the first bar of the work, and therefore the practice of making it the complement,

In the use of } care should be taken to make the exact meaning clear, e.g. :

whereas

The double-bar is used to denote the end of a section, movement, or work, but its chief utility is in directing attention to what might otherwise be overlooked. Hence it is often used at a change of key-signature or time-signature, or where repeat dots are inserted. One example will be sufficient to show the importance of this :

in time, of the first bar, is unreasonable. The custom probably arose from the necessity of doing so in those compositions that required the repetition of each section.

The Glastonbury Festival of Mystic Drama has, of course, been seriously affected by the war; but the feeling of the committee has been that the arrangements were too far advanced for a complete cancellation of the performances, while the serious nature of the works to be produced warranted their performance in this time of stress. It was decided to give three performances each week. Among the works presented in the early weeks were a number of solemn war pieces including Stanford's 'The last post' and 'Songs of the Sea,' the Grail Scene from 'Parsifal' (a stage performance), and a new dance by Rutland Boughton called 'The Mystic Dance of the Grail,' performed by members of Miss Margaret Morris's London Company.

The musical score is written for four voices (Soprano, Alto, Tenor, Bass) and piano accompaniment. It features a key signature of two flats (B-flat and E-flat) and a common time signature. The score is divided into three systems. The first system contains the first four staves of vocal parts and the first two staves of the piano accompaniment. The second system contains the next four staves of vocal parts and the next two staves of the piano accompaniment. The third system contains the final four staves of vocal parts and the final two staves of the piano accompaniment. The lyrics are written below the vocal staves. The piano accompaniment consists of a right-hand part (treble clef) and a left-hand part (bass clef). The score includes dynamic markings such as cres., f, and p. The tempo is not specified.

Church and Organ Music.

THE COMPLEAT ORGANIST.

BY HARVEY GRACE.

IX.—OF CONVENTIONS.

(Being an account of a meeting of the North-East Wessex Organists' Association, holden at Longstock.)

The President (Dr. Whitley Cubeb) having read the minutes of the preceding meeting, said, 'It is with great pleasure that we welcome among us to-day Mr. Amicus Candidus (a laugh), who has come to read us a paper. Mr. Candidus has the advantage of being a trained musician, without the drawback of belonging to our profession. He is thus able to approach his subject without bias. His paper, as you know, is entitled, "Our debt to the organist," and I have no doubt that we shall all be much helped and encouraged by the eloquent and approving words that will presently fall from his lips. Ladies and Gentlemen, I will no longer stand between you and the intellectual feast provided by Mr. Candidus, but will call upon him to deliver his address.' (Applause.)

Mr. Candidus.—Dr. Cubeb, Ladies and Gentlemen,—Let me begin by removing a few misconceptions. Meetings of this kind almost invariably resolve themselves into mutual admiration societies. I shall do my best to ensure that to-day's shall be an exception. I hope that long before I sit down it will show signs of becoming instead one of mutual recrimination. (Laughter.) Apparently the idea strikes you as amusing. I assure you I did not put it forward as a joke. I have long felt that one of the worst features of gatherings of musicians, annual general meetings, prize-givings, presentations of diplomas, and the like, is the fulsome praise served out to all and sundry by speaker after speaker. Neat and well-turned compliments are rare. Instead we have butter laid on with a trowel. Even your chairman, who has never seen me before, and will probably never want to see me again, must needs describe my address in advance as 'eloquent,' and 'an intellectual feast.' Here of course he was merely following one of the conventions of his office as chairman. And if I delivered myself of a paper of undiluted praise of the organist I should be subscribing to yet another convention which demands of a speaker that he should say comfortable things. I find myself to-day a kind of inverted Balaam. Called upon to bless the assembled tribes, I have no benison at hand. I have instead nothing but a few grumbles. Of your excellences there is no need for me to speak. Are they not written in the kalendar of the Royal College of Organists, and in the pages of our musical journals? Nor, in the main, do I wish to traverse any of those glowing tributes. The average English organist does admirable work. For this he receives often a small salary, always a great deal of carping criticism. This is aimed mostly at his choice of music and his technical qualifications, and almost invariably comes from those members of his congregation who know little about music (especially church music), less about organ playing, and nothing about singing. As your chairman said, I am not an organist, and I dare to stand here and harangue you only because I may claim to have had the advantage of a musical education at least not below the average of any of you. But there is a further qualification. I am the only person in this company who is regularly, week in, week out, in the position of listening to the work of organists and choirmasters. Just as the looker-on sees most of the game, so does the listener hear most of the music. An organist when at duty is, roughly speaking, four-fifths performer and one-fifth listener. Is it not good for him occasionally to sit at the feet of one who is all listener? (Hear, hear, and a voice, 'What about the paper?') Someone impatiently when I am going to begin my paper. Adapting the words of Canning's needy knife-grinder I may reply, 'Paper? God bless you! I have not time to read, sir.' A few desultory remarks I had scribbled down, but since I rose to my feet I have decided not to read them. The fact is, the word 'convention' which I used a few moments ago, at once struck me as being a more fitting text. The debt of the public to the organist is a heavy one—how heavy the public will not grasp until they realise more fully the difficulties of the work, and the all-round ability with which it is generally performed. But you and I know, and should be flogging a dead horse if I spoke further of it. Let me rather say a few words on 'Conventions.' Now, Convention, like fire, alcohol, food, and other pleasant things, is a good servant but a bad master. Every branch of the musical profession has its more or less absurd customs. From some of the worst of these you organists are by the nature of things exempt. For example, when you have played a particularly good voluntary or recital piece you are not expected to come to the chancel steps to bow to your admirers, returning six seconds later with a smile that reminds one of the advertisements of a well-known dentifrice. Nor, however well your choir sings, are you ever presented with laurel wreaths or any other floral or vegetable tributes. Nor is it necessary for you, after repeated bowings, to wave your choir to their feet, with an expressive gesture, as who should say 'Not to me, but to these gallant fellows, be the praise.' The royalty system, too, has not so far cast its fell shadow over the organ loft, and if any of you play clap-trap we may presume that you do so because it pleases you, and not because the publisher pays you a half-crown. Nor do you, before beginning to accompany your choir or play a solo, beg your hearers' attention by an arpeggio scamper up and down the key-board with a well-worn harmonic formula for basis. These and many other conventions you are able to avoid. But it has often occurred to me, when sitting under you, that you have a fair share peculiar to your profession. Let me remind you of some of these.

I do not forget that I speak as an outsider. The things that I am going to complain about may have good reason behind them. I can only say that, as a musician, I am constantly annoyed by them, and musical friends with whom I have discussed the matter agree with me in my condemnation. It is for you to decide how far they are necessary. Conventions there must be of course, if things are to be done decently and in order. But we are, I think apt to forget that what is convenient (using the word in its strict sense) at one time is inconvenient and even harmful at another. This is a truism, but only on the assumption of its being overlooked can it account for the survival of certain church service conventions. Take the responses at matins and even song, for example. Is there any reason why these should ever be accompanied when the choir sings in harmony? The organ part is a mere duplication of the voice parts, and has no raison d'être beyond sustaining the pitch. I venture to say that if a choir cannot sing harmonized responses unaccompanied without losing the pitch they should be content with a unison setting. Yet I have heard highly-paid and efficient Cathedral choirs singing Tallis with their excellent voices unnecessarily bolstered up by a diapason background. Again, can anybody give me a reason for the absurd custom of prefacing each response with a pedal note? It is not required to help the choir as to what notes they are to sing. It ought not to be necessary to recall absent-minded choristers to the matter in hand. Nothing can be said for it on the score of beauty. So why use it? Why also the interpolated pedal note after 'is now' in the 'Gloria Patri'? Probably it was first used to impress upon a careless choir that a beat's rest was to be made at that point. For the same reason you will find in old anthems and services a rest filled in with a pedal pump. But surely our choirs can do without such an aid to counting. Why should it be possible to-day to hear this sort of thing: '(Boom!) As it was in the beginning is now (Boom!) and ever shall be,' &c.—with a falseness of accentuation and a stiffness of rhythm, moreover, beside which the worst of Anglican chanting is flexible? Surely the responses should be sung after the manner of good chanting. All the salters tell us that good chanting is as near akin as possible to good reading. When I go to a cathedral, or to a church where these responses are sung, surely I have just cause for complaint when I hear the usual square-cut travesty, with minute-guns on the organ, instead of this:

VOICES ALONE.

As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world with. -out end. A-men.

And why should the last response, 'like a wounded man, drag its slow length along,' on this wise:

And take not Thy Holy Spirit from us.

often with a wholly unwarranted second inversion of the chord of F at the word 'Thy'?

Some irritating mannerisms are often present in the singing of the Litany. 'Miserable sinners' becomes 'miserable sinners,' and where the 1544 English Litany is sung, I am generally doomed to twenty-one repetitions of false accent: thus, 'We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord,' the implication being plainly that so long as we are heard, the rest of the populace may be ignored. I wish, too, that you could be brought to realise how members of your congregations who are sensitive in the matter of verbal rhythm suffer from the customary methods of singing such fragments of plainsong as the 'Sursum Corda,' or certain phrases in Merbecke's Communion Service, 'We lift them up into the Lord,' 'by Whom all things,' instead of 'all things' (the misplaced accent here being due to the fact that 'things' happens to be set to a higher note than 'all'), 'Name of the Lord,' 'sins of the world,' and so on. These small things, I dare say, are difficult to cure, and I am bound to admit that I hear as many from the officiating clergy as from the choir. Still, I cannot help feeling depressed when I reflect that thousands of people week after week are allowing their sense of verbal rhythm to become so blunted as to ignore false quantities that would never be allowed to pass in a good dramatic performance, or even in ordinary conversation. This is one of the worst of our Church service conventions, and perhaps will never be swept away till careless and slovenly reading by the clergy is a thing of the past.

Coming to the psalms, why should we not have more unaccompanied verses than we do? Even where plainsong is used, the harmonic background supplied by the organ might well be dispensed with for a few moments, or at all events more frequently reduced to a minimum. But where Anglican chants are used, with a capable choir, quiet reflective psalms might well be sung entirely unaccompanied. I was present recently at evensong at a church where there is one of the finest of our choirs. The psalms were chanted to Anglicans, and I must confess that, excellent as the voices were, I was bored and irritated by the constant repetition of the one little harmonic phrase. The organ kept going steadily throughout, as if the organist had his fingers glued to the keys. Here was a psalm of a good many verses, and only one colour was used. Now by the simple expedient of giving an occasional verse to boys alone, men alone, choir in harmony unaccompanied, in unison unaccompanied, and in unison with varied organ harmonies, five more colours could have been added to the palette, various points in the poetry brought out, and the whole performance made more interesting to singers and hearers. But convention said 'No. As we chanted generations ago, so shall we chant now, and evermore, world without end.' Ah, me! (Laughter.) Why not, too, make more use of these varied dispositions of the voices in hymn singing? And, speaking of hymns, is it not time we came to something like agreement as to the reasons for playing over the tune, or a part of it? There is something to be said for the contention that this playing over is unnecessary, since hymn-books are in general use, and therefore all present may have the hymn found without any announcement of it. This being so, a prelude of a few bars clearly indicating the tune to be sung, and ending on a convenient chord or discord, is perhaps a more artistic plan. But I venture to suggest that of fifty organists playing over a tune only about ten remember the two-fold practical reason for doing so, viz., to make clear what tune is to be used, and the pace at which it is to be sung. As to the first point, the organ being used merely to announce the tune, as the parson does the number, the use of 'fancy' stops for the purpose is out of place. As well might the parson announce the number in a voice trembling with emotion, or garnished thus: 'Oh! my brethren. Hymn number seven hundred and forty-two; oh, alas! seven hundred and forty-two.' (Laughter.) Such an idea seems to strike you as ridiculous, but emotion in playing over the tune is just as misplaced. A very bad case of this kind occurs to me. I was present recently at an organ recital given by one of our leading church organists. Among the items was a magnificent organ piece by Max Reger (hisses), founded on a hymn-tune—also German, I regret to say. Now the tune and the work founded on it were the strongest of strong music, full of bone and sinew. The organist wisely played the chorale first, so that we might the more easily follow the fantasia. How did he play it? One would have expected a dignified announcement on a fairly loud stop of no emotional quality. Will it be believed that what appeared to be a quartet of goats in the last stages of asphyxiation, but which was really only what our organ-builders give us as an imitation of the human voice (saving their face somewhat by calling it vox humana), was used instead? If such things are done in high places at the hands of your leading lights, what may we expect of you, the rank and file? As to the second reason for playing over a hymn—the indication of the pace at which it is to be sung—I am surprised at the frequency with which organists play the tune at one speed, wait for several beats while preparing some stops, and then start off the hymn—at another tempo. The first verse is, of course, devoted to pulling things together, and the choir may expect an early lecture on the importance of keeping time.

(To be continued.)

Mr. C. Preston (High Street, Odiham, Hants) writes as follows: 'Some of your readers may be interested by an account of a very old organ which is to be found in the Congregational Church in the little out-of-the-way town of Odiham in Hampshire. It is possible that out of the number of motorists and cyclists passing through there may be some—organists and others—who would like to know of this object of interest, which, I have no doubt, can be seen for the asking. For the benefit of those who may not be fortunate enough at any time to find themselves in this delightful part of Hampshire I should like to detail a description of the instrument. The specification is as follows:

COUPLERS.

Swell to Great. | Great to Pedals.

'With regard to the Pedal organ, I may observe that the Bourdon is a recent addition to the instrument, the work having been carried out some few years ago by Mr. James Ivimey, organ-builder, of Southampton. Before that the pedals consisted of eighteen notes only, CC to F, $1\frac{1}{2}$ octaves, and drew upon the Great organ Stopped diapason (bass), having no independent Pedal stop. The Swell organ is of shorter compass than the Great, stopping short at tenor C, although the builders kept up appearances by not only providing dummy keys for the bottom octave but actually three more below that. Perhaps the extra keys were intended as a compensation for the absence of sound! The stop-jambs are of the old square pattern similar to those in use in the Gloucester Cathedral organ of S. S. Wesley's day. The inside of the instrument presents a curious spectacle, some of the pipes being not only held in position but actually held together by string or tape; while two or three ominous-looking holes in the sound-board remind one that the pipes once resting there are now, alas, no more: something like the gaps to be seen in the gums of those approaching the sans teeth age. In case my description of the organ—no exaggerated one, by the way—should lead any of your readers to imagine that the work of this instrument is over, let me at once say that such is not the case; it is doing good work still, and I see no reason why it should not go on for many more years. The tone of the instrument is excellent, and although it is voiced on a small scale—something of the calibre of a chamber organ—it adequately fulfils the needs of the building in which it is erected. The only stop which seems to have suffered by age—and possibly by abuse as well as use—is the Trumpet, the other reed—the Clarinet—being quite a faithful representation of the instrument from which it derives its name, possessing as it does that slight hesitancy in speech characteristic of the clarinet. When one learns that some years ago this organ was tuned by the local schoolmaster of that day, who indulged in the short and ready method of hacking pieces off the tops of the pipes to raise the pitch, it is a matter of surprise that this instrument shows such vitality in its old age. I have been informed that this organ came from a church at Uxbridge, and that it was bought by the church there from another church over eighty or ninety years ago. Should any of your readers be able to throw any light on its history or its maker, I should be obliged to them; or should any philanthropic musician with antiquarian tastes care to purchase it and furnish the church here with a new organ, I am sure the authorities would not place obstacles in his path.'

Reviews.

Full jathom five. Choral song for T.T.B.B. (unaccompanied). By Thomas F. Dunhill. (The Orpheus, No. 544.)

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

This is a finely worked-out setting of Shakespeare's well-known words. It is not to be properly described as a part-song, for it is a fully-developed piece in which the form of the sections is born of the varying mood of the words. The description 'Choral song' is therefore more appropriate. Mr. Dunhill has before now shown his power to write well for voices, but we are not acquainted with any choral work of his that displays so much breadth and grip as are shown in this setting. He has allowed himself ample freedom of treatment, but nowhere are there extravagances. The final climax is especially simple and massive. A well-equipped choir could here make a thrilling effect.

The Psalter, Pointed. By the late Stephen Elvey.

[Oxford: Parker & Co.]

Psalters come and psalters go, but Elvey's seems likely to go on, if not for ever, at all events for a very long time. After a useful life of fifty-eight years, its thirty-sixth edition has just been reached. While retaining all its old features, including the use of bars, large capitals and other heavy type for accented syllables (the desirability of which may be questioned), the reprint has included the marks of expression used by the late Dr. G. M. Garrett. Among these are numerous directions for singing verses full, in harmony, and in unison—varieties that might with advantage be more widely used than they are, as tending to break up the monotony of a long psalm, as well as being a straightforward method of bringing out some dramatic point.

Caprice de Concert. By J. Stuart Archer. Original Compositions for the Organ (New Series), No. 32.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

This piece may be recommended to recital organists desiring a brilliant work, moderately difficult. The music would perhaps have gained had there been a little less insistence on the three opening notes, and an English title might well have been given to it.

Romance. By H. R. Woledge. Original Compositions for the Organ (New Series, No. 33).

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

A melodious piece, of the 'song without words' type, quite easy to play, and pleasant to hear.

Schmücke dich, O liebe Seele. By J. S. Bach. Edited by John E. West. Original Compositions for the Organ, No. 445.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Of the many beautiful choral preludes of Bach there are few, if any, more beautiful than 'Schmücke dich,' so praised by Schumann and Mendelssohn and loved by countless organists. This edition, with its excellent phrasing and its judicious disposition of the voice-parts, should be a boon to players, especially to those taking up the work for study as a test-piece at the Royal College of Organists' examinations.

Thus saith the Lord God. Harvest Anthem. By George C. Martin. Octavo Anthems, No. 1052.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Opening with a vigorous declamatory passage for tenor and bass in unison, this anthem proceeds by way of a four-part chorus (Allegro) and a quieter section (Andante pastorale) to a verse of 'Now thank we all our God,' the famous melody being sung in unison with a flowing organ part, and providing an imposing ending to an excellent work. The music would present few difficulties to an average church choir.

THE SCIENTIFIC BASIS OF TUNING.

By E. P. LENNOX ATKINS.

On June 11 an entertaining lecture on the above subject was delivered by Mr. H. Keatley Moore, Mus. Bac. Cantab., before the recently-formed 'Pianoforte Tuners' Association of Great Britain and Ireland.' As last year in the February number the Musical Times printed an editorial article headed 'Equal temperament: An unrealised theory,' many readers are no doubt interested in the subject. And last January—I am quoting from the School Music Review—the editor referred at the West London Vacation Conference to the unsatisfactory condition of 'teaching-pianofortes' generally, and their unsatisfactory state for ear-training purposes after they had been 'tuned.' In addition, Messrs. Novello, acting I believe on the advice of Dr. McNaught, recently added Spain's 'Primer on equal temperament' (founded on the larger treatises) to their fine series of educational works on music. These are hopeful signs for the tuning profession, the members of which to this extent are evidently more beholden to those responsible for the policy of the journals named than perhaps is at present realised.

Towards the end of his lecture Mr. Moore announced to his audience that he accepted certain figures, &c., offered by Mr. William Braid White, which have been published in the course of some articles headed 'Tuning as an exact science.' He said (I quote from the full report of the lecture that appeared in the Music Trades Review for June 20):

Having set your pitch C to your fork (say 522) and your middle C as exact an octave as you can below it—no man can tune an octave or a unison exactly, but you all can get near enough, for practical purposes—then proceed thus. From C tune a fourth down to G truly, then flatten the G till it beats with the C ten beats in ten seconds—one beat a second. From G tune a true fifth up to D without beats, and then flatten the D till it beats six times in ten seconds with the G, a little more than one beat in two seconds. (If your tone will not last ten seconds then count five and three respectively for five seconds. If you can count as long as ten seconds the count is surer.) Go on in the same way, making the fourths down beat ten in ten seconds, and the fifths up beat six in ten seconds. Do not go above F upwards, so that when you go down from E to B (ten beats in ten seconds), you go down again from B to F \sharp below (ten beats in ten seconds). . . You will end in F below middle C, and this F ought to beat six in ten seconds with middle C that you started from. Tune F up to F, a true octave, or as near as a man may, and your bearings will lie between F and F with middle C in the middle. I will run over the notes in their proper order: C down to G, up to D, down to A, up to E, down to B, down again to F \sharp , then up to C \sharp , down to G \sharp , up to D \sharp , down to A \sharp , down again to F, then F to F.

Always remember to keep between F and F, and with pitch C not lower than 512 nor higher than 540, and to get ten beats in your downward fourths and six beats in your upward fifths in ten seconds. If you do not keep within these limits the rule is incorrect; but if you do it is quite correct for all practical purposes. I will have this rule printed, and I shall be happy, in a few days, to send a copy to anyone who will give his name and address to any of the attendants.

There is scarcely need for me to remind your readers that the tempering—I demur to the word tuning—of pianofortes and organs is carried out in practice by judging the speed of what is sometimes called the 'overtone beat.' The 'tuner' commences somewhere about the middle of an instrument, sets his equal-tempered scale within the compass of an octave generally, and then proceeds upwards and downwards.

Of course, strictly speaking, the equal-tempered scale must be first of all in his own mind. Thus the pianoforte, having no sound in itself—'Sound is an affection of the mind': Woolhouse, Stainer, &c.—is a manufactured article, plastic so far as regards its strings, and capable, under favouring circumstances, of reflecting a mental impression of what is believed to be equal temperament. A good pianoforte will reflect a mind in equal temper; but only to another mind if this second mind is of a similar way of thinking.

No University has a degree in this connection—there is no authoritative diploma in equal temperament; and if the equal-tempered scale is, as many say it is, the foundation of modern music, then is the idea so very far-fetched that tuners who provide, or are supposed to provide, us all with this essential musical scale are, in essence, the real music teachers of the day so far as regards ear-training?

The rule for obtaining the equal-tempered scale is not that the speed of the overtone beat must remain constant as pitch rises, and the number of vibrations therefore of each sound forming the interval increase. On the contrary, the rule is: that the speed of beat must increase in proportion to the rise of the two generators of the beat in pitch.

I am obliged to say that Mr. Moore's conclusions and figures are misleading and founded on error, and that on behalf of the Equal-Temperament Committee I repudiate them. In the first place, his statement that all the flattened fifths in his scale when laying the bearings in the middle of the pianoforte between the F above centre C and the F below are to beat at the rate of six beats in ten seconds, is quite wrong. The figures are given later, and it will be seen that if the fifth down from centre C to F beats at this rate with C at a certain pitch, by no possibility can any other fifth above or below beat at a similar speed if equal temperament is to be the goal.

In the second place, Mr. Moore's statement that this constant speed of six beats in ten seconds for all the flattened fifths holds good at all pitches from C 512 up to C 540, I dispute. If he is right, why stop at C 540? Call C 840, or shall we say C = 1080, and then see by our figures into what sort of an impasse the lecturer is leading the members of this Association. There is seemingly a loophole of escape:

Mr. Moore may urge that the speed of beat in his scheme doubles for the octave above (like the vibrations). But if all his fifths between F and F equal each other in speed of beat on what note does he start doubling? Take the F above centre C and the tone below, B flat : a flattened fifth beating six times in ten seconds. Does the flattened fifth next above (B—F sharp) yield twelve beats in ten seconds? If not, where does the doubling of speed begin? And what about the equal-temperament semitone for singers, &c., when the speed of beat suddenly flies upwards—doubles—for no apparent cause, at this tangent when this point is reached? Perhaps the lecturer contends that his speed is intended gradually to increase when fifths and fourths are tempered above a certain note; but increase upwards is simply a corollary of decrease downwards. The lecturer's stagnation in speed is neither one nor the other. In Spain's 'Primer' all the beats on pages 22, 29, 32, &c., increase in speed as we test upwards; decrease as we test downwards. On referring to Hermann Smith's well-known work on 'The art of tuning the pianoforte,' the tabular view (facing page 35) gives all the fourths and fifths as increasing consistently in speed of beat as pitch rises. Turn overleaf, and we find the same rule holds good for the thirds and sixths in equal temperament.

If Mr. Moore's fifths all beat alike in the bearings, what happens to the other intervals? The major and minor thirds, major and minor sixths, the major and minor tenths and sevenths, &c., do they beat alike at all pitches? Has Mr. Moore ever heard the beat in these intervals as some of us hear them? If he has, surely he must be aware of the overwhelming necessity for giving them attention; but he makes no mention whatever of these intervals.

We now come to the passage where Mr. Moore deals with the 2 : 1 octave : a ratio of paramount importance. The lecturer treats it with scant ceremony, for, he says, 'you cannot obtain a true octave in practice.' It may be conceded that to test an octave simply as an octave (by striking, for example, C and C) and then pass it as a 2 : 1 ratio in the matter of vibrations, proves nothing as to the purity of the octave. But before I proceed with other tests, and very important ones, the mind (for equal temperament) will have to make itself familiar with the mathematical division of the octave. The only octave mentioned by Mr. Moore is the F to F octave. His own figures are given by me, and they prove that he is providing himself, first of all, and his audience afterwards, with bad octaves.

How does he divide his octave? In this way : make, he says, the fifth from middle C down to F beat six times in ten seconds; and the fourth from middle C up to F make beat at the speed of ten times in ten seconds. That is, the lower fifth beats six in ten, its upper fourth beats ten in ten.

But in equal temperament the sharpened tempered fourth is regarded by the Equal-Temperament Committee as a minor interval (minor fifth), and the flattened fifth as a major interval. Now one of our rules for the proving of an octave is this, and every tuner should have it by heart :

PROVING THE OCTAVE.

(1.) If the lower tempered interval is MINOR the upper tempered interval is major, and in a true 2 : 1 octave must have the same speed of beat per second. Example :

Beat ratio 1 : 1.
OCTAVE
F to F
MINOR.		MAJOR.
F up to (minor 5th) B flat i.e. , sharpened 4th beats 2.		B flat up to (major 5th) F beats 2.
F up to (minor 3rd) A flat beats 2.		A flat up to (major 6th) F beats 2.
F up to (minor 6th) D flat beats 2.		D flat up to (major 3rd) F beats 2.

(2.) On the other hand, if the lower tempered interval is MAJOR, then the upper tempered interval is minor, and in a true 2 : 1 octave will have DOUBLE the speed of beat per second of the lower major interval. Example :

Beat ratio 1 : 2.

OCTAVE
F to F

MAJOR.	MINOR.
F up to (major 5th) C beats 1.	C up to (minor 5th) F i.e. , sharpened 4th beats 2.
F up to (major 3rd) A beats 1.	A up to (minor 6th) F beats 2.
F up to (major 6th) D beats 1.	D up to (minor 3rd) F beats 2.

This beat ratio gained, the octave is demonstrably mathematically pure. Thus the beat test is passed. Aurally, its 2 : 1 vibration ratio is perfectly satisfactory.

Again, if the major third on F gives six beats in a second, how many beats per second are required in the major tenth on F to prove the A octave is mathematically pure, the 2 : 1 ratio present? And yet again, if this same major third on F gives six beats in a second, how many beats per second are required for the major seventeenth on F, F to A, to prove the A octave next above is mathematically pure, the 2 : 1 ratio present? With these three beat-ratios mastered by the mind—the major third, the major tenth, the major seventeenth—my contention is that the difficulties facing the student either in music or equal temperament almost disappear. We are told that never have so many tuning experts been gathered together as there were at Mr. Moore's lecture. Yet not a single query was raised in this direction.

Of these beautiful tests for proving the octave or fifteenth we are kept in ignorance. But they cannot be dispensed with.

I am bound to say that the practical value of the lecture is nil. The speeds given are wrong, and the lecturer made no mention of many vital calculations, although the rule given for the proving of an octave is inviolate.

Few tuners are aware that without striking the octave on middle C and without trying fourths or fifths, it is quite easy to demonstrate, mathematically and aurally, that a true 2 : 1 octave or a 4 : 1 fifteenth has or has not been obtained.

On page 40, in 'Woolhouse on Temperament,' is given the scale for equal temperament throughout a compass of seven octaves. These figures are identical with those given by Hermann Smith, and with those given by Mr. Spain, page 14.

To sum up : I am sorry to have to repudiate Mr. Moore's figures and advice—and since organ tuners are specially invited in the Association's Prospectus to join, the matter is more than serious.

Mr. Moore's Degrees entitle him to our respect. But his figures being wrong, his conclusions are wrong and his instructions impracticable.

The octave cited by Mr. Moore is produced with a fifth with six beats in ten seconds (lower interval major) and the fourth (upper interval minor) ten beats in ten seconds. But the fourth, being minor, for a pure octave, must produce twelve beats in ten seconds,—double the major interval. This yields a true octave and is easily obtained. But Mr. Moore's figures are six in ten major compared with ten in ten minor—a most complicated and unnecessary ratio for any one to attempt to grasp. Fortunately, his figures, being wrong, must be discarded, so they need trouble us no further.

THE PROMENADE CONCERTS.

It was widely surmised that in the general paralysis of musical affairs the Queen's Hall Promenade Concerts would suffer greatly—perhaps mortally. Up to the time of going to press, however, there has been no visible cause to fear disaster. The attendance on the first four nights, which is the limit of our present evidence, was excellent. It will be a feather in our national cap if a series of Promenade Concerts, an extraordinary manifestation of musical appetite even in peace time, succeeds without interruption during the greatest of modern wars.

The opening of the season on Saturday, August 15, presented a scene of great enthusiasm. The principals of the Orchestra were welcomed one by one, and lastly Sir Henry Wood received a great ovation. The National Anthem, 'La Marseillaise,' and 'God bless the Prince of Wales' re sung, and a typical 'popular' programme succeeded. Mackenzie's 'Britannia' Overture, Sibelius's 'Valse lente,' and Percy Grainger's orchestral adaptations of the Londonderry Air and 'Shepherd's Hey' were enthusiastically received, the last being encored; Mr. C. Warwick Evans played the well-written Violoncello concerto of M. Georges Dorlay, a member of the Orchestra; and songs were given by Miss Carrie Tubb and—in patriotic strain—by Mr. Herbert Heyner. A novelty was introduced in the shape of Sir Edward Elgar's 'Sospiri,' for strings, piano, and organ. It is a sweet, melancholy air, laid out and red with masterly reticence and perfection of detail. Strauss's 'Don Juan,' originally in the evening's programme, was expunged and Tchaikovsky's 'Capriccio Italien' put in its place—much to the loss of musical value and interest. The substitution of a Franco-Russian for a Wagner programme on August 17 took effect on both the numbers and the keenness of the Monday audience, usually so crowded and excited. But it was nevertheless a successful concert. The taboo of Wagner is much to be regretted. Apparently the directors of the Queen's Hall and of the Orchestra feared demonstration by non-musical super-patriots. These should be reminded that if the boycott is maintained it will cause a loss of enjoyment to thousands of British music-lovers, and may bring financial injury to a British undertaking upon which many British workers depend. We were glad to see that Robert Newman's communication to the Press expressing determination to keep to the original scheme as nearly as possible, and declaring that 'the greatest examples of Music of Art are world possessions and unassailable even by the prejudices and passions of the hour.' Mr. Richard Walthew's Overture to an unfinished opera, 'Friend Fritz,' received its first performance on August 19. The work,—which might well be entitled simply 'Comedy-overture,'—proved to be bright and tuneful, and very effectively scored for small orchestra. It was conducted by the composer, and met with hearty appreciation.

THE ASSOCIATED BOARD.

At the twenty-fifth meeting of the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music, it was reported that in the United Kingdom the number of candidates entered for the Local Centre examinations in 1913-14 was 5,707, against 5,552 in 1912-13. Of the 4,590 entries in the various subjects there were 1,264 passes in the advanced grade, and 1,472 in the intermediate grade, as against 1,222 and 1,426 in 1912-13. The number of candidates in the School examinations was 1,416, against 23,196 in 1912-13.

The Exhibitions offered by the Board last year in the United Kingdom were gained by Gladys L. England (pianoforte), Betty Polischuk (pianoforte), Elsie H. B. Bernard (violin), Herbert D. Blanchard (violoncello), Dorothy F. M. Smithard (singing), Caroline H. Fotheringham (organ). Seventeen exhibitions previously gained have been renewed for a further period of one year. An exhibition tenable for one year at the Royal Academy of Music has been awarded to Miss Kathleen Narelle, Sydney, N.S.W. (pianoforte), on the completion of her tenure of the Woolley Memorial Scholarship. The Exhibitions offered by the Board in the Oversea Dominions, in connection with the examinations in 1913, have been awarded as follows:—Australia: Marjorie Flook, Parramatta, N.S.W. (violin); Madge Collins, Sydney, N.S.W. (singing); New Zealand: Audrey T. Gibson, Christchurch (pianoforte); Canada: Ewart Shadwick, Winnipeg, Manitoba (violin); Gibraltar: Gladys I. Ashdowne (pianoforte); Ceylon: Leartsease Marley (pianoforte). Eleven appointments of honorary local representatives were made during the year in the United Kingdom, and thirty-one in the Dominions.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The annual prize-distribution took place at the Scala Theatre on July 24, the presentations being made by Lady Stamfordham. Sir Alexander Mackenzie's speech was one of great interest. He said that the number of students on the books was greater than ever before; he referred to the great activity of the operatic class; he spoke of the loss the Academy had suffered from the deaths of Lord Strathcona,

Mr. Charles Crews, Mr. Fred Walker, and Mr. Alessandro Pezze. He also deplored the prevailing tendency on the part of students to cut short their period of study.

The following were the awards: The Charles Lucas prize (composition), Eric Grant; the Parepa-Rosa prize (contraltos), Gladys E. Parr; the Mario prize (baritones), Raymond I. Ellis; the Joseph Mass prize (tenors), Gerald Harris; the Walter Macfarren gold medals (pianoforte), Katherine Doubleday and Herbert Haworth; the W. E. Hill & Sons' prize (violin), Herbert J. Brine; the Dove prize (for general excellence), Herbert J. Brine; the Worshipful Company of Musicians' medal (for the most distinguished student in the Academy), Harriet Cohen; the Charlotte Walters prizes (elocution), Gertrude Hammod and Gweneth M. Roberts; the Albert Hunt Shakespearean prize (elocution), Beatrice Fulton; the Ridley Prentice prize (for the best teaching by a sub-professor), David Cooper; the Julia Leney prize (harp), Dorothy Godwin; the Frederick Westlake prize (pianoforte), Florence Marr; the Hannah Mayer Fitzroy prize (violin), Emil Clark; the Lesley Alexander gift (viola or violoncello), J. K. Bauer and F. Howard; the Alexander Roller Prize (pianoforte), Philip A. Lévi; the Challen & Son gold medal (pianoforte), Adolph Hallis; the Chappell pianoforte prize, Katherine Hogg; the Bonamy Dobree prize (violoncello), Giovanni B. Barbirolli; the Beare prize (violin), Kathleen Lindars; the Mary Burgess Memorial gift, Philip A. Lévi; the Manns Memorial prize, Egerton Tidmarsh; the Oliveria Prescott prize, J. K. Bauer, Eric Grant, and Alec Rowley; the Anne E. LLoyd exhibition (singing), Evelyn Langston.

THE R.A.M. CLUB.

The annual dinner of this Club, which took place on July 23, was a celebration of twenty-five years of happy existence, and it passed off with great success. The speakers were Mr. Louis N. Parker, Dr. H. W. Richards, Sir Alexander Mackenzie (in the chair), Mr. J. Percy Baker, Dr. Eaton Faning, Mr. T. B. Knott, and Mr. Plunket Greene.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

At the conclusion of the Midsummer term of this College, on July 22, the following awards were made by the Director and Board of Professors:—Council exhibitions for singing to Freda Rupp, Mari Edwards, and Stanley S. Heaysman; for pianoforte to Margaret A. Tensmann; for violin to Margaret D. Middleton and Melpoméné Scaramanga; for organ to Harold E. Wyld; for composition to Ernest J. S. Moeran. The London Musical Society's prize for singing to Idwen Thomas; Messrs. W. E. Hill & Sons' prize of a violin, bow, and case to Dora Garland; the Savage Club exhibition to Nellie I. R. Peacock (for one year); the Directors' history essay prize to Herbert N. Howells.

At the students' orchestral concert on July 21, the principal works in the programme were Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony, which was well and clearly played, Delibes's ballet 'Sylvia,' and the 'Wein, Wein, und Gesang' waltzes of Johann Strauss. The soloists who appeared were Miss Jessie Stewart (violin), Miss Etty Ferguson, and Mr. Jacob Williamson (vocalists). Sir Charles Stanford conducted.

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

At the Guildhall School of Music the following two students obtained the highest mark totals in the Examination for Associateship of the School and have been awarded the School Medals for 1914: gold medal, Gladys Hildersley (pianoforte); silver medal, Hilda L. Sparksman (pianoforte). The special prizewinners were: The Lord Mayor's prize (soprano vocalists), Irene Alexander; Lady Mayoress's prize (pianoforte), Phyllis Hay; Sheriffs' prize (soprano vocalists), Phyllis Dicksee; Sheriffs' prize (contralto vocalists), Nellie Walker; Chairman's prize (pianoforte), D. Augusta Chilton Griffin; Knill Challenge Cup, with silver medal, Nellie Walker; Knight prize (bass vocalists), Reginald Johnson; Tillie gold medal (violin), Elsie Cohen; Alexander prize (elocution), Muriel Deason; Enoch singing prize, Arthur Tomlinson; Maude Wilby prize (violin), won and divided by Louis Godowski and Hilda Bishop; Garceau prize (French chansons and diction), Phyllis Morley; Wakefield orchestral prizes, Kitty Loveland, Harry J. Rosenbaum, and Elsa Ivimey-Martin; Sir August Manns Memorial prize (organists), Philip C. Hayes; Pearce Morrison Memorial prize (vocal competitions), Reginald Johnson; Max Hecht Scholarship (British vocalists studying German classic songs), Reginald Johnson; Dove Memorial prize, Rebe Kussmann; Basil Althaus Memorial bow, Muriel Hay; Libotton Memorial prize, Elsa Ivimey-Martin.

The scholarships awarded are held as follows: special Corporation scholarships (£25 to £80), Louis Godowski, Phyllis Harding, Nellie Walker, Lilian Stiles-Allen, Muriel Hay, Edith M. Harry, D. A. Chilton-Griffin, Percy Kemp, John E. Crowther, Herbert V. Templeman, Elsie Cohen, Rebe Kussmann, Kathleen Thomas; Knoop open scholarship (£75, to include maintenance), Henry Spivakowsky; Mercers' scholarship (£52 10s.), Margaret M. Harrison; Merchant Taylors' scholarship (£40), Carl True. Musicians' Company scholarships: Carnegie scholarships (£23 each), Phyllis Plank, George R. Stratton; S. Ernest Palmer scholarships (£23 each), Ivy R. G. Blenheim, Leo F. B. Turpin; 'Melba' scholarship (£30), Dorothy May Waring; 'Haywood' scholarship (£31 10s.), Vera Neave; De Lafontaine scholarship (£20), Maurice A. Cole; Bechstein scholarship (£20), Marion Hunt.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BIRMINGHAM.

The musical outlook in connection with the forthcoming local season is of course uncertain. Thus the principal event would no doubt have been the visit of the Quinlan Opera Company to the Theatre Royal early in October, but at the last moment the project had to be abandoned owing to the fact that a great many of the Company are on the Continent, and it is impossible to ensure their presence in this country in time for the fulfilment of their contracts. The Carl Rosa Opera Company is booked for a week at the Prince of Wales's Theatre.

Chamber-music will be once more under the control of the Birmingham Chamber Concerts Society, under the direction of Messrs. Dale & Forty, the executive again being the Catterall String Quartet. The old-established Harrison Concerts (four in number) are arranged to be given in the Town Hall as usual; also the Max Mossel Drawing-room Concerts.

Choral Societies have not been behindhand in announcing their work for the season, all the choral associations again being well represented. The Birmingham Festival Choral Society propose to give, in addition to the customary Yule-tide performance of 'Messiah,' Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' cycle, Brahms's 'Requiem,' Act 3 of 'Tannhäuser,' Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' Hamilton Harty's 'The mystic trumpeter,' Palestrina's 'Surge Illuminare,' and Bach's great B minor Mass.

The Midland Musical Society's scheme includes 'Elijah,' Elgar's 'The Black Knight,' Dvorák's 'Spectre's bride,' and Bach's 'St. John' Passion. The Birmingham Choral and Orchestral Association's programme is to comprise Gaul's posthumous work, 'The Bard of Avon,' 'Hymn of Praise,' German's 'Tom Jones,' Gounod's 'Faust,' and 'The Messiah.' The Birmingham Choral Union's scheme has, at the time of writing, not been made known.

LIVERPOOL.

At the time of going to press the arrangements of the Philharmonic Society for the coming season comprise the usual twelve concerts, with Mr. Landon Ronald, Sir Henry Wood, Mr. Albert Coates, and distinguished foreigners as conductors. We refrain at present from giving details of the programmes, owing to the likelihood of considerable modifications.

The place of conductor for the choral concert on March for which the lamented Mr. Harry Evans had been engaged remains vacant at present; but his place as chorus-master the Philharmonic Society has been temporarily filled by appointment of Mr. R. H. Wilson, trainer of the Hallé Concerts Choir.

At a recent meeting of the executive committee of the Welsh Choral Union it was unanimously agreed that work begun and continued so successfully by their beloved and revered conductor, the late Mr. Harry Evans, must on. The Liverpool Welsh Choral Union is therefore maintained as a living monument to his memory, and the committee has decided to carry out the programme already arranged for next season and to engage guest-conductors.

Four concerts are to be given, at the first of which, November 21, Prof. Granville Bantock will conduct concert-performance of 'Parsifal.' In this work the choir will be prepared by Mr. Alfred Benton, for many years conductor of the Leeds Choral Union, and now a resident at Liverpool. 'The Messiah' will be performed December 19, conducted by a Welsh musician yet to be engaged, and at the third concert Madame Clara Butt and Mr. Kennerley Rumford will sing, and Mr. Bantock will conduct. For the fourth and final concert Elgar's 'Dre of Gerontius' is chosen.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

'At the time of going to press it is somewhat early hazard any opinion as to how far, if at all, the European war will affect the coming concert and opera seasons. Practically all arrangements have been completed, and the programmes are gradually disclosing themselves. In the June issue many of the features of the Hallé series were named, and now we learn that at the Brand Lane concert we shall have Schönberg's 'Two characteristic pieces,' Stravinsky's orchestral fantasia, 'Fireworks,' and Bela Bartók's two 'Portraits' (all for the first time here). Richter once played a symphonic-poem of Bartók's in which the well-known Emperor of Austria's hymn was gayer than the most distressing manner. Sapellnikov is coming, also Percy Grainger, who will conduct a number of his own compositions.

Mr. Lane's Philharmonic Choir expects also to produce some of the new Elgar choral songs; indeed, there is little doubt that they will be heard at Manchester this winter more than one occasion.

Of the twelve 'Prom.' concerts of the Manchester Orchestra, Limited, Belling will conduct half the number as last season, Bantock, Hamilton Harty, and Verbrugghe sharing the remainder, the last gentleman also playing solo violinist. Other solo violinists are Misses D. Kennedy and Kontorovich, Mr. Zacharevitch, and Mr. Sammons. In these columns and elsewhere an advance at these concerts towards music of a more symphonic type has been urged, and at least we are to get Tchaikovsky's No. 4 Symphony in its entirety, and possibly other Elgar's 'Cockaigne,' Coleridge-Taylor's 'Bamboula,' Chaminade's 'Callirhoe,' Bantock's new 'Scottish Highland' string suite, 'Comedy' Overture, and (for the first time here) 'Overture to a Greek tragedy,' all contribute to make this season's draft syllabus a much more interesting document than any recent ones.

So far the Manchester City Council has not seen its way to a continuance of its Municipal Concerts in the Town Hall with the Hallé band. The terms offered by the Hallé Society for the coming seasons were £100 per concert, which would have meant a loss (at sixpenny seats) of two shillings per head to the audience. Of course the Town Hall, unlike Birmingham's civic hall and some other centres, is quite inadequate for a big audience. But an alternative scheme of concerts under the management of Dr. J. Pyne has been arranged, aiming chiefly at the performance of neglected types of music. Its interest will probably be historical as well as educational and pleasurable, and it will have the additional merit of not trespassing on the preserve of any other already well-established organization in the city. Pieces for small combinations of voices and instruments, either blended or alone, and works employing unusual combinations of instruments are to have special attention.

all of us may hope the experiment will prove successful and lead to some permanent arrangement, but it cannot fill the place of such municipal concerts as were given in the spring of this year. Why in Manchester Cathedral can we not have 'Gerontius,' or the less familiar Mendelssohn ratorios, Beethoven or Brahms symphonies, such as are available at the great opening services at the Festival of the Three Choirs?

At the local College of Music the annual opera performance had been allowed to lapse recently, but Miss Marie Brema, who now has charge of this department, has brought about its revival, and on July 16 and 17 Purcell's 'Dido and Æneas' was given, but without full instrumental accompaniment. Apart altogether from the intrinsic musical interest, the dramatic side of the presentation had sufficient point to give vitality to the whole performance, and it was possible to vary the cast very materially on the second evening.

The Quinlan tour, which was to have opened here at the end of September, has been abandoned, as many of the artists are stranded and inaccessible in various European centres.

We have received the Syllabus of Dr. Carroll's Training Class for Music Teachers, Onward Hall. The eighth session will open on October 15. Further information may be obtained of the honorary secretary, Mr. George Pritchard, 30, Upper Chorlton Road, Manchester.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.
Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

HOBART (TASMANIA).—On June 29 the Orpheus Club gave their third subscription concert at the Town Hall, before a crowded audience. Under Mr. P. Planche-Plummer's direction creditable performances were given of Mendelssohn's 'To the sons of art' and a selection of part-songs. The vocalists were Mrs. R. Shoobridge and Mr. C. Stanway, and violin solos were given by Miss Eva Creese. Sir William and Lady Ellison-Macartney were present.

SWANAGE.—At the Mowlem Institute, on August 15, a highly successful concert in aid of the War Relief Fund was given under the able management of Mrs. Henry R. Clayton, who was fortunate in securing the professional services, freely given, of that excellent contralto, Miss Nellie Briercliffe, of Mr. Tristan Rawson, baritone, of the Grand Opera, Cologne, and of Miss Guida Framten, whose brilliant pianoforte playing was a revelation. Most valuable assistance was also rendered by Miss Constance Shearer (songs), Miss Grace Frost (pianoforte), Mrs. Rose (violin), Miss Murray Clayton (songs), Miss Beddall (recitation), and Mr. Percy Tisdale (songs); and a duologue by the Misses Daisy and Mollie Grosutt (daughters of the proprietor of the Grand Hotel, Swanage) was an effective and much-appreciated item in the evening's programme. The hall was packed to overflowing, and a sum of over £25 (a record for the hall) will be available for the Fund.

Foreign Notes.

BERLIN.

The lawsuit between the German and Austrian Societies of Composers was decided by the Kammergericht in favour of the Austrian Society, who will now return to their former custom of themselves collecting their rights in Germany.

MOSCOW.

S. T. Taneïev, the celebrated Russian composer, has written an elaborate analysis of the sketch-book which Mozart used at the age of eleven. This sketch-book contains 'Übungen im reinen Satz und Kontrapunkt' (exercises in pure style and counterpoint). A French translation of this analysis is published shortly.

MUNICH.

In connection with the Gluck celebration the Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Baiern, under the direction of A. Sandberger, have just published Gluck's intermezzo, 'Le Nozze d'Ercole e d'Ebe.' The work was written for the double wedding of Maximilian III. with Maria Anna, and Prinz Friedrich Christian with Maria Antonia, daughter of the Emperor Karl VII., and performed on June 29, 1747, at Pillnitz, near Dresden. Gluck borrowed for this work two arias from his 'Artamene' (including the famous 'Rasserena') and one aria from his 'Sophonisba.'

TURIN.

The very interesting study on 'The Lied in France,' by the distinguished Italian critic Luis Parigi, published in the Rivista Musicale Italiana, has been issued separately and will certainly be widely welcomed.

Miscellaneous.

As the Dalcroze College at Hellerau has been requisitioned as a hospital during the war, the London School of Dalcroze Eurhythmics, 23, Store Street, W.C., is making arrangements to give the full training preparatory to the teaching Certificate in Rhythmic Gymnastics and the Diploma in Eurhythmics. The term commences on September 29.

It was announced on August 14 that the directors of the Carl Rosa Opera Company had decided to persevere with at least the first part of their arranged tour. They propose to open at the Coronet Theatre on September 7, the Kennington Theatre on September 14, and the Marlborough Theatre on September 21.

The first-prize for the best song sent in at the recent open competition promoted by the 'Three Arts Club,' has been awarded to Dr. Cecil Hazlehurst for his setting of Shelley's lines 'Love's philosophy.' The publishing of the song by the 'Three Arts Club,' will, however, be delayed on account of the war.

We regret to announce the death of Alice Charbonnet de Dorson (Alice Kellermann), a well-known pianist, founder of the Sydney Conservatoire of Music.

It is announced that Prof. Granville Bantock has accepted the post of conductor to the North Staffordshire District Choral Society.

Mr. G. W. L. Marshall Hall has been appointed Ormond Professor of Music at the Melbourne University.

Answers to Correspondents.

CAPTAIN COOK (Australia).—The 'story' of Sibelius's 'Valse Triste,' as given by Mrs. Newmarch in the programme of the London Promenade Concerts, is as follows: 'It is night. The son who has been watching by the bedside of his sick mother has fallen asleep from sheer weariness. Gradually a ruddy light is reflected through the room; there is a sound of distant music; the glow and the music steal nearer until the strains of a valse melody float distantly to our ears. The sleeping mother awakens, rises from her bed, and in her long white garment, which takes the semblance of a ball-dress, begins to move slowly and silently to and fro. She waves her hands and beckons, in time to the music, as though she were summoning a crowd of invisible guests. And now they appear, these strange visionary couples, turning and gliding to an unearthly valse rhythm. The dying woman mingles with the dancers; she strives to make them look into her eyes, but the shadowy guests one and all avoid her glance. Then she seems to sink exhausted on to her couch, and the music breaks off. But presently she gathers all her strength, and invokes the dance once more with more energetic gestures than before. Back come the shadowy dancers, gyrating in a wild, mad rhythm. The weird gaiety reaches a climax; there is a knock at the door, which flies wide open; the mother utters a despairing cry; the spectral guests vanish; the music dies away. Death stands on the threshold.' (Quoted by kind permission.)

THE TIMES.

It is in its clear statement of facts, both in writing and by the use of simple diagrams, that Miss Julia O'Neill's book excels.

THE MORNING POST.

Her manner of putting down the facts is concise and clear. An immense amount of ground is covered in logical sequence, and the book is one of the most helpful publications as yet made. It is satisfactory to note that ear-cultivation is touched upon.

MUSICAL OPINION.

It is really surprising the amount of useful matter that Julia A. O'Neill has managed to compress within the covers of her primer, "A Practical Guide to the Theory of Music." Teachers who wish to keep abreast of the times in an educational sense will find this well-written guide calculated to help them to a knowledge of the latest and most accepted method of elementary theoretical instruction. We are pleased to note that the all-important subject of ear-culture has not been neglected in the present primer.

THE LADY.

Is a thoroughly praiseworthy attempt to present the cardinal facts of musical theory in a plain and straightforward manner to the beginner. Wholly admirable is the way the gradual formation of our present-day clefs is explained.

NEW EDITION (1912).

A HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS IN MUSIC

CONTAINING
600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS

BY
ERNEST A. DICKS,

FELLOW OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

The scope of this book covers the whole ground of theoretical examinations in music. It supplies an invaluable equipment to candidates entering for the various Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge held periodically throughout the country, and it will be found extremely useful to those who are preparing for the higher grades of Diploma and Degree Examinations.

The book is therefore very comprehensive. Its range includes questions and answers in Theory, Harmony, Counterpoint, Fugue, Acoustics, Musical History, Organ Construction, and C. Training.

By no means the least valuable part of the volume is that section consisting of upwards of one hundred pages, which contains reprint past examination papers set by the Associated Board, Trinity College and the Incorporated Society of Musicians; the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, London, Dublin, Durham, and Edinburgh, and the Victoria University; The Royal Academy of Music, The Royal College of Music and The Royal College of Organists. The advantage of having so many specimens of these actual examination papers within one cover is obvious to need further comment or commendation.

PREFACE TO THE NINTH EDITION.

The author desires to acknowledge his great indebtedness to authorities of the London University; The Royal Academy of Music, the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music; The Royal College of Organists; Trinity College, Music, London; and the Incorporated Society of Musicians, for their kindness in allowing him to incorporate copies of their latest Examination Papers in Parts II. and III. of his Handbook, in order that he may present their latest examination requirements.

Learn to Play at Sight

SIGHT PLAYERS are not born, but made—either by years of weary "practising" or in three months by the Ehremayer System of Pianoforte Sight-Playing. Which do you prefer?

Students of all degrees of proficiency—providing they have a knowledge of musical technique and of the pianoforte—can play new music or accompany new songs within their technical ability at first sight after three months' training by the Ehremayer System. Professional players also find their playing vastly improved—and their earning power greatly increased—after taking this course.

The Ehremayer System is the only Scientific method of Sight-Playing—it completely does away with the drudgery and monotony of constant practising—trains the student to read quickly and accurately and to play correctly without hesitation.

Students say: "I think your system is wonderful and so thorough; it solves every difficulty in a pleasant and interesting manner." "I have made marvellous strides in my playing through it." "I have now no difficulty whatever in reading or playing." "My improvement in reading solid chords and in tackling a page of music generally is vast."

WRITE FOR FREE BOOKLET explaining how you may become an expert Sight Reader in the shortest time and with least trouble by studying postal lessons at your home at your convenience.

TECHNIQUE TECHNIQUE TECHNIQUE

"For a pianist three things are necessary. The first is technique, the second is technique, the third is technique." The success of nearly six thousand pupils has proved convincingly that, in from three to five months,

'From Brain to Keyboard'

MACDONALD SMITH'S SYSTEM
OF PIANOFORTE TOUCH AND TECHNIQUE

GIVES PERMANENT MASTERY OVER ALL DIFFICULTIES OF TECHNIQUE.

Pianist's Cramp, Stiffness, Wooden Touch, Lack of Power and Independence, Thumping, Nervousness, Inability to read at sight, to play arpeggios, trills and long skips, faulty inflection and accentuation are all overcome with amazing rapidity by the eight minutes twice daily application of this System. In fact there is not a single technical requirement of the pianist or organist, from beginner to the most advanced, which is not successfully met by this System. And the results are permanent and not materially affected by neglect of the instrument. By adopting this system the necessity for perpetual keyboard 'practice' is totally abolished—a point of the highest value to the busy hard-working pianist.

Write for my FREE BOOK to-day

I shall be pleased to send you post-free 'Light on Pianoforte Playing' which explains my System and its principles. If you will detail any special difficulties you have, I will explain how they can be permanently overcome by the 'From Brain to Keyboard' System. Write to-day to

DR. ARNE

AND

RULE, BRITANNIA

BY

WILLIAM HAYMAN CUMMINGS.

PREFACE.

The glorious National Song, "Rule, Britannia," is familiar to the whole British Race; nevertheless, very few men and women are acquainted with the history of its birth and parentage.

In the following pages I have endeavoured to chronicle all the facts which are discoverable by diligent research, and to present them in an attractive and entertaining manner.

The life of Dr. Arne, the composer of "Rule, Britannia," offers to the reader and to the music student an interesting and instructive story, showing that natural ability, even when combined with genius, is not sufficient to ensure a triumphant and successful career. Morality and conscientious rectitude in the affairs of life are essential, and had Arne exercised these, his exceptional gifts might have enabled him to surpass his great contemporary, Handel.

It only remains to be noted that many letters and documents are here printed for the first time, some of them copied from the original autographs in my possession. They illuminate much which has hitherto been obscure and uncertain in the career of a famous composer.

THE ARTIST AND THE PEOPLE.

BY ERNEST NEWMAN.

Is it the fault of the composers or of the peoples that national songs are as a rule such poor stuff? Why should our soldiers in France go marching to the most wretched of music-hall songs when we have composers of the calibre of Elgar and antock in the country? Is it that the composers cannot write the sort of music that will satisfy at once the musician and the populace, or that the populace has no ear for any but the most obvious music? In his D major 'Pomp and Circumstance' March, Elgar has given the soldiers an ideal piece of 'popular' music in the best sense of that term. I wonder how many soldiers know it, and of those who do, how many realise how thoroughly good it is? It gives one an uneasy sense that we artists and the mass of mankind live in different mental worlds, over the frontiers of which it is impossible for either us or them to pass into each other's territory. The potency of art resides not so much in what it actually says as in the response it calls out from each hearer's past intellectual and emotional life. Elgar's March seems to me a vigorous, inspiring piece of music, full of the animal spirits that one would expect to be of irresistible appeal to the soldier. But do I only think so because the music complies perfectly with my notions as an artist of what a breezy march should be; and does the soldier, lacking the more or less conventional artistic mould into which to pour his feelings, fail to see Elgar's work quite as I do, and so fail to appreciate it as I do? On the other hand, certain music stirs an emotion in him that I, for my part, frankly cannot imagine any intelligent human being feeling an interest in. From musical mood that I should call unbearably coarse or insufferably sloppy, he seems to extract at least as much spiritual nourishment as I can extract from Bach or Wagner; and I am not at all prepared to say that, in the last resort, it is not spiritual nourishment of much the same kind as well as the same degree. To me a song like 'The Rosary' is merely the snivel of a distempered puppy; but I can well believe that to the man in the street, or the maiden in the picture-house, it opens such glimpses of paradise as are given me by things like Bach's Aria for the G string or the Adagio of the Ninth Symphony. The curious thing is that in face of the supreme realities of life, art—even to artists and lovers of art—becomes strangely small and unreal. We see this incidentally in the general abandonment of concerts for the whole coming year during the first few weeks of mental strain that we all went through at the commencement of the war. It is no disparagement of art to say that it is not life,—indeed, as artists, we have always had to insist both on the ideality of art and the impossibility of confusing the quality of the art with the character of the artist. But in times of supreme crisis one begins to understand the Philistine point of view that art is merely a plaything for idle hours. During the first few weeks of August we were all of us, I think, intellectually and emotionally shaken as we have never been before by any trouble, public or private. I can speak with certainty, of course, only of my own state of mind, but no doubt it was that of many others. I found myself for some weeks incapable of thinking seriously about music,—not from any panic fear, but simply because, in face of the tremendous realities that life suddenly opened out before us all, music seemed to me utterly remote and unreal. It was not merely that to sit at home and pamper the soul with delicate, sweet sounds while the blood of Europe was being poured out, appeared as callous as to be fiddling while Rome was burning; it was that the critical appraisement of music—the occupation in which some of us have to spend our lives—suddenly took on an almost ludicrous air of insignificance. What in the name of all that was rational did it matter whether a particular melody of Strauss's was good or bad, or whether Rimsky-Korsakov was or was not an over-rated composer at present? To sit down solemnly and write at length about such things, and be prepared to fly at the throat of any one who contradicted us, seemed as absurd as for a family to be quarrelling a whole day about the relative merits of the humming of this insect or that in the garden, while inside the house some one was dying in slow agony.

This mood is bound to pass away, of course. Art would not have been evolved as it has been through all the centuries were it not as vital a part of our being as the desire for food or for love; and when the normal balance of our mental life has been restored, we artists will come to think, as before, that art, in its own way, is as real as what the world calls reality. But that frame of mind requires a certain ease in life, a certain abstraction from life: and the value of our recent experiences is the proof that artistic emotion cannot exist in the soul at the same time as an overwhelming emotion derived from reality, and the inference this perhaps authorises that the reason the 'people' are not more artistic is that for them 'life' is too real. In the daily struggle with poverty, disease, and death, there is little time for looking beyond and within to the new Jerusalem. It is a familiar phenomenon that to the Swiss mountaineer the Alps are less a vision of unspeakable beauty than a means to a livelihood. One must come to reality from a distance, see it from a distance, and see it comparatively rarely, to colour it with the ideal. To the millions who yearly trudged over Westminster Bridge, it was simply a footway to the day's toil and back again, to be forgotten when the day's toil was over; it needed the sudden flashing of the which, curiously enough, was perverted by Waldteufel into another successful waltz without anybody recognising the similarity :

and which came over later (about ten years or so ago) in a comic opera from Germany in a new version which kept barrel organs very busy for that fairly well-defined period that marks the limitations of popular success :

As an incident it might be pointed out that one of the most attractive—from the sentimental point of view—songs that ever made an appeal to the sympathies of the less-cultured section of the German nation, was the following tune by Bendel :

One version, of a deep and poetical character, that has exercised its influence on thousands of all nations in time of mourning, is from Chopin :

and it is scarcely necessary to quote the Funeral March ('Saul') of Handel, which the Polish melody appears to have displaced of recent years for obsequial ceremonies, but the basis on which the tune pivots is practically identical.

Another elaboration of the phrase, by an effective persistence, enabled Rubinstein to find a theme for one of his most popular pianoforte pieces :

The myriad unblushing plagiarisms of the idea by average composers that clamour for its protection by law, year in year out, can easily be discovered by those interested, but that the aristocrats of music-making have not been impervious to its spell, and that the critical cognoscenti appreciate the familiar without recognising its actual banality, can be demonstrated by the much-lauded broadly-swinging phrase allotted to Chrysothemis by Richard Strauss in his 'Electra,' and form a fitting conclusion to the illustrations :

There are other clichés not less significant than the two cited which would repay examination. Of course, the notes of the diatonic scale are naturally limited, and even their sequences suffer regulation. The hopelessness of any attempt to create a new tune from the contents of an ordinary scale is self-evident. The melody of the future will be evolved from harmonic progressions, from the contents of generously elaborate chord devices, but never from the line process. Some of the most indifferent composers are already feeling the point, and they are wearing to death a number of chord-sequence clichés that would provide ample material for a lengthy article if the spirit moved one. As an illustration of this tendency, the following progression :

with one or two variants in the harmonic treatment of the F# or F#, has become almost insufferable by the frequency with which it is glibly offered for consumption. In one publisher's thematic catalogue, printed on the back of a song whose main appeal to popularity was based on this identical phrase, nine out of the round dozen specimen first-eight bars flaunted the progression in one form or the other. Practically all the music of an extremely popular kind must necessarily be reminiscent. Its composer,—as composition is done nowadays with the aid of a pianoforte, and fingers that can only go the way of reminiscence,—honestly believes he is evolving at least an original form of a musical thought that should prove attractive to the public he appeals to ; and curiously enough, if the public has heard it before or is in sympathy with its protoplasmic parentage, it has all the possibility, with generous luck, of establishing itself as a success. The happy tune that carries our troops in rhythmic swing through the roads of England, France, and Belgium (vide the newspaper correspondents) has been written almost note for note years ago as a popular Irish ballad. The difference between 'Eileen Alannah' and 'It's a long, long way to Tipperary' is only a rhythmical one, but the composer of the soldiers' marching song can be very proud that he hit upon the diversion. A correspondent has suggested that it would be difficult to find a good popular melody written by a 'reputable' English composer, based on the lines of the descending scale. To fit the adjectival requirements I can offer one by Sir Edward Elgar, and its goodness and popularity are scarcely to be questioned :

but whether it deserves copyright is another matter altogether.

NATIONAL ANTHEMS: THEIR BIRTH AND PARENTAGE.

By H. C. COLLES.

On September 1 the National Anthems of the four Allies were brought together in the programme of the Promenade Concert at Queen's Hall. They had been assembling gradually according as Sir Henry Wood found time to score them for his orchestra; first 'God save the King' and 'La Marseillaise,' a little later the Belgian 'La Brabançonne,' finally the well-known Russian tune 'God save the Tsar' (or 'God, the All-Terrible') completed the quartet and cemented the alliance.

While we speak of them all as 'national anthems,' two of them, the French and the Belgian, are scarcely well-fitted by the term 'anthem,' which bears a distinctly religious connotation, and the Russian tune, the work of a military composer of the last century, has not quite the wide significance for the Russian people that our national song has for us. The fact is that 'God save the King' has been the parent of national anthems in other countries. Like so many other British institutions it was not made; it just grew. The most careful research has failed to reveal its origin. Dr. W. H. Cummings did all that could be done when, in the Musical Times of 1878, he pointed out the various sources which may have contributed their shares to the formation of the melody which Henry Carey claimed as his own when he first produced it with the words which stamped it as the song of our national aspiration.

There is no need to review the history of 'God save the King' here; everyone can read it in Dr. Cummings's writings,* in Chappell's 'Popular Music of the Olden Time,' or summarized in a book of reference such as 'Grove's Dictionary.' The important fact is not who made up tune or words, but in what circumstances it came to be accepted as our National Anthem. There can be no doubt that that event came about as a consequence of Carey's production of it in 1740.

The occasion was a congratulatory dinner after the taking of Porto Bello from the Spaniards by Admiral Vernon, in November, 1739. Though it celebrated a victory it was not a peculiarly glorious moment in our history. Walpole had been forced into war with Spain for the protection of British trade, and this was but a small success in a complicated campaign in which a little later we were to meet with reverses leading to the resignation of the Minister. Though 'God save the King' voiced the sentiment of a party of gentlemen congratulating one another over their dinner, it did not strike home immediately to a people peculiarly devoted either to God or their King. The religion and the patriotism of England were alike at a low ebb, but a better spirit was to come, the spirit which produced, and was in turn fostered by, such big men as Edmund Burke in politics, Samuel Johnson in social life and letters, John Wesley in the revival of religious devotion. It was in the latter half of the century when these influences were gradually gaining ground that 'God save the King' struck root, because it was found to be typical of the national spirit alike in the solid splendour of its melody and the confident insularity of its words.

In times of peace—the times which we have known from the end of the Napoleonic wars until to-day—we have had some misgivings about the words, especially about those of the second verse, but we have never had the least doubt about the tune; the general appeal which it makes has seemed to ourselves and to other nations a fitting expression of a nation's unity. Switzerland has made it the symbol of federal independence, and those—amongst whom was the writer—who were in Switzerland lately when a general mobilization was ordered on the eve of the national festival (August 1) heard 'Heil dir Helvetia' sung to the tune of 'God save the King,' not as a call to war, but as a prayer for protection. German imperialism has annexed the tune, as it would annex everything else, and has fitted it with such stanzas as:

Heil dir im Sieges Kranz, Herrscher des Vaterlands!
Heil, Kaiser, dir!
Fühl' in des Thrones Glanz
Die hohe Wonne ganz:
Liebling des Volks zu sein!
Heil, Kaiser, dir!

Russia, until the Tsar Nicholas I. determined that his army should have a song of its own, had made similar use of it.

The new Russian song came into being by Imperial command, just as Haydn's famous Austrian Hymn did. The chief difference was that Lvov wrote a tune and got words set to it; Haydn had to follow the more usual process of setting words to music. Both Haydn and Lvov seem to have owed something to the English precedent. Haydn was commissioned to write his National Anthem a few years after his visits to England; Lvov has left it on record in his memoirs that he had in mind the different qualities of the English, French, and Austrian Anthems, when he undertook his task. A translation of his own account of how he evolved the Russian Anthem may be found in Mr. Montagu-Nathan's recently-published 'History of Russian music.'

Dr. W. H. Hadow has shown in 'A Croatian composer' how Haydn in 1797 took the first phrase of a Croatian folk-song as the basis of his tune, and in the same work he has traced the stages of its development. In those stages Haydn has completely metamorphosed the original idea into something stately in measure and solid in harmonic design. It is in the latter quality, especially in the alterations which he made from the first sketch to the final form, that the indirect influence of the English Anthem may be traced. But the result bears no direct resemblance to the English Anthem. Lvov, in the passage already referred to, speaks of 'God save the King' as 'imposing,' of Haydn's Austrian Hymn as 'touching,' and he showed himself a sound critic in the distinction, for there is a much greater imaginative appeal in Haydn's tune than in the firmly set and concise English one. Lvov profited by both examples. The general mould of his tune and the character of the opening phrases seem inspired by England; the appealing rise in the melody of the second half after the beautiful minor cadence may be traced to the influence of Austria, and at that point it bears distinct likeness to the second part of the hymn which Haydn shaped with so much careful thought.

The French influence of which Lvov also speaks is not apparent, unless we consider that the 'originality' which struck him as its chief characteristic found an echo in his own minor cadence. But as has been already hinted, 'La Marseillaise' was not primarily a national anthem at all, but a marching song for an army. Anyone who has marched to it knows how splendid it is for that purpose, how it sets the blood stirring and gives spring and elasticity to every muscle. Rouget de Lisle, its composer, was a soldier like Lvov, but a soldier under orders to march with a small volunteer force with the immediate prospect of action, while Lvov was a soldier surveying a huge army paraded before its Emperor in time of peace.

Naturally, therefore, 'La Marseillaise' has the inspiration of an emergency, of a sudden call to heroic action, and it is an inspiration quite distinct from any of the other national anthems we have been considering. It is felt in every detail of its urgent rhythm, in the anacrusis preceding the first bar, the stalwart crotchets of that bar, the syncopation leaping to anticipate an accent in the third bar, the ringing call of the lines:

'Aux armes, citoyens, Formez vos bataillons.'

and the abrupt, unpolished ending.

Being the inspiration of a moment it inevitably underwent some change when the moment was past and the song became the voice of a great people. With this song the French populace marched upon the Tuileries in August, 1792; with it they have marched to defeats far more glorious than the success of that day, and will, we believe, march to victories which will eclipse all memories of defeat. 'La Marseillaise' therefore offers one of the best possible instances of how a song gets shaped by the popular voice. Compare the original version printed in 'Grove's Dictionary' with the tune as we hear it to-day, and immediately the changes, all of them improvements towards directness and simplicity, are seen. Subtleties of melody and accentuation, which an amateur picking out the tune on his violin (as we are told de Lisle did) would devise, got swept away as soon as the tune came to the mouths of the men on the march, and it has proved better without them. And then that instrumental 'symphony' or fanfare which de Lisle tacked on to the end—how many who have not looked up the early editions know that it ever existed? It was a mistake, and the common consciousness has wiped it out. 'God save the King,' too, has undergone the same process of popular improvement, but since, as we have seen, we cannot trace its actual birth, as we can that of 'La Marseillaise,' the process is less strongly marked.

We now come to the last of the National Anthems which press upon our attention at the moment, the one which of those under discussion has been until now least familiar to English people, but which most calls out our sympathy just now—that of Belgium. It came into existence in much the same way as did 'La Marseillaise,' but in a time of even greater national stress, in fact, in the last great crisis through which the much-troubled state of Belgium passed before the even more terrible one which confronts it to-day.

The revolution of 1830 was the rising of the Belgian people to end an impossible amalgamation of their country with Holland under the sovereignty of King William, an amalgamation which had existed with constant friction and difficulty since the European settlement following upon Waterloo in 1815. Political conflicts of various kinds brought a tide of intense national enthusiasm upon Belgium which culminated on August 25, 1830, in the hoisting of the old Brabançon flag at Brussels, the tearing down of the royal insignia from public buildings, and the declaration of open rebellion. It was a revolt for nationality, not for a change of dynasty. Eventually Belgium was to accept the King offered to them by the Powers assembled in conference in London; all it asked was an independent state, and that it won.

It was during this revolt that Jenneval produced the words of a song fitted to the needs of the hour, claiming justice for his people, hurling passionate reproaches upon the ruling House of Nassau, driving home the appeal of his words with a fervent refrain pointing to 'the tree of liberty':

Trop généreuse en sa colère,
La Belgique vengeant ses droits;
D'un Roi qu'elle appelait son père
N'implorait que de justes lois:
Mais lui, dans sa fureur étrange,
Par le canon que son fils a pointé
Au sang Belge a noyé l'orange
Sous l'arbre de la liberté.

That is the second verse of four, all of which strike the same note till the fourth, which rises to a higher plane of feeling in the thought of those who have fallen for their country:

Sous l'humble terre où l'on vous range
Dormez, martyrs, bataillon indompté,
Dormez en paix, loin de l'orage
Sous l'arbre de la liberté.

Jenneval himself soon joined the 'bataillon indompté,' for he died fighting at Lierre on September 18, less than a month after the outbreak of revolt.

The tune to which these impressive words were set was composed by François van Campenhout, who, unlike the composer of 'La Marseillaise,' was a trained musician. His works, including six operas, make quite a formidable list, and he was a tenor singer with a reputation which extended at least into France and Holland. His position will account for everything which we feel to-day to be unsympathetic in the tune itself. 'La Marseillaise' strikes home instantly to every hearer whether he knows the words or not; 'La Brabançonne' may appear to the uninitiated hearer to be nothing more than a fairly energetic march of the jaunty kind. Campenhout evidently approached his share from outside, as a musician thinking what would appeal to the people, and writing with that end in view. His work was no doubt perfectly sincere, but it has not the intensity which either Jenneval or Rouget de Lisle brought to theirs. It is obviously influenced by 'La Marseillaise,' it begins with the same anacrusis, its general rhythm is of the same type. But the rhythm once adopted is used with sameness throughout, and it lacks that wonderful suppleness which thrills every hearer of the French song.

Campenhout's tune was undoubtedly borne into favour on the strength of Jenneval's words with which it was associated. The actual conditions to which those words refer are long past, and only the spirit behind them remains and rises to meet a situation even more critical than that which Belgium had to meet in 1830. The tune stands to-day as the symbol of that spirit by virtue of its history; but those who hear it for the first time cannot feel that it has the intrinsic qualities which would raise it above the position of a symbol into an adequate artistic expression of that spirit in the way that the tunes of 'God save the King' and 'La Marseillaise' express the respective aspirations of England and of France. In each of these cases the music is self-sufficient; in 'La Brabançonne' the poet spoke through the music and scarcely required the music to give wings to his message. The patriotism and the pathos of Belgium are summed up in lines by Jenneval which appear upon the title-page of an edition of 'La Brabançonne,' issued shortly after his death. They may fitly end this article:

Qui dort sous ce tombeau couvert par la Victoire
Des nobles attributs de l'immortalité?
De simples citoyens dont un mot dit l'histoire:
MORTS POUR LA LIBERTÉ.

THE QUESTION OF CHARITY CONCERTS.

BY LANDON RONALD.

The Charity Concert is once again rampant in our midst. It has spread like the bubonic plague. Every member of the musical profession is suffering from it in some form or other. And there are no doctors to deal with it, no surgeons to cut it out, no strong hand to stay its deadly course. A few stray articles and one or two indignant letters of protest appear in the daily press, without any effect being made or any notice being taken. The free services of all musicians are looked upon and considered to be the property of the charity concert-giver; and if any should be so bold as to pray for a small fee to pay for out-of-pocket expenses, they are dubbed 'unpatriotic.'

There is so much to be said for both sides of the case that it seems worth while to study the problem carefully. The case of the artist is undoubtedly a pathetic one. The artist as a rule is never born in the lap of luxury. The musical education of a girl or boy has generally been paid for at considerable sacrifice on the part of the parents or some interested relations or friends. When the time arrives that the education is finished, that the student has developed into a promising young artist, then the real struggle begins. A few pounds are got together—nearly always blood-money—to give the first concert, and we all know the results of that first concert! A great reception at the hands of personal friends who have been given tickets to be present, a few innocuous press notices, and the long, long waiting and hoping ensues.

In the case of the specially qualified débutants, their reputation gradually spreads among artists and concert-givers, and some lucky opportunity presents itself which brings them prominently before the public; their career is started, and it is up to them to 'make good.'

Those who have not these gifts, and to whom an opportunity is never likely to come, are still content to work and hope and live in the belief that their time will come. These are the genus that society people so often take an interest in by allowing them to play and sing at their houses for nothing. They are rarely called upon to take part in charity concerts owing to their being unknown, and no attraction to the general public.

On the other hand, the artist who has considerable reputation, gained by dint of long study, hard work, and many gifts, is an article of great value to charity concerts. As a matter of fact, it is very often most difficult for him to make both ends meet, but he has always to 'keep up appearances' and adopt the rôle of the successful man. He would never be offered a small fee for expenses, because he is a 'gentleman,' and one would not like to 'hurt his feelings.' It is entirely forgotten that his stock-in-trade is his voice or his instrument. To have acquired a certain perfection in either has meant years of hard work and the spending of a great deal of money. The only means he has of recouping himself is to be paid to perform. And therein lies the whole problem of the charity concert.

Let the artist be paid for his stock-in-trade, and leave him a free hand to give what he can afford to any charity he may think fit, just like any ordinary individual. No one dreams of going to Harrod's, Selfridge's, or Whiteley's, or even the smaller tradesmen, and asking them to give of their stock-in-trade. No, they are left a free hand, and as has been proved again and again have given large sums of money to the good cause.

And the musician should not be asked to give of his goods for nothing any more than the tradesman is, but should be paid for them and allowed to give afterwards what he may think fit.

This principle, oddly enough, is adhered to by charity concert-givers in regard to advertisements, printing, and the rent of the hall. It is but very seldom that one hears of the hall being given free or the printing being done for nothing; and there has never been a case that can be traced where newspapers have inserted advertisements free of charge. The only thing that draws the public to the hall is the performer, and he is the only factor that is asked to do something for nothing!

The case for the artist has been dealt with at some length, because there is but little to say for the charity concert-giver. There is generally an 'influential' committee formed, and one or two of them are commissioned as a rule to approach some influential member of the musical profession to prepare an attractive concert for them. If he consent, it generally gives him an enormous amount of work and correspondence, places him under deep obligations to his brother and sister artists, and as recompense he receives a kind letter of thanks 'from the chairman on behalf of the committee.'

All the committee do is to try to sell tickets, attend committee meetings, and plague the life out of some poor fellow who, in a weak moment, undertakes the duties of honorary secretary!

The charity is nearly always largely benefited by these concerts; they are seldom or never a failure. Therefore it behoves all artists strenuously to resist appearing for nothing.

We are in the midst of a terrible, dastardly war, thrust on us by an unscrupulous enemy. Patriotism and charity are quite rightly in the air, but let both be tempered with wisdom and justice. Hundreds of thousands of innocent people are going to be sufferers, or are actually suffering. Let it be well remembered that the musician, both successful and unsuccessful, is among the acute sufferers; that his lot is just every bit as deserving of consideration as that of any other member of this great army of war victims.

The nervous temperament that goes to the making of an artist, makes him more sensitive than most of his fellow creatures. He is more highly-strung, more impressionable, more susceptible to outside influences than the average hard-working man. Therefore his sufferings will be keener and more acute.

Let all this be remembered, and let him not be passed over and imposed upon in the sacred name of Charity.

Since our September number was issued it has been announced that the Cardiff Festival has been abandoned. The Blackpool, Nottingham, and Hastings Competitive Festivals have also been given up.

We are compelled to hold over until next month the remainder of Mr. H. Elliot Button's article on 'Musical Notation.'

Occasional Notes.

There can be no doubt that the CHOIRS AND committees of many choral Societies THE WAR. of all kinds have been sorely troubled in endeavouring to decide what is the best and the morally right thing to do as to carrying on during the war. In some cases abandonment has been found inevitable, but we venture to believe that in the majority of cases it would be possible and in every way advantageous to maintain existence. A choir is not only a body with a musical objective. It is also largely a social gathering where lifelong friendships are made, and to many thousands of persons the weekly meetings are a spiritual stimulus and a source of deep pleasure. Is it wise suddenly to snap this bond and solace of companionship and sympathy at such a time? Are the tens of thousands of choralists who flock so enthusiastically to practices only intent upon preparing for a concert? Do they not derive untold pleasure from the practices during which the potentialities of a piece of music are gradually unfolded? Is there no mission in these times for choirs to give informal performances that will cheer their neighbours, more especially the poorest, who perhaps can never afford to come to the grand concerts? Even where choirs are so depleted of men who have gone nobly to the defence of their country that four-part music is impossible, there is no good reason why the female members should not continue to meet at practice instead of 'grousing' at home. There is an ample and beautiful repertory of music for female-voice choirs that is a sealed book to singers who are connected only with mixed-voice choirs. Such an arrangement would keep a Society in being, and provide much-needed employment for conductors and accompanists. We earnestly commend these considerations to all concerned with choirs.

We are glad to have the influential support of Mr. Landon Ronald in the opinion we expressed last month that the profession should be fairly treated when in the present situation they are engaged or shall we say induced—to assist at charity concerts. In flourishing times there may be a show of reason for prosperous artists giving vent to their altruism. But just now, when most of us are so severely stricken, the concert artist-labourer is surely worthy of his hire. We have been informed, but not authoritatively, that the musical profession is not to be considered in the distribution of the Prince of Wales's Fund. Why not?

Although choral societies and concert-givers generally are badly hit by the economic and other dire effects of the war, there are happily not wanting signs of 'a certain liveliness' (to use the now classic phrase) that may by its suggestiveness lead the way to a more hopeful outlook. Amongst the most praiseworthy decisions to keep the banner of music flying, we must give high place to the municipal and other promoters of the Brighton Musical Festival, who with undaunted courage have decided to carry out the excellent scheme announced some time ago. Seven grand concerts are to be given at the Dome on November 10, 11, 12, 13, 14. The programmes will include 'Parsifal' (Acts 2 and 3), 'Elijah,' 'Messiah,' a Wagner programme,* and miscellaneous orchestral selections. The all-British conductors will be Sir Henry Wood, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Sir Hubert Parry, Sir Frederick Bridge, Mr. Landon Ronald, Sir C. V. Stanford, Mr. Thomas Beecham, and Mr. Lyell Tayler (general-conductor of the Festival); the artists are almost exclusively British, and of the first rank. To these resources will be added the Brighton Festival Choir and Orchestra (led by Mr. Ketelbey) of 350 performers. Whilst it is almost too much to hope that the enterprise will be so successful financially as in happier circumstances it might have been, we trust that it will have the appreciative support of music-lovers in the district, and further, we hope to find that the Brighton example will be followed elsewhere. At all events Brighton has no rival Festival in the field. Like the 'Last rose of summer' it stands blooming alone.

No other point in connection with CONSECUTIVE the progression of parts in harmony FIFTHS. has given more trouble to theorists than the laying down of rules for the use of consecutive fifths. What is the physical reason, if any, and failing that the psychological reason, why fifths are sometimes undoubtedly disagreeable and sometimes as undoubtedly acceptable? So far, the theorists have not been able to help very much. The old rhyme 'I do not like thee, Dr. Fell, the reason why I cannot tell,' occurs to us. The latest attempt to get at the root of the matter appeared in The Times Literary Supplement for September 10, in the course of a short review of Dr. C. H. Kitson's absorbingly interesting book, 'The Evolution of Harmony,' recently published by the Clarendon Press, Oxford. The review says:

The explanation of 'consecutives' (pp. 48-52) does not seem quite satisfactory. The individual prohibitions are not sufficiently related to some common principle. This principle may be shortly sketched in a series of propositions: (1) One object of art is to get rid of unrelatedness; as between note and note, melody achieves this by grace notes, harmony by the prohibition of consecutives (amongst other things). (2) A major triad in root position implies a moment of finality. (3) The octave, fifth, and major third together make up, and singly hint at, the major triad in root position. (4) A second major triad, if related to the first, clinches that finality; if unrelated implies two final but different moments, and with that introduces a callous point into the sensitive web of harmony. (5) Similar contrapuntal motion draws attention primarily to the second chord, and retrospectively to the first. (6) The unrelatedness is least felt when the contrapuntal leap is a fourth or fifth, most when it is a major or minor tone. A semitone (diatonic or chromatic) is a melodic rather than a harmonic interval, and two similar triads at this distance are felt as substitutions the one for the other; one is practically a grace note to the other. (7) The ill effect is diminished when one of the chords is minor, or both are so; and it is not felt with consecutive fourths, not even with the 'Six-four' if it is properly managed, because the fourth effectively negates the third and fifth. With some such statement of principle the instances, upon which all, of course, turns, might have been correlated.

Whether this ingenious and subtle explanation will hold water we are not at present prepared to say. It is enough just now to accept thankfully the consoling dictum that fifths may be regarded as grace notes. Callous and rule-bound harmony teachers so often unfeelingly blue-pencil them as 'disgrace' notes.

In the pianoforte syllabus of the Associated Board for 1915, the eighty-one studies and pieces are chosen from the works of forty-six composers. The names, with the number of works used, are as follows: Bach (7), Beethoven (6), W. S. Bennett (2), Berens (1), Bertini (1), Frank Bridge (1), Brunner (1), Von Ahn Carse (1), Clementi (1), Le Couppey (3), Cramer (3), Cesar Cui (1), Czerny (7), Diabelli (1), Duvernoy (1), Farjeon (1), Field (1), Rudolf Friml (1), Grieg (2), Gurliitt (2), Haydn (2), Heller (1), Herz (1), Hiller (1), Horvath (1), Hüntten (1), Jensen (1), Loeschhorn (4), James Lyon (1), Mendelssohn (2), Moscheles (1) Moszkowski (3), Mozart (2), Müller (1), Hubert Parry (1), Reinecke (3), Albert Renaud (1), Alex Roloff (1), Scarlatti (1), Schäfer (1), Schumann (1), Spurling (1), Charles Villiers Stanford (1), Steibelt (1), Colin Taylor (1), and Zilcher (2). The eight names in italics appear for the first time in these lists.

It is announced that the Music Committee of the Corporation of London has decided not to engage German, Austrian, or Hungarian professors at the Guildhall School of Music; and that they have also decided that in future only pianofortes of British make shall be used at the School. We are informed that there are at present no vacancies on the teaching staff.

According to the Berlin Press (says The Times of September 23), Dr. Richter has renounced the honorary degrees in Music conferred on him by the Universities of Oxford and Manchester, 'of which he has hitherto been proud.' Probably this course was inevitable. We wish it were as inevitable that the fortune the distinguished conductor made in this country could also be renounced.

CHOPIN AS A MASTER OF FORM.

By A. REDGRAVE CRIPPS.

CHOPIN'S FORM ESSENTIALLY INDIVIDUAL.

It would be easy to adduce other examples of Chopin's perfect mastery of form in the widest sense, but enough, it is to be hoped, has been said to show that the 'form' which Chopin uses, differing widely as it does from the sonata-form and forms of a similar order, is none the less a true form, capable of justification on the intellectual side. It differs from the sonata-form in that it is more subtle, more flexible, and, it may be added, more individual. Perhaps it is this 'individual' quality which has prevented it being more generally recognised by theorists; since a form which springs naturally from the nature of a man's materials must necessarily seem less definitely a 'form' than a form which seems capable of being regarded as a definite entity. But in reality the sonata-form, as displayed for instance in the finer examples of Beethoven, is in a certain sense equally individual. It must not be forgotten that there is hardly a single sonata of Beethoven that really corresponds to the theorist's idea of 'sonata-form'; and the practical proof of this lies in the fact that, with hardly an exception, they were originally regarded, by the theorists of the day, as extremely irregular and revolutionary. In Beethoven's case the authority of a great name, combined perhaps with that influence which the passage of time has in breaking down even the strongest prejudice, have caused theorists to reconsider their attitude and accept his works (though not without misgivings and reservations). Indeed, overlooking altogether the spirit which lies behind them and alone gives them vitality, they have even gone so far as to hold them up to students as models to follow in their own early attempts at composition. Perhaps in some years Chopin's works will be similarly recognised (!), and we shall have students casting their first attempts at composition in forms suggested by him—as if, in his case also, form can have any significance apart from the spirit which has given it birth.

ESSENTIAL CHARACTER OF CHOPIN'S FORM (AS CONTRASTED WITH 'SONATA-FORM').

Though, however, the type of form which Chopin uses is thus in a very real sense strictly comparable with the sonata-form as displayed in the works of Beethoven, inasmuch as both are true spiritual forms, there is nevertheless, as said, a very real difference between them. We need not pause here to make any comparison between Chopin and Beethoven, with a view to estimating what may be called their absolute-relative qualities; such comparisons, though almost invariably made by writers on the former (and always of course to his disadvantage), are best left to school-girls—or to school-masters. One might as profitably compare a palm-tree and an oak, and ask which is the 'better.' To place, however, the sonata-form as exemplified by Beethoven, and Chopin's type of form together for a moment may help to bring out the essential characteristics of each, and thus serve a profitable purpose. It may be said, that the sonata-form is stationary; Chopin's form progressive. In the one we have a firm groundwork already laid down; the definite disposal of 'subject' and keys gives an effect (consciously or unconsciously) of safety or security, and the interest lies mainly in the way in which the details are carried out. In a form of Chopin's type, on the other hand, the framework is created as the piece proceeds. We are borne along from point to point, with the mind always, as it were, on the stretch; and it is only when the end is reached that we are able at last to survey the road we have come, and piece the various elements of the scheme together in their proper relation. The one type of form is comparable to architecture, the other to poetry. Or, to change the simile, we might say that the one is static, the other dynamic. It is this onward, progressive character which makes Chopin's music—to those who listen with anything more than their ears—so fatiguing to follow; and it is easy to conceive what an immense strain the composition of such works must have imposed on his frail constitution.

CHOPIN'S INTENSITY.

Of course, the difference is at bottom psychological; and here, if I may for a moment overstep the limits I have set myself, and try to express in one word in what the essential quality of Chopin's work lies, I should say—in his intensity. If he has not (as his admirers are so fond of telling us) Beethoven's depth, he burns at least with a fiercer, more concentrated fire. There is that in his work which suggests a white, vivid flame. Writers on Chopin often lay stress on his 'refinement,' as if that were his most characteristic quality; and if by refinement is meant not mere refinement of detail, but essential refinement of thought, this is not without a certain justification. There is no composer who so habitually, and, as it were, without effort, as by some divine instinct avoids the commonplace. In the whole of his work there is hardly to be found one single banal phrase, or tiresome and threadbare progression. But refinement is in itself a quality of somewhat doubtful value; it is apt to degenerate, in art as in life, into weakness and insipidity, of which we have an example (both in art and life) in Mendelssohn. From this danger Chopin is saved by his burning intensity. It is this quality of intensity which underlies all his works and gives to them their abiding interest. Of all Chopin's compositions it is astonishing how few there are which even now, over fifty years after his death, have in any way lost their freshness and vitality. Of his best works there are few indeed for which, if destroyed, the world would not be the poorer.

CHOPIN NOT A 'NATIONAL' COMPOSER (IN NARROW SENSE.)

In conclusion, I may perhaps turn for a moment to a misconception which, though it has little directly to do with Chopin's 'form,' has nevertheless to some extent stood in the way of a recognition of his true place as an artist. I refer to the general impression that he is to be regarded as a national composer. It is difficult to know how this impression originated. Certainly there is little in what we know of the details of his life to suggest that he took any very keen interest in the tragedy of his country. Be that as it may, however, it is quite certain that he never tried consciously to express his feelings through his music. It is true, of course, that he makes large use of two national dance-forms, the Polonaise and the Mazurka, but it is equally clear that his purpose in doing so was entirely artistic and not patriotic at all (just as it was in his similar use of the Valse-form); and such evidence of nationality as is to be found in his harmony, rhythm, and so on, is in reality extremely slight and has been greatly exaggerated. To say this, of course, is not to deny that Chopin's nationality does, in a very real sense, show itself, and show itself unmistakably, in his music; but it shows itself as with all other great artists, naturally and unconsciously through the medium of his personality; and from recognizing so much to regarding him as in some special sense a national composer is surely, a very wide step. The point would perhaps be unimportant were it not that this view of Chopin as the singer of his country's wrongs has undoubtedly done a great deal to colour the general estimation in which his work is held; and though it is indeed only part of the general Chopin 'legend' which has grown up, and which we alluded to at the outset, yet it is open to this particular objection that it has caused uses of harmony, tonality, form, &c. (which in reality have a deliberate purpose and spring from a wonderfully acute and subtle artistic perception), to be regarded as mere evidence of national idiosyncrasy—or else, indeed, of national idiosyncrasy and individual waywardness combined.

CHOPIN'S WORK NECESSARILY 'FINAL' IN ITS OWN LINE

It is indeed only when we have rid our minds entirely of all false and fanciful pictures of Chopin which have been drawn, and come to the actual study of his works, that we can be in a position to form any true conception either of the man or artist (for they are indivisible). The more his works are studied, the more will their exquisite symmetry and perfection be apparent, and the more we shall appreciate the truly extraordinary wealth of artistic resource which they exhibit. It may be said that they have exercised but little direct influence over the course of music since is time; and the reason, on a superficial view, might seem to lie in their comparatively narrow range. But there is a deeper reason than this. It is the fate of all art works which mark, as it were, the culmination of a particular development that their direct influence on the subsequent course of art must necessarily be small. They are, from the very nature of the case, final, inasmuch as they sum up all the possibilities of progress in that particular direction; and art, if it is to advance at all, must do so along new paths. It is the glory of such works that, while they mark a perfection which, once attained, can never be reproduced, they stand nevertheless as an inspiration and a delight for ever.

[Erratum: In our August issue, p. 518, col. 1, line 59, 'a + b + a' should read 'A + B + A.']

'TRE GIORNI SON CHE NINA.'

By W. BARCLAY SQUIRE.

In the Musical Times for April, 1899, I published the result of some researches I had made into the description to Pergolesi of the well-known song 'Tre giorni son che Nina.' It was shown that this ascription could not be traced farther back than the middle of the last century, and that the earliest known edition of the song appeared in England in 1749, in a publication by Walsh of 'The favourite songs in the opera called "Li tre cicisbei ridicoli."' This opera was first produced at Venice in 1748, was played in London in March, 1749, and revived at Venice in 1752. The librettos of both of the Venetian performances had been examined, and in neither did the words of the song appear, though the books showed that between 1749 and 1752 the opera had been completely remodelled. In both librettos the composer's name is given as Natale Resta. Walsh's collection consists of 'Tre giorni' and three other songs, the words of two of which occur in both the Venetian librettos, and one which is to be found (like 'Tre giorni') in neither. On a copy of the collection which in 1897 was in the library of the late Signor Piatti, Cecilia Arne has written her name in the title-page and has added that of Vincenzo Ciampi as the composer. Ciampi (according to Burney) 'came over as maestro to the company' which introduced 'Li tre cicisbei' to London, and Méris attributes its composition to him, so it seemed quite possible that he was responsible for the two songs in Walsh's Collection not to be found in the Venetian librettos. Against this theory, it could be urged that the name 'Nina' does not occur in the libretto, the principal female character in which is a singer called Modulina. But a second verse of the song—which has never, so far as I know, been reprinted in modern editions—clearly refers to a scene in which Modulina signs sickness and is attended by two of her admirers disguised as doctors. This scene is also indicated in an English version of the song called 'The Serenade, or Love-sick Polly,' two copies of which came to light at the British Museum after my communication to the Musical Times. The heading of this English version gives a clue as to where in the opera the song could have been introduced, and this has been recently confirmed by the discovery of the libretto of the English performance of 1749, which is now in the British Museum. This libretto contains no names of the performers, but the composer is stated to be Natale Resta. It differs in many respects from both the Venetian librettos, especially in including the two songs in Walsh's collection which are not in the Italian word-books. 'Tre giorni' is sung (in the London version) by Lindoro as a serenade to Modulina in Act 3, Scene 4, replacing the song 'Svegliate o caro ben' which occurs in the same place in the librettos of 1748 and 1752. This small addition to the curiously obscure history of the song does not help us much to a conclusion as to its authorship. But it may be pointed out that as the part of Lindoro was sung in London in 1749 and at Venice in 1752 by Filippo Laschi, the fact that in 1752 he sang the original serenade, and not that introduced in the London production, points to 'Tre giorni' having been supplied by someone in London who was not connected with the Venice revival of 1752 and thus to a certain extent confirms Cecilia Arne's ascription of it to Ciampi. Another point is made quite certain, and that is that the song is essentially comic, and that to sing it with tragic expression (a custom which I fancy originated with Madame Viardot-Garcia, who published it as 'La chanson du fou') is completely to misrepresent its character. Finally, it may be mentioned that Mr. O. G. Sonneck's excellent catalogue of opera librettos in the Library of Congress at Washington shows that the song occurs in 'Li sposo di trè e marito di nerssuna,' a libretto, by Antonio Palomba, which is said to have been first produced at Naples, with music by Pasquale Anfossi, in 1763.

Church and Organ Music.

THE COMPLEAT ORGANIST.

By HARVEY GRACE.

IX.—OF CONVENTIONS (contd.).

Organists are apt to think that the frequent cry of 'the tyranny of the organ' comes only from a few unmusical clergy. Let me assure you that many musicians who, like myself, listen regularly to your work, complain just as much. Personally, I do not complain, as do the clergy, that you play too loudly, but, rather, that you play too much. Even if your choir cannot be left unsupported during psalms or hymns, or even responses, they might be trusted to sing an occasional Amen without your help. And I should imagine that the parson who is told off to read the lessons might quite well amble to the lectern without the accompaniment of a 'dying fall' from the organ. Again, the 'Comfortable words' in the Communion service, if adequately sung by the celebrant, are better without organ. If not adequately sung, the organ part makes matters worse. The instrument enters more effectively later on. But how many of you realise the artistic value of this reticence. Soon we shall find you backing up the sermon with some soft music. You are all examined rigorously in playing, and accompanying. I hope some day the Royal College of Organists will include in their syllabus non-playing and non-accompanying (Laughter, and a voice, 'How?') Easily enough: I would suggest that on an Associate entering his name for the Fellowship test, one of the examiners should pay a surprise visit to his Church and notice if the candidate knows when to give his hands and feet a rest. (Interruption, and voices: 'Absurd! Rot!') Also the examiner might note whether the aspirant to Fellowship can play a common chord without adding the seventh. I heard not long since an (otherwise) excellent musician and player give this version of the concluding bars of the well-known tune from Palestrina, set to 'The strife is o'er':

This is a survival of the old custom of thickening all organ chords for the increase of power. There was something to be said for it in days when organs had few stops, lightly-voiced. But now it is merely a convention that has long outlived what point it ever had.

Even Amens, when sung in unison, are liable to improvement at the hands of the organist, the plagal form often being led into by a tonic seventh, and then emasculated by the third of the subdominant being flattened:

The mention of Amens reminds me to ask if there is any reason why these appendages to hymns should not be sung exactly as written. They are invariably doubled in length:

Possibly the first of these might strike us as being somewhat abrupt after the long-drawn version we are accustomed to. When we had been broken in, I should go even further to suggest that:

is best of all.

Anyway, whatever is sung, let it be begun and ended neatly. We should be able to dispense with:

the heavy bass of the choir usually proving his ability to stay the course.

Not only in these details of the service music do I complain of your fondness for the beaten track. Even your pupils suffer from your lack of initiative. Those of you who are of somewhat ripe age were kept to certain teaching material for the very good reason that there was practically nothing else available. But why should you tie your pupils to the same somewhat meagre fare? What should we say of a professor of literature who left his pupils under the impression that Shakespeare was the only Elizabethan dramatist worthy their consideration? Yet many organists do an equally narrow thing in telling their pupils—by implication—that Bach was the only German organ composer of importance. Why should not your young men, at the time their taste is being formed, learn some of the works of Scheidt, Geo. Böhm, Kuhnau, Hanff, and others of that noble family to whom organ music owes so much? Just as England in Elizabeth's time was a nest of singing birds, so was the Germany of the 16th century a hive of great organists. How many of their work is known in England to-day? Yet the best of it might be signed by Bach. As I speak it comes to my mind a delicate pastorale of Pachelbel on 'Vom Himmel hoch,' a wistful little prelude on 'Auf meinen lieben Gott,' by Johann Nicholas Hanck, and a highly wrought work on 'Jesu leiden, Pein und Tod,' by Johann Caspar Vogler (a contemporary of Bach, and not to be confounded with the later Abt. of that ilk) that might have come from the pen that gave us 'O Mensch, bewein,' with which work, indeed, it has much in common. There are available scores of such pieces by these old composers, full of the subtlety, devotion, and intimate feeling we find in Bach's essays in this form. Many are by no means difficult. What a fine thing it would be for your pupils to study some of them instead of spending so much time on the 'Eight Short Preludes and Fugues' and other of the easier works of Bach. Are some of these by Bach, by the way? I must confess that when I hear such complacent inanities as certain of the Preludes, find myself wondering whether they are not the work of some of the old man's pupils, brought to him for correction and incorporated into his work by mistake, just as certain plays published by Shakespeare are now well known to have been written by lesser men, and touched up by him. Anyway, if the feeblest of these movements are by Bach, it will surely not be denied that they are easily the poorest organ music he wrote. Now why in the world should your pupils begin with the worst of Bach?

Dr. Cuthbert.—May I interrupt for a moment to point out that they are used because they are the easiest of Bach's organ works, and we consider,—rightly, I think,—that the pupil should come under the influence of the great John Sebastian as early as possible (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Candidus.—No one is more anxious than I am that organists should early be sealed of the tribe of John Sebastian. It is a pity that, judging from the evidence of one's ears, they so soon become apostate. But let that pass. My complaint is that the acquaintance with Bach begins with music over which the composer nodded. Why should not your pupils be early brought to see the beauty of the Choral Preludes and especially of the 'Little Organ Book'? I know that the majority of these works are too difficult, but I am sure you could find a dozen or two sufficiently easy. For one thing, the student would from his earliest knowledge of Bach learn to appreciate the wonderful modernism. He would be cultivating, to a taste for the austere which would stand him in good stead later on when he had the responsibility of the choice of Church music. But, most important of all, he would learn in his pupillage music which would last him throughout his life. What grown organist ever uses the 'Eight Short Preludes and Fugues' as voluntaries or recital pieces? For him, his own student days over, they are so much teaching material out of which he has long since extracted the last vestige of enjoyment. But I doubt if anybody ever yet got tired of those perfect miniatures in the 'Orgel Buchlein.'

I fear that lack of time, and some very apparent signs of hostility among my audience, will compel me to be brief, and to pass with bare mention some the little tricks from which I suffer in going from Church to Church. (I may say that my business is one that compels me to travel much.) Happily some of these are dying, but you would be surprised if I told you how often, at what Churches, and from what eminent and honoured fingers I hear such things as the preliminary treble note :

the vulgar 'click' :

and the arpeggio :

such methods may stimulate a choir, and insure a good attack, though I fail to see how, and indeed, I have not so far found them go hand in hand with neat parts. On these points I prefer to give no opinion. I know only that they are intensely annoying to musical listeners, and further they are heard nowhere but in church. We do not find any other than Church choiringers so 'helped.' Who ever heard a choral Society, even of the humblest, being 'brought in' by such means? Or what orchestra begins or ends a piece other than with unanimity, save by accident? Some things that could cause a titter in the concert-room are amongst the hallowed customs of the organ loft. (Interruption.) I suggest, too, that those of you who are choirmasters as well as organists will help on the former and more important side of your work by deserting your console occasionally, and sitting in the choir, among the congregation. Instruct your deputy to produce as many of your effects as possible. You will make some useful discoveries. For example, you will perhaps find that certain of your pet registrations for accompanying are either too loud or too soft, or not sufficiently definite to be of use to the choir. Seated among the congregation you will really discover what kind of a choir you have been nourishing in your bosom. In a word, you will gain a great deal of useful knowledge in the matter of choir work and congregational singing that cannot be picked up in the seclusion of the organ loft. A further gain is that your deputy will have the advantage of accompanying full service in your presence—which ought to do him as much good as half a term's organ lessons. He will gain confidence and experience, and when you go for your holiday you will leave a very different kind of player from the one who gets no chance save at holiday time when half the choir is away and no competent critic is at hand to deal faithfully with him. Before I sit down (Hear, hear) I should like to ask you so if it is not high time organists learned to appreciate the effect of manuals only, and without duplers. Also can anybody tell me why, if the organ is to be played before the service, it should give us a stumbling succession of 'improvised' platitudes, instead of some of the beautiful short quiet pieces that abound, and why all outgoing voluntaries should be loud and generally somewhat blatant? Also, I have often wondered why—(cries of 'Sit down,' 'Time,' 'Vide, 'vide,' and interruption, during which, after vain attempts to make himself heard, the speaker resumed his seat).

Dr. Whitley Cubeb.—I regret exceedingly that what promised to be a harmonious gathering should have thus ended on an unresolved discord. I take the sole blame, since Mr. Candidus came at my invitation. He was mentioned to me as one keenly interested in our work, and I thought it was safe to ask him to address us. For the deplorable results I crave your pardon. There is little need for me to say how entirely I disagree with all that has been said. (Loud applause.) I had the honour of receiving instruction some fifty years ago from that great organist, Dr. Job Manktelow (Applause), who a half-century before had been the favourite articulated pupil of a Cathedral organist. Brought up thus, and imbued with the incomparable musical traditions of the English Church as by law established (Hear, hear), am I lightly to set aside the teachings of my revered master and follow the advice of a mere amateur, however well meant? (No! No!) Gentlemen, it is our custom to accord a hearty vote of thanks to those who address our usually delightful gatherings. To-day, however, I propose that we say to the speaker, 'Thank you for nothing!' (Loud applause.)

Mr. Augustin Nodds (St. Blaize, Dunbridge).—I beg to second the proposition. The speaker reminds me of a yarn that I will repeat with your permission. It may serve as a warning to him. There was once a man who, like Mr. Candidus, was fond of setting the world in order. He elected to take up his abode in one of the South Sea Islands. A few months after his arrival, the ship that landed him called again at the island, and the captain asked the chief how Mr. Candidus (as we will call him) was getting on. 'Alas!' said the chief, drawing the back of his hand across his watering mouth, 'he gave us so much good advice that we were obliged to kill him. An excellent fellow, too, who meant well, though being of the nervy, restless sort, he was perhaps a trifle on the stringy side.' (Laughter.)

Mr. Frank Basinghall (St. Aurelius's, Baddesley).—I rise to support the motion. I have heard many absurd speeches in my life, but never one so absurd as the grossly exaggerated diaphragm (Laughter), I mean diatribe, as this of to-day (Applause). I would remind the speaker of the proverb about the shoemaker and his last (Hear, hear). He says he travels much. Let him go on travelling (Laughter). He listens much. Let him go on listening with both his long ears (Loud laughter), but let him think twice before he again attempts to instruct a gathering of experts. (Loud and prolonged applause.)

Mr. Stanley Beath (St. Praxed's, Mottisfont).—I venture to remind the meeting that Mr. Candidus professed to do no more than to bring various conventions before us, leaving us to say whether they were warranted by anything more than mere tradition. (Cries of 'Sit down.') That the mannerisms of which he spoke are commonly indulged in, there is no doubt (Order). Let us look at some of them, not as organists, but as musicians. For example—(Interruption, several members of the audience mounting chairs and addressing the gathering. The meeting was still proceeding under these conditions when our representative and Mr. Candidus left quietly by the side door.)

Mr. P. T. Freeman has retired from the position of organist at Crosthwaite Church, Keswick, at the age of seventy-seven years, having held the appointment for forty-eight years. He was presented on August 12 with an illuminated address, and a purse of gold amounting to £133, by friends, to show their appreciation of his great services to music in Cumberland and of his conscientious discharge of his duties as organist for that long period. The presentation was made by the vicar, the Rev. Canon H. D. Rawnley.

We have been greatly interested by Dr. Walford Davies's essay 'Rhythm in Church,' recently published by Messrs. Riorden in pamphlet form. This little book is an expansion of a lecture delivered at the Royal College of Organists in 1913, and deals thoroughly and in a suggestive manner with a subject that has so far received nothing like its fair share of attention. It is a truism that a trivial and commonplace rhythmic scheme will ruin a piece of music unexceptionable in other ways. It is not less well known that a performance deficient in rhythmic impulse lacks one of the main elements of vitality. But with these two obvious facts staring them in the face, Church composers and choirmasters are too often content to give us music secular in gait and invertebrate in performance. In this pamphlet of thirty pages Dr. Davies says many things that the earnest choirmaster—and indeed any other musician—will be the wiser for reading. He describes as unsuitable for the purposes of Church music rhythms of short figures, of obvious features, and iterations. The desirable are those of long figures, clear rather than obvious, and developed. As a splendid specimen of the latter, he quotes the long streaming tune used by Bach in 'Wachet auf' as an accompaniment to verse 2 of the Chorale in the Cantata, better known in its form as a choral prelude.

Some remarks on the nervous energy required for the singing of soft, sustained passages draw attention to a common weakness in our Church choirs, who are too rarely taught the value of controlled force.

Speaking of the rhythmic maltreatment of the glorious English of the Psalms, Dr. Davies sums up the matter in a nutshell when he says that 'the most cogent objection to the Anglican chant is that it is too highly organized and rhythmically self-existent.'

The booklet is one that should be widely read. There is more information and food for thought in its modest compass than are to be found in many a volume.

Prelude in G minor in $\frac{3}{4}$ time. By Walter S. Vale (Original Compositions, New Series, No. 34).

Prelude, Transformation Scene, and Good Friday Music From 'Parsifal.' Arranged by George J. Bennett (Organ Transcriptions, Nos. 11, 12, and 13).

Allegro Moderato. From Concerto No. 6, in B flat. By T. A. Arne. Arranged by Herbert F. Ellingford (Organ Arrangements, No. 49).

Blest are they that mourn: All flesh doth perish; How lovely are Thy dwellings fair. From Brahms's 'Requiem.' Arranged by John E. West. (Organ Arrangements Nos. 50, 51, 52).

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Mr. Vale's Prelude is avowedly conceived in orchestral vein. Four manuals are required for its proper performance and the player is told that 'the registration should resemble as closely as possible the tone-colour of strings and horns,—not a difficult matter on a good modern organ. The orchestral spirit is further present in the restless rhythm, the $\frac{7}{4}$ tempo being made still more irregular by the rubato direction. The result is a very interesting and effective piece of organ music, suitable either as a voluntary on a solemn occasion or as a recital piece. The harmony is modern without being eccentric, and the curious swaying rhythm is well maintained throughout the six pages. The largamente section, with its double pedal and big chords leading up to a climax, is particularly fine. The work begins and ends softly. It is moderately difficult, and its adaptation to an organ of three manuals would present no difficulty.

The extracts from 'Parsifal' have been admirably arranged for the organ by Dr. G. J. Bennett. The transcriber has not overlooked the fact that in their new guise the works must be effective as organ music. Too often arrangements of this kind, by attempting to give too faithful a copy of the score, are playable only by a super-organist on a super-organ. The versions under notice make no such demands. The Prelude and Good Friday music need only an organ of three manuals, and the fourth manual in the Transformation scene is ad lib. Technically the arrangements are only moderately difficult, taste and musicianship being the qualities most in demand. The result is to make available to the rank and file of the organists' profession some of the most beautiful music Wagner wrote.

Although he composed some excellent and long-lived vocal music, Dr. Arne is little known to-day as an instrumental composer. Yet those who have acquaintance with his numerous harpsichord pieces have found in them the same quality of healthy melodiousness that has kept his songs alive. Mr. Ellingford has done well to rescue from oblivion a movement from one of the concertos. Although, after the custom of the time, the work was composed for either organ or harpsichord, its clarity and vigour make it quite suitable for organ solo purposes. That the idiom is somewhat Handelian is only to be expected, and will be no drawback in most quarters. Mr. Ellingford has done his work skilfully, and has also added an effective cadenza, the result being a breezy and tuneful work. It is perhaps over long, but a 'cut' could easily be made.

The success of arrangements, especially of choral works, depends largely upon the music being familiar. Brahms's 'Requiem' has so long been a favourite work with our choral Societies, and, through extracts, of our Church choirs, that there must be few amateurs unacquainted with the music of the three choruses arranged by Mr. West.

Of these three, 'How lovely are Thy dwellings fair' is, perhaps, the most successful, the beautiful swinging melody being as attractive as ever. 'All flesh doth perish' makes an impressive funeral march. That the transcribing has been excellently done by the practised hand of Mr. West goes without saying. The three numbers are fairly difficult.

Falmouth. Words by Henley. Music, for double choir, by R. T. Woodman.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

This is a work which should claim consideration from Choral Societies that aim at suiting their programmes to the spirit of the day, while avoiding the jingoistic touch. Henley's lines,—a sea-warrior's thoughts of his Devon home—run bravely, and the music breathes the open air. It is breezy without bluster, and would make a popular appeal, for its melodies have a folk-song ring about them and a living rhythm. The use of double choir, often with further sub-division of parts, calls for a choir of considerable dimensions, and there are harmonic progressions that are not all plain-sailing. Yet it is not difficult choral music. Its melodies will commend it, and its effectiveness will repay study. The work can be sung unaccompanied, or pianoforte accompaniment can be employed.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—In your last number (September) you print long communication from Mr. E. P. Lennox Atkins as to rough and ready rule for beginners in factory tuning which gave at the close of a lecture on the 'Scientific Basis of Tuning,' which the Pianoforte Tuners' Association coaxed me into delivering before them as a public 'send-off.' May I, in passing, disclaim the honour of belonging to Cambridge with which Mr. Atkins has endowed me? This rule was drawn up by the late Mr. Alexander J. Ellis, F.R.S., and myself, as likely to be of practical use. I had felt the want of such an approximation in my own factory days, and this rule seems to me to answer its purpose admirably. The errors are not great, and of course they neutralise each other; for this, to anyone who has not the requisite mathematics, I can refer to the unquestioned authority of Mr. Ellis, whose translation of Helmholtz, with his own copious additions, still remains the standard work. Examinations of admirable specimens of tuning in equal temperament by Messrs. Broadwood and my own firm are given in detail in Ellis's 'Helmholtz,' and our rule sprang out of those examinations, and is published in the book in connection with them.

When a lad begins tuning he is told, without any explanation, to tune along a certain series of intervals, keeping all his intervals flat (C, G, D, A, E, B, &c.); this series being a series of fifths. But he is also told, he must not go beyond the two F's which have middle C between them; and therefore his series has a rough alternation between downward fourths and upward fifths. (Twice the alternation has to be broken, by taking a second downward fourth, to keep within the tuning octave F to F.) Now first of all I think the boy should be told, and practically shown, why his intervals are to be flat (because 12 fifths are too long to make seven octaves); and secondly, that tuning a downward fourth flat is precisely the same as tuning that same note flat when in the form of an upward fifth. I assure you, Mr. Editor, that I have learned, to my surprise, that many practical tuners in my large audience at the Y.M.C.A. had not grasped the second point, and that scarcely anyone present knew of the first point. They are commonplaces to Mr. Atkins and to me, but they are not taught to the lads learning tuning.

What does the boy do, when he is given his tuning series, and is told to tune each new note flat? Of course he tunes them all equally flat, although from any given note an upward fifth in equal temperament must be twice as fast as a downward fourth. Therefore the boy never gets a decent set of bearings. He corrects himself by his trial chords, and after two or three years learns by rule of thumb to get his chords about equally in tune. But a close scientific examination of his tuning-scale will show that this result is gained by give-and-take, by the cancelling-out of many errors.

All this I, as a practical tuner, showed and proved to Mr. Ellis. Our problem was therefore to give a rule which should start a boy on the right road. As his ear grows finer he can later on neglect the ladder by which he has climbed, and can advance (as I hope I have myself advanced) to improving his averaged scale into a scale in which each successive fifth will beat faster by a certain ratio than the fifth below it, which is of course the case in true equal temperament. The ratio of increase in beats is intricate to non-mathematical persons, as it cannot be represented by successive additions (say, each fifth to beat so many times more per second than the one below), nor by successive multiplications (say, each fifth to beat at such a fraction more, as for instance, $\frac{1}{12}$ th more than the one below): but logarithmically it is simple, and ends in the result that at the interval of an octave the beats are doubled.

Now in the tuning octave F to F the average number of beats in the seven equal-temperament fifths from C up to G, D up to A, E up to B, &c., is closely approximate to one a second, say, ten in ten seconds; wherefore when tuning those fifths as downward fourths we recommend this average discordance for a beginner. He can soon learn the pace of ten beats in ten seconds, and will not be far from the real truth if he observes it. But the average number of beats in the fifths of the lower part of the octave, which are these four—G to D, G \sharp to D \sharp , A to E, B to F \sharp , is not much more than half the above—namely, closely approximate to six in ten seconds. So we get a clear rule: tune all your downward fourths ten beats in ten seconds flat, and all your upward fifths six beats in ten seconds flat, between F and F. The lower F is obtained from B \flat (A \sharp) downwards, and its true octave gives the upper F.

This is how my own factory boys are started, and it is open to them to make the slight modifications which must be felt rather than counted, but which are necessary to produce a delicately accurate equal temperament. The result is in figures in the pages of Helmholtz, and I may justly be proud of it, I think, in competition with so rightly famous a house as Broadwood's.

I do not know Mr. Atkins's Equal Temperament Committee, but they certainly do not seem to be aiming, as I am aiming, at something practical, for everyday work. After all, as you, Mr. Editor, above all men know, excellent unaccompanied singing, or the harmony of horns, or anything that gives us just intonation, is alone capable of fully satisfying the soul of a musician. Equal temperament is an indispensable makeshift, and we must always remember that it is but a glimmer to the full splendour of the beauty of just intonation. When that rare delight is now and then achieved, if only for a chord or two, tears fill our eyes at the perception of a beauty so exquisite that the ancient prophets deemed it worthy to be the chief ornament of Heaven.—I am, yours truly, H. KEATLEY MOORE.

ENGLISH v. GERMAN FINGERING.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—Apart from the necessity for being patriotic, the present seems an opportune time to point out the absurdity of having in England two notations for pianoforte fingering, and of using foreign editions printed and issued abroad when just as good can be obtained in England, edited by Englishmen, with English fingering.

Publishers, or many of them, would be heartily glad to have only the one fingering notation to deal with. The contradiction is keenly felt by teachers, especially in view of the fact that string players all over the world use only N, 1, 2, 3, 4.

THE ADVENTURES OF A LONG-METRE TUNE.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—Referring to Mr. Potter's article on the above subject in your August issue I note that the tune in question, under the name of 'Wells,' appeared in the Wesleyan Tune Book and Supplement published in 1877. It varies somewhat from the versions quoted by Mr. Potter.—Yours, &c.,

[We hold over other and fuller letters we have received as to the remarkable adventures of this tune.—ED., M.T.]

Obituary.

We regret to announce the following deaths:

WILHELM GANZ, on September 12, aged eighty-one. He was a familiar and genial personality in the musical life of London, and had been so for more than half-a-century. Born at Mainz on November 6, 1833, he came to this country in 1848 to assist his father, Adolph Ganz, who was chorus-master at Her Majesty's Theatre. Balfé was at that time conductor at the Opera, and he engaged young Ganz first to play the triangle and later the second violin. As he was a skilful pianist he soon found scope for his abilities as an accompanist, and in that capacity he was associated with Jenny Lind, and later still more closely with Adelina Patti. After playing the violin in Dr. Wylde's New Philharmonic Orchestra for many years, he became in 1874 joint conductor with Dr. Wylde, and in 1879 he took over the entire management under the name of Mr. Ganz's Orchestral Concerts. Berlioz's 'Symphonie Fantastique' and Liszt's 'Dante' Symphony were amongst the many important works he introduced to England. The concerts were abandoned in 1883, and since that time the late musician taught singing at the Guildhall School of Music, and made regular appearances as an accompanist at Patti and other concerts. He had a jubilee concert at Queen's Hall in 1898, and on June 1, 1911, a benefit concert organized by Madame Patti was a notable event of its kind. Mr. Ganz was a successful composer of light pianoforte music, and some of his songs have been widely popular. In 1913 he published 'Memories of a musician' (John Murray), in which he gave interesting accounts of the musical celebrities he met in the course of his long career.

MISS CLARA ANGELA MACIRONE, on August 19. She was born in London on January 21, 1821. From 1839 to 1844 she studied at the Royal Academy of Music. She achieved some distinction as a pianist and as a composer. For some years she was head music-mistress at Aske's School for Girls, Hatcham, and at the High School for Girls at Baker Street. Many of her part-songs became very popular. Amongst the best known are 'Sir Knight, O whither away,' 'The battle of the Baltic,' 'Ragged, torn, and true.'

POL HENRI PLANÇON, the great operatic bass, at Paris, aged sixty. His operatic career began in 1877 at Lyons. He appeared at the Paris Opéra in 1883, made his début at Covent Garden in 1891 as Mephistopheles, a rôle in which for many years he used to rouse the enthusiasm of Covent Garden audiences, and appeared at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, in 1893.

The death of Professor F. S. PETERSON, of Melbourne, and previously of Edinburgh, which was announced in our August issue (p. 535), took place on June 21. He leaves a wife and two children.

THE COMING SEASON IN LONDON.

THE GLASTONBURY FESTIVAL OF MYSTIC DRAMA.

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

Some twenty performances were given at the Assembly Rooms, Glastonbury, in connection with this Festival. It had been hoped that these might take place in the open air, but the weather was so uniformly bad as to make this impossible. The programmes were made up of dances by four of Miss Margaret Morris's girls, choral-music compositions by Rutland Boughton, choral-dancing from the 'Tintagel' scene in Reginald Buckley's music-drama, 'Arthur of Britain,' the Grail scene from 'Parsifal,' and four plays: W. W. Gibson's 'Night-shift,' Lady Gregory's 'The travelling man,' Walter Merry's 'Soul sight' (his own translation of the 'Heraclidae'), produced by Mr. G. Ware Cornish, and three performances of 'The Immortal Hour,' a new music-drama by Rutland Boughton, based upon the play of that name by Fiona Macleod. This was the principal feature of the Festival, for though it had originally been arranged to produce 'Arthur of Britain' with music by Rutland Boughton, the subscriptions for the playhouse which was to contain it were hardly large enough to warrant the building of a theatre, and Mr. Buckley was averse from an open-air production of his work. Unfortunately the war had made the employment of an adequate orchestra quite out of the question. The performances were very kindly conducted by Mr. Charles Kennedy Scott, who was also at the pianoforte. The parts were filled up as follows:

Dalua	Rutland Boughton
Etain	Irene Lemon	(1st and 3rd performances)	and Gladys Fisher
Eochaidh	Frederick Austin
Manus	R. Neville Strutt
Mäive	Agnes Thomas
Midir	Arthur Jordan
Spirit Voice	Muriel Boughton
Chief Druid	Arthur Trowbridge

Choruses of Wood Spirits and Court women by members of the Summer School and people of Glastonbury.

Choruses of Druids and Warriors by the Wookey Hole Male-Voice Choir.

The following is a synopsis of the drama taken from the programme:

Act 1—Dalua, the shadow that lies behind life, encounters voices in the wood. To him comes Etain, a girl of the Faery Folk, and later on the dreamer Eochaidh, King of Ireland. The scene changes to the peasant hut of Manus and Mäive. Etain has taken shelter there, and thither follows Eochaidh in search of his Heart's Desire. He seems as if he might find it; but the call of the Faery Folk lingers in Etain's mind.

Act 2—Festival in honour of the twelvemonth of Etain's marriage with Eochaidh. Both are oppressed in different ways by a presentiment of unearthly happenings. Etain withdraws, and presently a stranger enters. He is Midir, Prince of the Faery Folk; he has come to fetch Etain away to the Land of Heart's Desire. The Faery Folk come near, and Etain is lost to Eochaidh.

In the preface to 'The Immortal Hour' Fiona Macleod hints that one of the meanings of this legend may be the coming of the Soul (Etain) to the body (Eochaidh). However that may be, this music-drama is not to be taken as a musical decoration of actions, but rather the development in music of certain human and spiritual relationships. Consequently the movement is slow for the free unfolding of the musical and emotional thought.

A feature of 'Arthur of Britain' and 'The Immortal Hour,' and perhaps the one that has chiefly attracted the attention of journalists, is the symbolical use of the chorus to represent waves, a castle, tree spirits, &c. This is undeniably effective, and is sure of a much wider application with the passage of time.

The dances for the 'Tintagel' scene from 'The Birth of Arthur' had been arranged by Miss Margaret Morris at Bournemouth last year; but this year, owing to her detention in the South of France, the dances for 'The Immortal Hour' were arranged by two of her pupils, Margaret Drew and Beatrice Filmer. The dresses for the performances were designed by Margaret Morris, Christina Walshe, and Gerda Giöbel, and cannot be praised sufficiently. Indeed all concerned worked with a self-forgetfulness and abandon which were entirely praiseworthy. Principals and members of the Summer School did their utmost to promote the scheme for a National Centre; for at a time such as the present all efforts towards the establishment of a National Centre should be well supported. The value of legend in keeping alive national sentiment is continually recognised, and the existence of such a centre in the heart of Arthur's country may very well pave the way for a really national drama in the future. Performances of 'The Immortal Hour' are to be given at Bournemouth during the winter, and at various places in the country.

THE PROMENADE CONCERTS.

It is a matter for general congratulation that the threatened boycott of modern German music has not come to pass. The Wagner evenings were quickly reinstated and are quickly proving, as in former seasons, the chief success of the series. Some of the promised productions of new works by Continental composers have had to be abandoned for practical rather than sentimental reasons. Audiences have naturally been smaller than in previous years, but there is no cause to complain of lack of public support.

The first work of interest that comes under this month's review is a Concerto for two violins and violoncello by Vivaldi, arranged as an orchestral work by Siliti. This was performed on August 22, and won general approval. On August 25 not even sympathy for an Ally could rouse enthusiasm for Liadov's work, 'A fragment from the Apocalypse.' Far more attractive was Stravinsky's 'Scherzo Fantastique,' heard on August 26, for it had all the composer's familiar imagination, skill, and brilliance, and not more than a hint or two of his later and questionable qualities. On the same evening a straightforward Rhapsody, 'From the Prairie,' by Coleridge-Taylor, was well received.

Thirty-eight years after its composition César Franck's 'Les Éolides' was heard for the first time in London on August 23, and we hope soon to experience the pleasure of hearing it again. It has not the vivid pictorial expressiveness of the modern symphonic poem; it is all refined beauty and strength, and dramatic needs do not interrupt its purely musical flow. The Belgian National Song, Campenhout's 'La Nouvelle Brabançonne,' as scored for orchestra by Sir Henry Wood, was given on the same evening.

Bela Bartók, the young Hungarian progressive, whose name reached our ears in advance of his music, underwent his first serious trial before the British public on September 1. His Suite in five movements, a comparatively early work, failed to make a deep impression. It is rich in arresting ideas and effects, but the struggle to be interesting is more obvious than the actual interest, and the design and handling lack spontaneity and sense of style. Hungarian national elements impart some value in fact rather than in feeling. The same programme included an effective orchestral arrangement by Sir Henry Wood of the Russian National Anthem.

On September 3 Master Solomon made a sensation with his workmanlike performance of Grieg's Pianoforte concerto. Sir Alexander Mackenzie's Tone-poem, 'La belle dame sans merci,' was heard with interest and pleasure. Then came one of the rare performances that we have in this country of César Franck's Symphony in D minor, a work of great nobility that never fails to appeal to all. It was excellently performed, and won a gratifying tribute of admiration from the audience.

On September 5, Florent Schmitt's new Suite of four movements, entitled 'Reflets d'Allemagne' was performed for the first time. The work proved to be refined and engaging, the Finale being especially so.

Well known as a pianist of exceptional distinction, Miss Kathleen Bruckshaw has not to any great extent sought renown as a composer. That she is, however, capable of serious and estimable creative work was shown on September 10 by the performance of her Pianoforte concerto in C major. Miss Bruckshaw does not write with a practised hand either for the orchestra or for the pianoforte, and much of her music is acceptable chiefly for its good intentions; but there are also passages of considerable effectiveness, and the general impression created was that Miss Bruckshaw is a composer of whom something good may be expected. Her performance of the solo part was all that could be desired.

Elgar's Violin concerto was played for the first time at the Promenade Concerts on September 15, M. Louis Pecskaï being a soloist of great skill and expressive power.

Josef Holbrooke's new 'Imperial March' was produced on September 16. It makes considerable and skilful use of a portion of the National Anthem and of 'Rule, Britannia,' and is of course sonorously scored for a large orchestra. The march, perhaps, just fails through the lack of a broad Trio theme.

The novelty on September 17 was Percy Pitt's Suite de Ballet, 'Sakura,' founded on a scenario dealing with Japanese life. There are five movements, of which the second, a dainty Allegretto scherzando, the fourth, a Pizzicato, in which the celeste is used with happy effect, and the fifth, a brilliantly-scored waltz, proved particularly attractive. The composer conducted, and received an ovation.

Sir Frederic Cowen's second Suite, 'The language of flowers,' found great favour with the audience on September 19, when its first performance was conducted by the composer. It has all the melody, graceful fancy, refinement, and interest that were justly admired in his first 'The language of flowers' Suite, which dates back as far as 1880.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BIRMINGHAM.

The provision made for our coming musical season has been completely disorganized through the war, and our local orchestral players, solo vocalists, and choral Societies are facing the worst times within living memory. Practically there will be scarcely any concerts at all, for those in charge of our musical functions are confronted with almost insuperable difficulties, partly owing to the fact that our Town Hall will not be available, being now in the hands of the War Office for recruiting purposes. Already our Festival Choral Society has been compelled to postpone for the present its scheme of concerts, 1914-15. The various other choral bodies are in similar plight, and it is quite doubtful if the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra will be able to give their popular Saturday Night Orchestral Concerts. The Harrison Concerts and the Birmingham Chamber Concerts Society's concerts are the only ones that will be forthcoming at all, but the locale of the Harrison Concerts will have to be changed from the Town Hall to the Midland Institute. The Max Mossel Drawing Room Concerts have now been definitely abandoned, although the syllabus had already been printed for circulation. The only concerts given so far this season were in aid of the Prince of Wales's Fund, one being held at the Central Hall and the other at the Alexandra Theatre, both realising considerable sums to the Fund. Local musicians, especially orchestral players, will be hard hit, for most of their winter engagements have been cancelled.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

It would be very difficult to find any musical district which has been more upset in its normal arrangements by the war than the West country with Plymouth for its centre. With several regimental bands usually available the Municipal authorities relied largely on music for the attraction of visitors, and a specially elaborate programme had been arranged for this season. With the dread word 'mobilisation,' however, a sudden stop was naturally put to all this effort. The two local garrison bands, the R.G.A. and the R.M.L.I., have been able to assemble to about the number of twenty in military combination, and have assiduously served to entertain the visitors and to divert the minds of the townspeople, of whom the great majority are connected with the Services. Messrs. R. G. Evans and J. W. Newton, the respective bandmasters, have had to work under difficulties, but their performances have been much appreciated. The management of Torquay Pavilion have as far as possible held to arranged plans, with the co-operation of the Municipal Orchestra under Mr. Basil Hindenburg. Visits have been paid by Madame Kirkby Lunn, Messrs. Joseph Cheetham and Charles Mott, and patriotic programmes have been well received. Other ordinary events have included a Caenmarth Deanery choral festival at St. Day, concert tours through South Devon and North Cornwall by Miss Gertrude Lonsdale and party, and in North Cornwall by Mr. Charles Saunders and Mr. Watkin Mills and party.

Much music-making has been undertaken for either of two purposes—to raise money for relief funds or to provide entertainment for the convalescent wounded and the many thousands of Service men quartered and billeted throughout the two counties. In addition to individual efforts choirs and bands have contributed to these objects, including the Plymouth Orpheus Male Choir, a large choir at Newquay, collected by Mr. Crosby Smith, Falmouth Adult School Male Choir, Exeter Male Choir, Exeter Amateur Operatic Society, Lostwithiel String Band, and the band of the Admiral-Superintendent at Devonport.

Most of the choral Societies and orchestral classes have suspended their intended programmes owing to the scarcity of men. Dr. Weekes's Orchestral Society at Plymouth are trying to make arrangements to keep the members together in rehearsal, and probably this will be the plan adopted by all combinations.

LIVERPOOL.

The Philharmonic Society's choral rehearsals commenced on September 14 under Mr. R. H. Wilson, and the Society's first concert will be held on October 6. In the revised prospectus certain names have necessarily disappeared, but substantially the original scheme remains. To the names of guest-conductors already announced those of M. Savonov, M. Gabriel Pierné, M. Mlynarski, and Sir George Henschel should be added. M. Scriabin's visit is also confirmed for February 9, when he will play the solo part in his Pianoforte concerto in F sharp minor and his 'Prometheus.' Pierné's musical legend 'The Children's Crusade,' Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater,' and Beethoven's 'Choral Symphony' are the chief choral works announced.

Conducted by Mr. F. M. Roden, the Avenue Male-Voice Choir has gained distinction by giving a series of open-air concerts in the parks at which close upon a hundred pounds has been collected, mostly in pence, for the Prince of Wales's Fund. The excellent singing of this large Choir has agreeably atoned for the unavoidable absence of the military bands. Would that similar choral organizations might multiply. There is a great field hereabouts for the cultivation of unaccompanied male-voice singing, and if only the right men were forthcoming as organizers and directors there is plenty of good material.

Chiefly owing to the present discouraging outlook for music generally, the committee of the Welsh Choral Union after due deliberation have cancelled the projected arrangements for the ensuing season. It is possible that a performance of the 'Messiah' will be given at Christmas, partly in order to keep the choir together and also to benefit the Prince of Wales's Fund. There can be no doubt that a substantial sum would be raised by this means, for the Welsh Choral Union's annual 'Messiah' has always been one of the chief events of the year.

At the sixth annual meeting of the Walton Philharmonic Society, at which Archdeacon Spooner presided, it was announced that the choral works for the ensuing season would include Cliffe's 'Ode to the North-east Wind,' Coleridge-Taylor's 'Death of Minnehaha,' and the 'Messiah.' The Society, which has progressed so steadily under Mr. Albert Orton's conductorship, should find encouragement in finding itself faced with only a small adverse balance.

An attractive brochure has been issued announcing particulars of the seven concerts to be given by the Akeroyd Symphony Orchestra in the Philharmonic Hall. The first occurs on October 27, when the notable Russian pianist Miss Tina Lerner will play, and Madame Gleeson-White will sing. Mr. Akeroyd has drawn up attractive programmes, including one devoted to the evolution of the operatic overture, and among the eminent singers and players engaged is Madame Aino Ackté, who will be heard in the closing Scene from Strauss's 'Salome.' The profits of the concerts will be handed over to the Prince of Wales's Fund.

It is also satisfactory to note that Mr. Harrison will hold his usual series of five concerts in the Philharmonic Hall.

The local authorities are carrying on the usual winter season of free lectures, to which, as the fiftieth anniversary of these useful and popular functions, more than ordinary interest attaches. Musical subjects are fully represented in the syllabus.

The success of the children's musical Festival promoted by the school-teachers of the Liverpool Education Authority last year was so encouraging that the movement is continuing, and the local committee of teachers, of whom Mr. W. Scott is the able chairman, have chosen a fine programme of school-songs for the massed singing, which has been published by Messrs. Novello in an excellently bound volume. The music includes traditional melodies and songs, with examples of modern duets and trios.

The fourteenth Musical Eisteddfod at New Brighton Tower was successfully held on September 19, when a large concourse of people filled the spacious theatre. Over £100 was offered in prizes, and the entries included seven mixed-voice choirs and twelve male-voice choirs, in addition to six children's choirs, and numerous competitors in the solo-voice classes. Before delivering the adjudications Dr. McNaught made an eloquent and touching reference to the passing of Mr. Harry Evans, in whom the country has lost a national force in music. Despite the drawbacks suffered by several choirs in the unavoidable absence of tenors and basses who had joined the colours, some very beautiful singing was heard. [A detailed account is given in The Competition Festival Record.]

The Sunday Orchestral Concerts, conducted by Mr. T. Rimmer, at the New Brighton Tower, came to a close on September 20, when an 'All-British' programme of music was submitted. During the season the management has shown enterprise in the engagement of first-rate artists of the calibre of Madame Ada Crossley, Sapellnikov, Mark Hambourg, Solomon, and Melsa, which has been duly rewarded.

Other Societies which have decided to carry on operations despite the problematical outlook include the Liverpool Choral Union, conducted by Mr. Ingram, and Madame Fanny de Bouffler's Liverpool Ladies' Choir and Vocal Union. Both of these Societies have commenced rehearsals, the Choral Union essaying familiar works in Smart's 'Bride of Dunkerron' and 'Messiah.'

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

In the early days of August, to have talked of music during the coming winter seemed positively sinful; yet a brief six weeks has shown our marvellous adaptability to the new order of things, economic and social, and we find all the chief Manchester organizations (and this is also true of Liverpool).—Hallé's, Gentlemen's, Manchester 'Proms.,' Brand Lane's, and Harrison's—proclaiming 'business as usual,' in the sense that there is to be no cessation of activities. The war has, however, meant the complete collapse of the Hallé scheme outlined in my July notes. Mr. Balling was at Bayreuth when hostilities broke out, and several of the principals are enforced absentees for similar reasons. In Balling's absence a season of guest-conductors was the only alternative. Elgar, Bantock, Cowen, Beecham, Harty, Ronald, Verbruggen, and Savonov have all offered to come, some declining to receive any honorarium. To Mr. Wilson, the chorus-master, will probably fall the direction of some of the choral concerts, and here the necessity of economizing expenses will lead to the inclusion of several well-known oratorios. Bantock will, however, conduct the compressed version of 'Omar Khayyâm,' which had already been fixed before the war.

During such a period choral music of the highest type will probably make a wider appeal than orchestral music. It is the most democratic form that music takes, and the people's emotions are more deeply stirred in that way. There is good ground for the belief that an evening of the more massive architectural choruses of Handel, such as are heard at the Handel Festivals, or a selection from 'Israel in Egypt' would at a time like this stir the public in a profounder and nobler way than would the theatricality of Rossini's 'Stabat Mater,' which is one of the selected works. Then what a heaven-sent opportunity to make up an evening or two with essentially patriotic choral works which under normal circumstances would not be admitted to a Hallé scheme on account of their relatively slender proportions, but which to-day are both singularly appropriate, and provide a vent for emotions evoked by doings on land and sea. Stanford's 'The Revenge,' 'The Battle of the Baltic,' and 'Last Post'; Elgar's early 'Banner of St. George,' 'Coronation Ode,' 'Caractacus,' or 'King Olaf'; Rutland Boughton's 'Invincible Armada'; C. H. H. Parry's 'Ode to Music' or 'Blest Pair of Sirens'; Purcell's 'King Arthur'—all come in such a category. Many people holding the view that Hallé programmes are 'over their heads' would have such ideas quickly dispelled. Whilst giving due weight to the economic aspect of this season's working there are no insuperable difficulties in the way of hiring cheaply choral music of this type, and it cannot be said that a choral selection embracing 'Creation,' 'Hymn of Praise,' 'Stabat Mater,' 'Messiah,' and (perhaps) Berlioz's 'Faust' offers many attractions either to singers or listeners. These works happen to be in stock in the Choir's library, and that is all that can be said in favour of their inclusion. The proprietors of the Free Trade Hall, solo artists, and members of the orchestra, have all agreed to work through this season on diminished payments, and in other ways doubtless economies in management will be effected. Is not this, too, a time to snatch advantages even out of our misfortunes, and besides popularising our programmes for a season, draw into the fold a larger public by reducing the prices in those parts which in recent seasons have frequently been rather empty? There should be no empty seats this winter. If at the end we find that whilst expenses are down support has approximated to normal, the poor musician must share in any surplus.

Mr. Brand Lane's series goes forward as originally announced, save that two of the early miscellaneous events disappear, one on account of the inability of Fräulein Freda Hempel to come to the opening concert.

The Manchester Orpheus Concert on September 26 abandoned the form originally contemplated, and was converted into a Prince of Wales's Fund 'patriotic' concert, contriving however to bring in some serious music.

The authorities connected with the Blackpool Festival have deemed it unwise to proceed with this year's music-making, and have announced that as far as possible the 1914 syllabus shall stand for 1915.

The choral Societies of Preston and Bolton will give no concerts until Christmas.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

The war has naturally brought about a partial dislocation of the ordinary local winter season of music, but there is a general tendency to hold music in readiness and await the trend of events before committing to any large or expensive enterprises. The abandonment of the Festival has to some extent freed certain branches of musical effort. The Sheffield Amateur Musical Society for example adhere to their full season's programme, namely 'Elijah' in December (Sir Henry Wood conducting), and Bantock's 'Omar Khayyâm' (complete) in April, conducted by Mr. J. A. Rodgers.

The Sheffield Musical Union will continue rehearsals under Dr. Coward, but it has been decided to abandon the ordinary Subscription Concerts and give only the special Christmas performance of 'Messiah.' Rehearsals are now going on for 'The Golden Legend.' After Christmas a new British work will, it is stated, be taken in hand.

A similar course of tentative rehearsals is the wise policy of the Sheffield Teachers' Operatic Society, who are preparing 'The Gondoliers.' Another choral body working under the same conductor (Mr. J. Duffell) are rehearsing for a patriotic concert on November 4, when Eaton Faning's 'Our Island Home' will be performed.

The Chesterfield Musical Union have decided to go on with the projected performance of Bantock's 'Omar Khayyâm' (Part I), conducted by Mr. J. F. Staton.

There will be a dearth of orchestral music during the winter unless, as is possible, the abandoned Promenade Concerts are revived. Meanwhile an amateur body, the Sheffield Symphony Orchestra, promise a series of three concerts to be conducted respectively by Mr. J. Duffell, Mr. J. F. Staton, and Mr. J. A. Rodgers. Mr. J. H. Parkes will conduct concerts by the junior branch of the same organization.

Miss Foxon's Chamber Concerts have been definitely abandoned. The Organists' Association and the Sheffield Playgoers' Society announce various musical performances.

The Victoria Hall Choral Society have already inaugurated the season with a performance of Haydn's 'Creation,' conducted by Mr. H. C. Jackson.

YORKSHIRE.

Though the arrangements for the coming musical season are still far from complete, it is already apparent that the number of concerts will be severely cut down, and that the programmes will follow the lines of least resistance. The Leeds Philharmonic Society intend to offer only three concerts, at which 'Messiah,' Verdi's 'Requiem,' and a programme by the New Symphony Orchestra will be given. The Leeds Choral Union also intend to pursue the path of safety, promising 'Elijah' and 'Hiawatha' in addition to a special War Relief concert, at which extracts from 'Judas Maccabæus' and 'Israel in Egypt' will be given. The Saturday Orchestral Concerts committee have prepared a most interesting series of six concerts, with excellent programmes, and it is hoped that they will be persevered in. It is understood that the Leeds Bohemian Chamber Concerts will be continued as usual. The Bradford Subscription Concerts will be reduced to six; at three the Hallé Orchestra will appear, under the conductorship of Mr. Beecham, M. Savonov, and Mr. Verbruggen respectively, while at a Choral Concert it is hoped Sir Edward Elgar will conduct. The Bradford Permanent Orchestra will, it is hoped, be able to carry out their programme of five concerts, which are to be conducted by Mr. Hamilton Harty and Mr. Julian Clifford. From this, which is only a very incomplete summary, it will be seen that two of the chief West Riding centres hope to keep the flag of music flying in these trying times. In the meantime the Harrogate Symphony Concerts, under Mr. Julian Clifford, have been satisfactorily maintained, and some interesting programmes have been carried out. On July 22 Mr. Percy E. Fletcher conducted, for the first time out of London, his recent 'Prelude to an Unwritten Symphony'; on July 30, Miss Miriam Timothy introduced a charming work by Ravel, an Introduction and Allegro for harp and orchestra; on August 5, a Tone-poem by Mr. Edmondstone Duncan was heard; on August 12, Dr. Vaughan Williams conducted his recent 'London' Symphony; on August 19, Mr. Arthur Hervey conducted several of his orchestral compositions; on August 26, Sir Alexander Mackenzie introduced his 'Pibroch' Suite, with Mr. Rowsby Woof as solo violinist; on September 2, two recent pieces by Delius were heard; and on September 9, Sapellnikov played Liszt's second Pianoforte concerto, and a new work by Mr. Ernest Farrar, a Tone-poem illustrating Matthew Arnold's 'Forsaken Merman,' was heard for the first time. The record is an honourable one, and shows genuine artistic enterprise.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Musical life here is uneventful, but it continues without serious interruption. The weekly Symphony Concerts are taking place as usual under Mr. Dan Godfrey's direction, a performance of Svendsen's first Symphony in D being among recent features of interest. Other concerts are taking place, at which well-known artists appear.

EASTBOURNE.—It has been decided by the Town Council to maintain an orchestra of thirty-one to play daily during the autumn and winter months, a first-class orchestra to play during the summer, and a military band to play on the sea front all the year round. The Corporation is to pay £3,960 per annum to the Devonshire Park Company towards the £7,336 per annum which the scheme is expected to cost.

JOHANNESBURG.—On July 29 a large audience was attracted to the Wanderers' Hall for the performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and 'The death of Minnehaha,' by the Johannesburg Philharmonic Choral and Orchestral Society. Under Mr. Laurence R. Glenton's direction the work of the choir maintained its high standard. The soloists were Mrs. Stanley Anderson, Mr. Melner-Smythe, and Mr. J. Paterson.

PRETORIA.—A concert was successfully given by St. Andrew's Choir on August 12. Dudley Buck's 'Hymn to music,' Charles Macpherson's arrangement of 'Duncan Gray,' and Eaton Fanning's 'Song of the Vikings,' were sung under the direction of Mr. W. S. Yates, songs were given by Mrs. J. A. Green and Mr. Owen Ashford, and instrumental contributions were made by Messrs. C. Israel, A. Wilmot, and W. S. Yates, and by Miss F. Crawford.

SOUTHPORT.—The Orchestral Society have arranged to hold their three Subscription Concerts as usual during the coming season, the following being the dates: November 27, January 29, and March 26. Miss Ruth Vincent and Mr. John Clarke have already been engaged, and negotiations are in progress with Mr. Alfred Cortot, the well-known French pianist. The sum of £15 was voted to the Prince of Wales's Fund.

STOURBRIDGE.—The Stourbridge Concert Society, conducted by Mr. George Halford, announce the following for performance during the coming season: 'St. Cecilia's Day' (Parry), 'The Black Knight' (Elgar), 'Pastoral Symphony' (Beethoven), Acts 1 and 3 of 'The flying Dutchman' (Wagner), Act 3 of 'Tannhäuser' (Wagner), 'Hiawatha' (Coleridge-Taylor).

VANCOUVER (B.C.).—The prospectus of the Vancouver Musical Society, conducted by Mr. G. P. Hicks, announces performances of Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' 'The Messiah,' and 'Elijah.'

WILLOWMORE (SOUTH AFRICA).—Gaul's 'The Holy City' was performed with highly creditable success at the Town Hall on July 21, by the Willowmore Choral Society, a body of thirty-eight voices under the direction of Mr. H. Codner. Accompaniments were played by Mrs. H. Codner, and the solo parts were taken by Mrs. J. H. Joubert, Mrs. F. W. Baker, Mr. S. Rademeyer, and A. E. Jubb.

Foreign Notes.

BUENOS AYRES.

During a performance of the well-known patriotic operetta 'La fille du tambour-major,' by Offenbach, a hostile manifestation against Germany arose and became so violent that the performance had to be stopped.

FLORENCE.

Some very interesting letters by Monteverde, recently discovered by Gabriele d'Annunzio, are in course of publication.

MILAN.

The famous French violinist, Henry Marteau (professor at the Royal High School for Music at Berlin), has been detained at Lichtenberg, Bavaria, being a non-commissioned officer in the French Army.

MONTE CARLO.

Under the presidency of the Prince of Monaco and Dr. Camille Saint-Saëns, a committee has been formed to provide for the wives and children of all the artists of the Opéra at Monte Carlo who are actually serving with the French colours.

PARIS.

The celebrated patriotic poet and singer, Theodore Botrel, has been authorized by the Minister of War to give recitals of his patriotic songs and poems at the military camps and hospitals.—Arthur de Greef, the popular Belgian pianist and composer, has enlisted in the Belgian Army.

Miscellaneous.

According to Board of Trade figures the German and Austrian exports of musical instruments before the war amounted to £748,200 to the United Kingdom and £2,796,850 to other markets. Here is a magnificent opportunity for the British manufacturer.

Mr. Percy Sherwood, who had an excellent musical connection in Dresden, was in England at the beginning of the war and is consequently without occupation. He would be glad to hear, at 24, St. Edmund's Terrace, Regents Park, from any of his old pupils.

We understand that the War Office Council has arranged with Mr. C. J. Bishenden to give concerts of patriotic and other better-class British music to cheer and interest the wounded in the war hospitals.

Amongst the many who are detained in Germany by the war are Dr. Arthur G. Claypole, of Derby, and his wife, Dr. Percy C. Hull, and Mr. Benjamin Dale.

Mr. Basil Cameron Hindenburg, the English musician whose work as musical director at Torquay Pavilion is universally praised, has decided to be known in future as Mr. Basil Cameron.

The National Orchestral Association, a body of over 2,000 members, has decided to expel all German and Austrian members without exception.

The Autumn term at the London College of Music, Great Marlborough Street, opened on September 21.

Answers to Correspondents.

L. L. T.—Our own columns, in this and the previous issue, contain abundant information as to the various National Anthems.

STEPHEN.—A caricature by Gustave Doré, of Berlioz conducting a concert of the Philharmonic Society at Paris, was reproduced in our issue of July, 1903.

HARROW.—Yes; Goldmark wrote an opera, 'The cricket on the hearth.' It was produced at Vienna on March 21, 1896.

B. B.—Herr Bailing is a Bavarian. He is in Germany, and it is assumed that his connection with the Hallé concerts is at an end.

CHORUSES FOR MIXED VOICES

WITH WORDS SUITABLE FOR USE AT THE PRESENT TIME.

Almighty Ruler of the Skies (Joshua)... .. Handel
Price 1d. ; Tonic Sol-fa, 1d.

A short easy four-part chorus preceded by a brief tenor solo which can be sung by all tenors.

Let justice reign (Susanna) Handel
Price 2d.

For S.A.T.B. Fugal in character, and simple. The words "Let justice reign and flourish" are appropriate.

O God, Who in Thy heavenly hand (Joseph)... .. Handel
Price 3d. ; Tonic Sol-fa, 1d.

A little-known chorus (S.A.T.B.). The words:

"O God, Who in Thy heavenly hand
Dost hold the hearts of mighty kings,
Take Thy Israel and his land
Beneath the shadow of Thy wings."

are treated with impressive dignity. A fine fugue follows, and the last movement (Grave) is a prayer.

The Trumpet's loud clangour excites us to arms
(Ode on St. Cecilia's Day) Handel
Price 1d. ; Tonic Sol-fa, 1½d.

Begins with a rousing tenor solo that can be omitted. The choral part is an inspiring call to arms and action.

All Empires upon God depend (Belshazzar) Handel
Price 2d.

Begins with dignified four-part harmony to the words:

"All empires upon God depend;
Begun by His command, at His command they end.
Look up to Him in all your ways."

A developed fugue follows that affords scope for good choirs. The mood is jubilant.

With thunder armed (Samson)... .. Handel
Price 1d. ; Tonic Sol-fa, 1d.

A short massive chorus for S.A.T.B. The music is easy and the expression is varied.

(a) Their bodies are buried in peace, but their name liveth evermore Handel
Price 1½d.

(b) They shall receive a glorious crown Handel
Price 1½d.

These funeral or in memoriam anthems are simple and impressively solemn. The first-named (a) is written for quartet and chorus in alternation. It can be sung full throughout.

(b) The treatment here is rather more elaborate, and the melodious part-writing is in dialogue form. It can be sung as a quartet (S.A.T.B.) or as chorus. The words are:

"They shall receive a glorious kingdom and a beautiful crown from the Lord's hand."

Lord, when our haughty foes assail us
(Christmas Oratorio) Bach
Price 3d.

The words of this fine chorus are as follows:

"Lord, when our haughty foes assail us
O! may it for our peace avail us
To rest upon Thy mighty power.
Our only trust, do Thou befriend us,
All needful strength and succour send us,
To keep us safe in danger's hour."

The music is in four parts throughout, and is worked out with characteristic elaboration.

Life for the Czar (Polonaise with Chorus) Glinka
Price 3d. ; Tonic Sol-fa, 1½d.

This is the most popular number of the opera "Life for the Czar," by Glinka, the founder of the Russian school. The vocal parts are very rhythmic and melodious, and the instrumental parts are brilliant. The music generally is of medium difficulty.

A PRACTICAL GUIDE TO THE THEORY OF MUSIC

CONTAINING NUMEROUS TEST-QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS.BY
JULIA A. O'NEILL

Composer of "EXERCISES FOR THE WEAKER FINGERS" (Progressive Studies, Edited by FRANKLIN TAYLOR, Book 53) and of
 "MELODIOUS TECHNIQUE."
 Price One Shilling. Paper Boards, 1s. 6d.

THE TIMES.

It is in its clear statement of facts, both in writing and by the use of simple diagrams, that Miss Julia O'Neill's book excels.

THE MORNING POST.

Her manner of putting down the facts is concise and clear. An immense amount of ground is covered in logical sequence, and the book is one of the most helpful publications as yet made. It is satisfactory to note that ear-cultivation is touched upon.

MUSICAL OPINION.

It is really surprising the amount of useful matter that Julia A. O'Neill has managed to compress within the covers of her primer, "A Practical Guide to the Theory of Music." Teachers who wish to keep abreast of the times in an educational sense will find this well-written guide calculated to help them to a knowledge of the latest and most accepted method of elementary theoretical instruction. We are pleased to note that the all-important subject of ear-culture has not been neglected in the present primer.

THE LADY.

Is a thoroughly praiseworthy attempt to present the cardinal facts of musical theory in a plain and straightforward manner to the beginner.
 Wholly admirable is the way the gradual formation of our present-day clefs is explained.

NEW EDITION (1912).

A HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS IN MUSIC

CONTAINING
600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERSBY
ERNEST A. DICKS,

FELLOW OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

The scope of this book covers the whole ground of theoretical examinations in music. It supplies an invaluable equipment to candidates entering for the various Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge held periodically throughout the country, and it will be found extremely useful to those who are preparing for the higher grades of Diploma and Degree Examinations.

The book is therefore very comprehensive. Its range includes questions and answers in Theory, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form, Fugue, Acoustics, Musical History, Organ Construction, and Choir Training.

By no means the least valuable part of the volume is that section, consisting of upwards of one hundred pages, which contains reprints of past examination papers set by the Associated Board, Trinity College, and the Incorporated Society of Musicians; the Universities of Oxford,
 Cambridge, London, Dublin, Durham, and Edinburgh, and the Victoria
 University; The Royal Academy of Music, The Royal College of Music, and The Royal College of Organists. The advantage of having so many specimens of these actual examination papers within one cover is too obvious to need further comment or commendation.

PREFACE TO THE NINTH EDITION.

The author desires to acknowledge his great indebtedness to the authorities of the London University; The Royal Academy of Music;
 the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music; The Royal College of Organists; Trinity College of Music, London; and the Incorporated Society of Musicians, for their kindness in allowing him to incorporate copies of their latest Examination Papers in Parts II. and III. of his Handbook, in order that he might present their latest examination requirements.

The

Competition Festival Record

No. 75.

The competition Festivals definitely abandoned for this year include Blackpool, Nottingham, and Hastings. These are all events of importance, affecting probably not fewer than 8,000 competitors, and it is undoubtedly a misfortune for the movement that they will not take place. We hope that if the war is prolonged into next year, festival committees will carefully consider as to whether it is really necessary or advisable completely to abandon their schemes. The movement is not only musical and educational. There is the very important social side to consider. What are the members of village Societies and the children to do with their time? The success of the New Brighton Festival reported below has some significance in this connection.

NEW BRIGHTON TOWER, LIVERPOOL.— September 19.

Notwithstanding the decision of the committees at important Festivals elsewhere in the country to abandon their schemes, the promoters of the New Brighton Festival determined to carry theirs through in its entirety. The pessimists croaked and prophesied failure, but the result showed that they miscalculated the strength of the enthusiasm of the wide circle to which this Festival appeals. The entries were excellent. They included as soloists: Girls (21), Sopranos (27), Altos (32), Tenors (33), Basses (31), most of whom appeared. Besides these there actually appeared six children's choirs, ten male-voice choirs, and seven mixed-voice choirs. A great deal of the singing was of a high grade and the tests were excellent. It is not always that solos are chosen at competitions solely for their artistic merit, as they were on this occasion. The adjudicators were Dr. McNaught and Mr. Dan Price.

The results in the solo classes were as follows:

GIRLS' SOLO.

Test: 'Cherry ripe' (Horn).

Miss Gladys Duncan (Liverpool).

SOPRANO.

Test: 'All Souls' day' (Richard Strauss).

Miss Ada M. Guest (Altrincham).

CONTRALTO.

Test: 'May night' (Brahms).

Miss Myrtle Jones (Birkenhead).

TENOR.

Test: Recit., 'Ye people rend your hearts.'

Air, 'If with all your hearts' (Mendelssohn).

Mr. Griff. Owen (Liverpool).

BASS.

Test: 'The pipes of Pan' (Elgar).

Mr. Llew. Powell (Rhyd-y-mwyn, Mold).

In the Children's Choirs Class the test was T. E. Dunhill's dainty two-part song, 'A lake and a fairy boat.' The beautiful performances given by nearly all the seven choirs aptly illustrated the high pitch of perfection reached by the best school and children's class teachers in this country. In every detail the performances of Woodchurch Road and Llanfihangel were remarkable. We give some of the criticisms of the adjudicators. (The heads of the marking are those frequently described in our columns. Maximum marks 100.)

CHILDREN'S CHOIRS.

ELLESMERE POINT.

10, 10, 25, 26, 18 = 89.

Pleasing tone. Alto shade below pitch first few bars. Very delicate treatment. Soprano occasionally slurring in unsuitable places. Excellent rhythm and pace. Words spoken in refined manner.—(D. P.)

Very delicate. Pretty. The light, gay accent of the rhythm well realised. Alto a wee bit uncertain in tonal attack. Neat. Dainty. Refined style. A grace suggestive of dancing. Expression very good.—(McN.)

LLANFIHANGEL (Mr. C. E. Shimmin).

10, 10, 26, 27, 19 = 92.

Full, mellow tone. Alto a bit weak. Intonation good. Rhythm and pace right. Beautiful diminuendo near end. Very expressive and delicate, with much restraint.—(D. P.)

Quite charming as tone. So well unified. Vowels full. Alto weak in the balance. Expression fascinating. No taint of exaggeration. What a noise this well-developed choir could make if it chose!—(McN.)

CLAUGHTON.

10, 10, 25, 26, 18 = 89.

Good robust tone. Intonation not faultless. A little touch of roughness occasionally. Cadences very well treated. Ending excellent.—(D. P.)

A full tone. Very musical. Not so highly polished. Full of interest all the same. Treated cadences very charmingly. Words very good. Rhythmic. Intonation slightly off. Good, if not supremely dainty.—(McN.)

RHYL STREET.

10, 10, 22, 20, 15 = 77.

Pleasing voices. Not sufficiently springy in the rhythm, and therefore the singing lacked brightness. Words well spoken. Near the end parts not quite together.—(D. P.)

Slow and inelastic. Not dainty. Fair tone. Tonal attack not always clear. Careful. Attack not quite unified. Needs more experience.—(McN.)

GORSE HILL.

10, 8, 25, 25, 18 = 86.

Good tone. Too much movement shown in the breathing. A little too excitable in feeling. Some vowels not quite true, too dark, but the words were neatly spoken. Delicate ending. Very careful training shown.—(D. P.)

(Boys.) Facial expression—also neck and shoulders at work. Very refined tone. Dramatic contrasts. Low notes of alto quite telling. Rhythmic accent very pointed. Never a harsh note. Vehement, but never noisy. Emphasis perhaps a wee bit overdone.—(McN.)

WOODCHURCH ROAD (Mr. G. D. Kermode).

10, 10, 27, 28, 19 = 94.

Excellent tone and balance. A remarkable naturalness in the singing. The treatment all through showing excellent judgment and delicacy. Ending wonderfully beautiful.—(D. P.)

(Girls.)—Wonderful unity of good tone. Like one girl. Full, fluent, dulcet. Charming. Artistic and artless (!) treatment. Pp superb, diaphanous, perfect in taste.—(McN.)

The test in the Male-Voice Choir Class was the now well-known chorus, 'The Assyrian came down' (Cyril Jenkins). This piece presents considerable difficulty on the tonal side, but when freely sung, that is, when a choir can sing it without having to think of its difficulties, it is very striking and dramatic. It was sung very finely alike by the Welsh Choir from Llanrwst, Nelson Arion, Manchester, and Highfield. Mr. T. R. Williams has little to learn about choir-training, at all events in the preparation of a piece of this character, and Mr. Lawson Berry, Mr. J. Kirkham, and Mr. W. Shaw showed almost equal capacity. Dr. McNaught's remarks were as follows :

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

NO. 1.—ACCRINGTON.

10, 7, 23, 24, 16 = 80.

A clear, blendful tone. Good attack. Intonation not perfect. Delicate pp—good tapering of phrase-ends. Fair climax p. 4, but not big and imposing. Best at very soft singing. Intonation again shaky, 48-50. Chording generally very good. Rall. too soon, 22-24. Enunciation good. Rall. generally too much drawn out. Climax, 68-71, disappointing. Again not expansive or grand enough. Did not secure the awe at the end. On the whole not a vivid, moving interpretation. Lacked realisation of climaxes.

NO. 2.—ST. HELENS.

10, 8, 24, 26, 17 = 85.

A vehement start. Arrested attention. A little unsteady as rhythm. First tenor weak but the tone sweet. 22-24 slow too soon. Impetuoso—exciting p. 4; Rall. overdone. Vivid contrasts a good. Moderato. Too fast? Very exciting. Good sostenuto p. 6. Andante. High colour. Lento. Good broad allargando. Some dignity. The end was impressive. A little sharp.

NO. 3.—HIGHFIELD (Mr. W. Shaw).

10, 9, 23, 27, 18 = 87.

A fair tone. Good bass—rich resonance. Tranquillo very good idea. Kept tune. 23, 24 good. Good touches later p. 4. Moderato a fine stealthy movement. Ominous. Tone not so very good, but the treatment showed insight and taste. Rall. always well treated. Lento. The last page displayed all the best qualities of the choir and of the conductor. Half-tone down.

NO. 4.—BLACKHEATH.

10, 8, 23, 24, 17 = 82.

A nervous accent—emphatic—too much grip. Good double bass. Rall. too soon. Tranquillo rather lumbering. Page 3 much better. The climax top p. 4 very good—well controlled. A 'Russian' deep bass at 44 a great asset. Moderato effective. Andante—again too slow. Climax p. 8 good. End showed good treatment. Rhythmic appeal. Half-tone down.

NO. 5.—LLANRWST (Mr. T. R. Williams).

10, 9, 27, 28, 19 = 93.

A fine rhythm at once. Had the delicate contrast—the right 'lilt.' Later the pathetic note in the Tranquillo. Conspicuous unity. Excellent judgment in the treatment of the niceties of rhythmic contrast. Moderato fast = 120. Unity of vowel colour. Attack a feature. The 'lance uplifted,' 65, very good. Lento disappointing in not being broad—sostenuto. After 'sword' a short pause was very effective. Low D very full.

NO. 6.—TODMORDEN.

9, 8, 23, 24, 15 = 79.

A fair opening. Not very well knit as attack. Then began to improve greatly. 26-29 not very feroce—the mood missed. Tone always musical. Chording not good. Moderato good singing, but yet rather formal. Later son very good singing both as to expression and tone. But on the whole not convincing. Climax, 78, 79, excellent—solid and tuneful—blendful. The end also good. $\frac{3}{4}$ -tone down.

NO. 7.—MANCHESTER (Mr. J. Kirkham).

10, 9, 26, 27, 18 = 90.

Well-unified tone and style. Good sostenuto, y rhythmic. Details polished. Climax middling (p. 4). Some verbal expression that was perhaps quite justified. Moderato p. 5 very well treated; judgment here. Master in the control. Deliberate, and yet again quite rhythmic. Fine fat sostenuto. The end was awe-striking. Tone down.

NO. 8.—NELSON ARION (Mr. Lawson Berry).

10, 9, 26, 28, 18 = 91.

Clean, blendful tone. Attack exact. Mood right. Finished and musical. Momentary bad start at p. 26 quick recovery. A beautifully welded tone. Moderato at 120 rather fast, but very well accomplished. The mood so convincing. Good sostenuto at the end movement. Fine chording a feature. First tenors very good.

NO. 9.—HOLME VALLEY.

9, 8, 24, 23, 17 = 81.

A fair tone. Not perfectly knit. Not quite tidy at attack; better as they got on. Tranquillo good. Vivid p. 4; expression a strong point here. The tone would not expand musically, p. 6. Forcing here. Very good at pp. Chording generally fair. Not steady. Lento, but very broad in conception. On the whole a very creditable performance.

NO. 10.—BRIERFIELD.

10, 8, 23, 23, 16 = 80.

A meek start, but a musical tone. Blendful. Over-restrained. Tranquillo fast. Good appeal. Good as attack and unity. Very good 26-30; dramatic. Later the pp very effective. Moderato fair, but did not broaden out at Allargando. Apparently not a great resource for big resonance. Attack and rhythm strong points. The pp beautiful. Lento not big, massive. Evidently best pp and moods of that sort. Semitone down.

The Mixed-Voice Choir tests were Granville Bantock's beautiful part-song 'On Himalay'—surely one of the best examples of his earlier and wholly agreeable style—and Coleridge-Taylor's dramatic and intensely expressive choral song, 'The lee shore'. 'On Himalay' presents no particular tonal difficulty, but it calls for the highest skill in vocalisation and the most beautiful and delicate rhythmic treatment. A tendency to point individual notes in the accentuation or the enunciation of the words has to be overcome. There must always be that ease and smoothness of execution that make the piece flow on without an effort. The mood is pensive and introspective. Technically the end as regards voice-control is very trying to sopranos. No doubt most conductors are wise enough to trust only their best sopranos to sing the passage near the end in which the high A occurs. A point to watch is the perfect balance of the parts at the end, so that A, the third of the key-chord, is properly heard and perfectly chorded. Otherwise the end may prove disappointing. The following are Dr. McNaught's criticisms :

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS.

Tests : 'On Himalay' (Granville Bantock).

'The lee shore' (Coleridge-Taylor).

Copyright, 1903, by Novello and Company, Limited.

1 God bless our native land,
 May heaven's protecting hand
 Still guard our shore;
 May peace her power extend,
 Foe be transformed to friend,
 And Britain's power depend
 On war no more.

2 May just and righteous laws
 Uphold the public cause,
 And bless our Isle:
 Home of the brave and free,
 The land of liberty,
 We pray that still on thee
 Kind Heaven may smile.

3 Nor on this land alone,
 But be Thy mercies known
 From shore to shore:
 Lord, make the nations see
 That men should brothers be,
 And form one family,
 The wide world o'er. Amen.

Ere we leave Thy House, O Father.

VESPER HYMN FOR USE IN TIME OF WAR.

ERNEST HARRISON.

The musical score is written for a four-part choir (Soprano, Alto, Tenor, Bass) and piano accompaniment. It is in the key of B-flat major (two flats) and 4/2 time. The tempo is marked '♩ = 66' and the initial dynamic is 'p' (piano). The score consists of two systems. The first system covers the first two lines of the hymn. The second system covers the last two lines, including the 'A-men.' ending. The piano part features chords and moving lines that support the vocal parts. Dynamics include 'p', 'dim.' (diminuendo), and 'pp' (pianissimo).

1 Ere we leave Thy House, O Father,
For our Nation we would plead;
Guard our Soldiers, God of Armies!
In their need.

2 Spare our Sailors in their perils,
Monarch of the mighty deep;
Safely guide them, Holy Pilot,
Safely keep!

3 Grant to victor and to vanquished,
When their earthly conflicts cease,
Crown of Blessings, Loving Father!
Heaven's own Peace. Amen.

fair. Never very delicate. Good cres. to climax. The dying away was good, but again not controlled. The difficult pp high A for sopranos fair, but they did not descend together. On the whole a fair impression, but not a deep one. End chord not perfectly in tune.

9, 7, 24, 25, 17 = 82.

'The lee shore.'—A fairly dramatic start. Attack good. Volume of tone impressive. Page 3, C sharp for C natural bass. Tenor protruded end p. 4. Some rich resonance. Why dim. p. 3? Sudden pp intended. The Molto, p. 7, not big and passionate—thrilling—enough. Needed more mood. Best point the high colour. Details not finished. Some slight over-eager attack on part of individuals. Kept pitch.

(1st) COLNE VALLEY (Dr. T. E. Pearson.)

10, 9, 26, 26, 18 = 89.

'On Himalay.'—Good start tenor. Then the single notes were a little pointed instead of presenting a suave legato and sostenuto. Yet there was much to admire. The feeling was so tender, pensive, dreamy. The end was excellent. A pretty and sweet high A by sopranos. A very good performance, if not ideal.

10, 9, 27, 27, 18 = 91.

'The lee shore.'—Good start. But 'der' in 'thunder' each time too long. 'Thun' is the accented syllable. Vigour and certainly an attraction. Poco tran. excellent. Beautiful rich chording. Page 5 did not quite expand right up to the pp—withdrawn too soon. Bass excellent. A finely-trained choir. First-rate discipline. All moods well realised. Dignified. Serious. Broad. No finikin effects.

(3rd) ACCRINGTON (Mr. E. Whittaker.)

10, 8, 25, 29, 17 = 89.

'On Himalay.'—A beautiful start. Fine pp blend. A good mood; but not dead in tune (soprano at fault). Finely restrained. Some really masterly interpretation. The gradual dim. to the end was well controlled. High A better, dwell a little more. The chording was not quite pure. The feature was the insight of the interpretation.

9, 8, 25, 25, 17 = 84.

'The lee shore.'—Start fair. 'Thunder' too much end accent. Treble tone tendency to be shrill—not blendful. C sharp for C natural bass bottom p. 3. Mood not serious—grave. Seemed a little laboured. Did not convey the solemnity. But there was much to commend in the attack and design of the interpretation. Kept pitch nearly.

(2nd) GLEDHOLT (Mr. J. F. Sykes.)

10, 9, 27, 27, 18 = 91.

'On Himalay.'—Very tender start. Rather slow—needs to move along more freely. But much to admire in the treatment. Some beautiful chording. Top note soprano A very good indeed. The Morendo was quite excellent. Barring the pace, a highly adequate performance. Fine soprano tone throughout.

10, 9, 25, 25, 16 = 85.

'The lee shore.'—Fair start, but lacking impetuosity. Too delicate (see score, p. 1). Pretty, but not a storm! Had not resource, or at all events did not develop much. Clear, alert execution. pp very good. Later did not achieve the big rich sonority—the broad, loose-throated vowels. Always musical. The end only fairly moving as expression. Kept pitch.

(3rd) HANLEY, PROVIDENCE (Mr. E. Rathbone.)

10, 8, 24, 25, 16 = 83.

'On Himalay.'—(Choir arranged: Tenors and trebles on right; altos and basses on left.) Earnest singing. Fair quality. Not quite steady; but moody. Soprano very attractive. A dreamy sostenuto. Effective and appropriate. Top A and the last bar soprano not very good. A good conception. Needs more finish.

10, 9, 26, 27, 18 = 90.

'The lee shore.'—Showed fine drill at once. The cres. to pp impetuous and yet controlled. Rhythm very effective. Page 5 quite right this time. A gifted conductor. Has fine feeling. Goes to the root of the expression. Last page splendid. Expansion tonally thrilling, and deep feeling displayed. Trifle sharp.

HANLEY AND DISTRICT.

10, 8, 24, 26, 17 = 85.

'On Himalay.'—Good start. Pretty tone. The rhythm not perfectly controlled. The style of treatment very good. The tone grew in interest. A beautiful blend in the chording. The end section was very charming. Tenor protruded somewhat in places. Lost a little. A good interpretation approaching first-rate.

9, 9, 24, 26, 17 = 85.

'The lee shore.'—Not a perfect vocalisation of the first phrase. C sharp for C natural p. 3 bass. A fair power of expansion. Bass seemed hardly a balance. pp very good. A fine blend. Last passage fair as tone. Good as treatment. Tenors lacked sostenuto. Attack always good—a well-disciplined choir. Lost a little.

THE WILLIAM WOOLLEY CHORAL SOCIETY, NOTTINGHAM.

10, 8, 24, 24, 17 = 83.

'On Himalay.'—A smart pace. Just too eager. More placidity and legato demanded. Tone-colour employed good. Smooth vocalisation. Tenor tone uneven—sometimes good (in piano). The dreamy approach to the end quite good. An interesting, if not masterly, interpretation. High A fair. The high G not quite in tune.

10, 9, 24, 26, 18 = 87.

'The lee shore.'—Imposing start. Then not big enough. But the mood generally good. A dramatic, grave feeling. C sharp for C natural bass in the usual place! Alto good. Also soprano. Tenor unequal. The grave ending had richness and a serious appeal. Sincere feeling. Showed insight.

INTONATION.*

Loss of pitch is an evil difficult to avoid in unaccompanied singing. It arises from a great variety of causes; careless delivery, indolence, fatigue, special difficulties in the music, natural inability to sing in tune, shouting, wrong classification (contraltos who 'want to sing treble' or who 'don't like seconds'), wrong use of voice registers, especially by tenors and often by basses in high notes. No conductor can be sure of his choir in this matter. The finest choirs flatten under some circumstances. The tendency can be mitigated by cultivating a strong intention to sing in tune, by eliminating the worst offenders, by voice-training and general discipline, by giving choralists rest, and by vigilance in discovering the exact places where the intonation begins to 'give.' The conductor must not always wait until the end of a piece before testing the pitch. Frequent stops no doubt worry and depress a choir, but in this matter the fault must be discovered and at once denounced, and a proper pattern contrasted with the bad intonation. If good tone, pure blend, and unanimous attack are secured, the liability to flatten is lessened. The worst evil that can happen is for a choir woefully to flatten, unconsciously and quite blissfully. The singers are happy though flat. Where this sorry condition prevails a supreme effort must be made to arouse musical conscience, and instil a healthy dislike of flat singing. Sometimes the intonation is faulty without leading to loss of pitch. The best corrective to this is the slow practice of chords and great attention to the blend. The tendency to sharpen is rare. It is even more painful than flattening, and where the habit is formed it is extremely difficult to correct. The 'happy dispatch' method is probably the only safe cure. It is a curious fact that the fault of flattening or of sharpening is generally caused by a few individuals, who seem to have the power of leavening the whole mass.

Learn to Play at Sight

Quickly

Easily

Pleasantly

You can learn quickly, easily, and pleasantly to play new music correctly at first sight by the Ehremayer System of Pianoforte Sight Playing if you have a knowledge of musical technique.

The Ehremayer System will solve your sight-playing difficulties for you—you will no longer hesitate at difficult chords or awkward passages—your fingers will not need occasional "sorting out"—nor will you carefully avoid difficult pieces—but in three months' time from starting the Ehremayer System you will play any piece of the tremendous volume of music within your technical knowledge with perfect accuracy the first time without previously practising—you will be a proficient sight player—your repertoire will be practically unlimited—the drudgery of practising will be a thing of the past.

Students say: "I really find no difficulty now in reading anything I have tried." "I now read chords almost as easily as single notes—I get a much quicker grasp of a new piece than I used to do." "The once unsurmountable difficulties have all disappeared by your System of Sight Reading."

Write for free booklet, "Playing at Sight," which fully explains the Scientific Principles of the Ehremayer System.

The Inventor of this System is a Frenchman domiciled in England.

TECHNIQUE TECHNIQUE TECHNIQUE

"For a pianist three things are necessary. The first is technique, the second is technique, the third is technique." The success of nearly six thousand pupils has proved convincingly that, in from three to five months,

"From Brain to Keyboard"

MACDONALD SMITH'S SYSTEM

OF PIANOFORTE TOUCH AND TECHNIQUE

GIVES PERMANENT MASTERY OVER ALL DIFFICULTIES OF TECHNIQUE.

Pianist's Cramp, Stiffness, Wooden Touch, Lack of Power and Independence, Thumping, Nervousness, Inability to read at sight, to play arpeggios, trills and long skips, faulty Inflection and Accentuation, are all overcome with amazing rapidity by the eight minutes twice daily application of this System. In fact, there is not a single technical requirement of the pianist or organist, from beginner to the most advanced, which is not successfully met by this System. And the results are permanent and not materially affected by neglect of the instrument. By adopting this system the necessity for perpetual keyboard "practice" is totally abolished—a point of the highest value to the busy hard-working pianist.

Write for my FREE BOOK to-day

I shall be pleased to send you post-free "Light on Pianoforte Playing" which explains my System and its principles. If you will detail any special difficulties you have, I will explain how they can be permanently overcome by the "From Brain to Keyboard" System. Write to-day to

FROM THE LONDON MUSICAL COURIER, NOVEMBER 1, 1913.

THE HOUSE OF BOSWORTH

MR. ARTHUR E. BOSWORTH enjoys the distinction of being the first Englishman to establish a music publishing business with its own branches in the principal music centres of the world, and to have come into personal touch with music sellers in almost every civilized country.

He has accomplished this in the brief span of twenty-four years, and the new commodious London premises, which it was found imperative to take in order that the 30,000 publications of the firm might be advantageously arranged and displayed, is the most eloquent testimony possible to his unique success.

In these days of unparalleled commercial activity the development of this business has created a record. The firm was established by advice of Sir Arthur Sullivan, in a small way at Leipsic in 1889, with the aim of protecting the Gilbert and Sullivan operas in Austria, with which country England had no copyright treaty at that time. It was desired also to push these operas on the Continent generally.

At the inception of the business the members of the firm were Mr. Arthur E. Bosworth and Mr. Karl Kratochwill, with Mr. Thomas Chappell as sleeping partner. Mr. Chappell retired after fifteen months, and Mr. Kratochwill at the end of two years.

Mr. Bosworth, who then took the sole direction of affairs, had much to contend with, not the least of his difficulties being that of language. He showed characteristic British energy, resourcefulness, and consistency of purpose, however, with the result that the name of his firm soon became well known in Germany, Austria, and Scandinavia.

The London house was opened in 1892. A large music publishing business at Vienna was purchased and adapted to his use in 1902, and a branch established at Zurich in 1908 (and at Brussels in 1914). Beside these, the firm has sole agencies in New York, New Zealand, and Toronto.

By means of these houses in the art centres of Europe and America, which form the natural distributing points to the public through the music sellers in each country, he has built up a very large and ever-increasing business, both national and international.

Mr. Bosworth then turned his activities to getting into personal touch with representative music sellers throughout the Empire. He made a tour of South Africa, crossed to Australia, thence to New Zealand and back by way of Canada, visiting the States en route. Those thriving nations of South America were the next to attract his attention, and he recently returned from a tour of that wonderfully fascinating continent.

He has crowned this record, which probably has no parallel, by taking as his London locale the spacious six-story building at 8, Heddon Street, Regent Street. In adapting it to his use he has utilised the suggestions which have resulted from his practical experience and observation, with the result that he has a model music house.

Everything has been arranged with such perfect system that each of the 30,000 publications is instantly available, being systematically filed away in covered recesses in the walls of the commodious showroom on the ground floor. The more important publications are tastefully displayed on the long counters.

The wholesale department is a very large one, and from the corner shown in the accompanying photo an indication of its comprehensiveness may be gathered. The packing and shipping of parcels is a business with Messrs. Bosworth & Co., as will be seen from the apparent activity shown in this important part of the business.

The floors above, which contain several teaching rooms, are reached by the lift in the entrance hall. It will be seen from these brief notes and the illustrations that Mr. Bosworth has one of the largest publishing houses in London.

Further reference may appropriately be made to the catalogue. This embraces not only a very large and important list of publications issued by himself, but those which he has purchased from other houses. In fact, from time to time other complete catalogues have been added. These embrace, for instance, the publishing businesses of Carl Petersen, Leipsic (celebrated Germer works); Eduard Ebner, in Stuttgart, including works of Lebert, Starck, and others; Brixner, Vienna; and the celebrated "Vienna Music Publishing Company, Limited." The firm has recently purchased for a large sum the sole copyright of the British Empire of the famous Steingraber edition, and also the greater part of the catalogue of Wickins & Co. of London.

In England Mr. Bosworth increased his catalogue by large purchases at the sales of Messrs. Robert Cocks & Co., and of Messrs. Stanley Lucas, Limited, when he secured among other works the Daily Technical Studies by Oscar Beringer for £2,420. Mr. Bosworth has since published Mr. Oscar Beringer's now celebrated Pianoforte Tutor, and last, but not least, has, by the publication of the famous Sevcik Violin Method, placed himself in the forefront of educational music publishers of the world.

His firm has had the sole copyright since 1899 of the majority of the works of Moszkowski and Eduard Lassen, the celebrated "Serenata" and "All Souls' Day" having attained a phenomenal sale. The total number of works published by this firm, which is now in its twenty-fourth year of existence, is over 30,000, and the Bosworth Edition of Classics, including the celebrated edition of Beethoven's Sonatas, edited by Liszt, totals over 900 volumes—surely a goodly result of twenty-four years' almost single-handed management.

Among the important works published during the last years may be mentioned Sir Alexander Mackenzie's "Londonday by Day," "Coriolanus," and "Cricket on the Hearth." Havergal Brian's "Vision of Cleopatra," which was successfully produced at the Southport Musical Festival in 1905. Sir Frederick Bridge's "Morte d'Arthur," given at the Norwich Festival; Tobias Matthay's "Relaxation Studies"; Townsend's "Balance of Arm and Modern Piano Teaching"; while other works by Sir Charles V. Stanford, Mr. Granville Bantock, and Mr. Josef Holbrooke show that British composers take by no means a secondary place in the catalogue of the firm.

One cannot close this short record without calling attention to the Collegiate Psalter, edited by the Rev. H. Danby Bainbridge and Sir Frederick Bridge—a splendid work recently published by Bosworth & Co.

In addition to the Psalter, Messrs. Bosworth & Co. have issued, under the editorship of Sir Frederick Bridge, some truly interesting examples of mediæval Church music: Palestrina, Jacob Handl, Marenzio, and others of that school adapted from the originals for use as anthems, while English musicians are represented in the same series by Orlando Gibbons, Richard Dering, Attwood, Goss, and others.

(The above serves as further answer to a contemptible attack on Bosworth & Co.)

THE OUTLOOK FOR BRITISH MUSICIANS.

It is cheering to be able to record that the outlook for British musicians, although far from being normal, is improving. Many important musical enterprises that were threatened with extinction are being carried on bravely, and influential forces have been mobilized for the purpose of striving for the cause of the British executant. Ultimately the issue depends upon the attitude of concert-goers, who, in common with other classes of the community, have been hard financially, and who may not unnaturally have scruples of conscience as to whether musical creation should be sought during a time when there is so much around us that is stern and grim. The question of how to advance the interests of the native executant is complicated by the problem of the foreign alien competitor whom we have to contend with. In this connection we are glad to find that several excellent organizations have come into being, and are formulating schemes designed to mitigate the lot of the numerous British executants of all grades and others concerned in musical enterprises who are sadly in need of support. Below we give particulars of the scheme of the Committee for Music in War-time, and elsewhere in our columns we give a report of a meeting of another representative committee which has much the same aims. The discussion at this meeting was sometimes warm, but at least it was informative. The Music in War-time Committee has, we think, a clear objective: it aims simply to create or find engagements for the native performer, and to encourage performances. The idea of assisting Musical Societies, many of which are dubious as to their ability to pursue their usual course, is an excellent and practical one. The committee offers to find professional singers at a nominal fee, while for their part they guarantee a reasonable fee to the performer. It does not embarrass its missionary efforts by a direct campaign against the foreigner. The other committee also announces a similar policy in the following words:

Without adopting any exclusive policy towards the foreigner, it would seem to be absolutely necessary that at this favourable time, action should be taken to protect the future interests of the native musician, and an effort made to bring about more equitable conditions. This can only be effected by a complete co-operation of all branches.

But it was clear from the discussion that took place at the meeting we report that many who were present looked to the promoters to adopt an aggressive policy towards foreign competition, and must be said that much that was related by the speakers justified bitterness. We summarise some of the chief points:

1. Aliens and chiefly alien enemies have been held and even now hold remunerative engagements in this country. This calls for evidence.

2. British society leaders, and wealthy people who are content to follow any lead from such quarters, have shown an unreasonable preference for foreign performers. It is a form of snobbishness difficult to withstand, and leads to the absurd result that British orchestral players are actually compelled sometimes to pose as Hungarians or Viennese and to contract not to speak their own language during the fulfilment of their engagement.

3. It is said that the foreigner is especially in evidence in restaurant bands. The case of the orchestras employed by Messrs. Lyons & Co. was cited as typical. A public statement made since the meeting took place announces that this firm had discharged all Germans, Austrians, and Hungarians. But it has been stated that the places of many of the discharged performers have been filled by Belgian and French players. If this be so the apparent generosity of this action is really carried out at the sole cost of the British orchestral player, who in these distressful times should have had the offer of the engagement.

4. There is some undercurrent of talk that the refusal of restaurant proprietors to engage English players is owing to onerous trade union conditions. We have no evidence as to this.

5. It is claimed by those who defend the employment of foreign bands that the foreigners are usually more apt than our players with the kind of music admired by frequenters of restaurants. This, if true, is as we believe more owing to our players not being allowed to acquire the experience than to their lack of ability. In other departments of orchestral playing British performers have earned the eulogies of the greatest foreign conductors.

6. Musical agents are said to be to some extent responsible for the preference shown for foreign musicians. The foreigner must necessarily rely on agents to procure and arrange the details of engagements, whereas the native performer does not so freely invoke their aid. There may be some truth in this view, but it must be remembered that the agent exists to supply what the concert-going public are known to desire.

It will be seen from this brief review of the situation that there is much scope for the exercise of the brains and energies of the influential representatives of the profession who are now so laudably banding themselves together. In the end the result we are convinced will be for the benefit of all concerned, not only at this crisis but in the future.

The following is the circular issued by the Committee of Music in War-time :

Among the many activities in this country which the war has for the time being rendered inoperative or thrown into confusion, those connected with music are in urgent need of attention.

They comprise :

- (1) A large body of people (professional musicians) who are dependent for their living upon the opportunity to practise their art ;
- (2) A still larger body of amateurs to whom music is an essential element of life.

These two classes of people together have in times of peace formed Societies in every part of the country for the purpose of giving concerts, holding competitive Festivals, studying and practising music at regular rehearsals, especially through the winter months.

As a result of the war many of these Societies are finding themselves compelled to suspend operations and cancel engagements previously formed. If allowed to continue, this state of things must bring severe distress to a body of artists who for years have deserved well of the public, and at the same time withdraw from the public itself a large humanizing influence.

If music has been wanted in times of peace it is all the more wanted in times of war, and the problem to be solved is this : 'How may the musical activity in this country be enabled to pursue its course while the war lasts ?'

The Committee proposes the following methods, and at the same time will heartily welcome further suggestions :

- (1) It will form a register of competent artists (singers and instrumentalists) requiring work and willing to accept such fees as either the Committee or the Society engaging them is able to offer.
- (2) It will collaborate with local musical Societies anxious to continue their work, but debarred from doing so by the departure of active helpers, or by lack of funds to meet expenses : (a) Helping them to secure the professional artists required ; (b) Making grants towards the Societies' expenses.
- (3) It will further, if funds permit, undertake the arrangement of concerts in places where no Society is operative.
- (4) It will collaborate as far as possible with Societies already ~~in fact~~ in giving free concerts for soldiers and refugees in camps.

Such a scheme must obviously cost money and entail work. The Committee therefore asks for generous contributions in both of these from all who wish to keep alive the music of this country. Help can be given in the following ways :

- (1) Subscriptions and donations from friends of music are needed to provide the necessary working capital.
- (2) Those willing to become guarantors are asked to give their names, and to state the amount which they are able to guarantee.
- (3) Musicians (professional and amateur) whose livelihoods are not endangered by the war, are asked to help : (a) In assisting the central organization ; (b) In carrying out local arrangements in their towns and districts ; (c) In coaching ensemble parties in madrigals, quartets, &c. ; (d) In making up programmes, &c.

The above proposal is issued with the approval of Sir Alexander C. Mackenzie (Principal of the Royal Academy of Music), Sir C. Hubert H. Parry, Bart. (Director of the Royal College of Music), Sir Frederick Bridge, C.V.O. (Chairman of the Board of Trinity College, London), Mr. Landon Ronald (Principal of the Guildhall School of Music), Prof. Granville Bantock (Principal of the Birmingham and Midland Institute of Music), and by the following, who form the Temporary Executive Committee : Messrs. H. C. Colles, H. Walford Davies, A. H. Fox Strangways, R. Vaughan Williams, W. W. Cobbett (temp. hon. sec.), 52, Circus Road, London, S.W.

ON FORM AND COMPOSITION : AN OPEN LETTER TO AN EARNEST YOUNG MUSICIAN.

(FROM ERNEST NEWMAN.)

MY DEAR SIR,—I gather from your letter to me that you are a young man who is very fond of music, and that latterly you have come to believe that you have ideas of your own, but you lack the skill to put them together coherently and work them out logically. You have done a little harmony and a little counterpoint, and are now thinking of taking lessons in form and composition. You ask me to give you some advice as to the best way to conduct your studies in order that you may become a great composer. I respond with alacrity and with pleasure.

As I shall have to say one or two rather discouraging things, let me get them over quickly. In the first place, you must not expect too much from either your books or your teachers. The best way to make a skilled mechanic or an accomplished analyst of you, but not necessarily a great composer. You have already, I understand, begun to feel some doubt as to the perfect wisdom of what is taught you under the name of harmony. I am not surprised at that ; we have most of us gone through a similar experience. There is good ground for saying of the musical profession what one of the characters in 'The Doctor's Dilemma' says of the medical—that it is not a profession but a conspiracy. At any rate it is a priesthood, that keeps mumbling a number of sacrosanct formulas long after their vitality has gone out of them and our capacity for believing in them has vanished. My own case may interest you a little. I must have read a score or two of books on harmony in my time, and yet to this day I cannot see what the authors are driving at now and then, simple as their language is. They tell me—and you—that this progression is good and that one bad. It probably occurs to you, as it often used to do to me, that the flavour of some of the 'bad' progressions is really more appetising than that of the 'good' ones. Let us call it merely a matter of taste, if you like ; but in that case they ought to give us some good reason for laying down that their taste is better than ours. To what can they appeal in support of their own dogma ? Not to the great masters, for on their own admission the masters are perpetually setting at naught the rules of the books. They tell us, of course, that only the great masters are safe in breaking the rules, and that it is therefore necessary for you people like you to learn the rules so as to know when and why to break them. There always seems to me something wrong with a rule that plays the petty tyrant towards little boys and girls and hasn't a word to say for itself when so vigorous grown-up kicks it ignominiously out of the house. You will be told, I know, that this offending combination or progression is justified this or that particular case by the way the great master uses it. Quite so ; but how does that help people like yourself ? If my doctor tells me that my life absolutely depends on my keeping sob ut that under certain circumstances I may get drunk with impunity, I expect him to tell me what these circumstances are. My very existence depends on my knowing; and if he knows, it is his obvious duty to tell me. If he won't, I assume that he can't. Now when a teacher says to me, 'This is a rule that must never be broken except under certain circumstances that justify the breaking of it,' I naturally expect him to tell me how to recognise these circumstances when they arise. It is no use his telling me under what circumstances Bach or Beethoven or Wagner broke the rule. If I am only to break it under the same circumstances, I am merely copying the great composer without understanding why. What I want to know is when and how I may break the rule myself. If my teacher does not tell me that, he is not training me properly. But of course, as he will admit, he cannot tell me that. He is simply in a vicious circle: the rule is the right way of doing things, but the opposite way—the wrong way—is the right way if it sounds right. I submit that at this is not playing the game: in business it could be regarded as rather sharp practice.

So with the general method of teaching harmony. You have given me the title of the harmony book you are using. It is one of the best manuals of its kind; but, like yourself, I am puzzled by the remark on an early page that 'the student must endeavour, from the very first, to mentally realise the sound of every chord and progression that he writes. Otherwise his progress will be considerably retarded, and the usefulness of the study be nullified.' Is it a general practice, then, to teach harmony to people who cannot mentally realise the sound of the chords they are putting on paper? If so, how on earth do they do it? What on earth do they imagine they are doing? This is one of the things in connection with music-teaching which, as I have said, I have never been able to understand; and no amount of explanation has ever been able or will ever be able to make it intelligible to me. The mind of a student who is doing harmony exercises without the faculty of realising the sound of the chords he is writing is as incomprehensible to me as the psychology of a steam-engine. I always thought harmony was a language; apparently the text-books want to persuade us that it is a game, a series of 'moves,'—a game that quite unmusical people can play by putting notes together like differently coloured pieces of wood. If this is the way you are studying harmony, I implore you to give it up at once. Whatever you may do on those lines, you will never become a composer, or even a musician. If you cannot think harmonically, if your brain does not spontaneously translate its impulses into harmony as the brain of the painter translates its impulses into line and colour, no book and no teacher will ever be able to make you do so. And if you are a harmonist by the grace of God, you will find, if you listen to plenty of good music, that you know practically all there is to be known about harmony before you open a book on the subject. The books will simply put in precise language for you a number of convictions to which you have already attained intuitively. As for the 'rules,'—well, as I have said, the books make the fundamental mistake of supposing that good taste, which is what they are aiming at establishing, is a matter merely of the progression of this chord into that, whereas it is really a matter of the passage as a whole. There is probably not a thing they tell you not to do that cannot be made to sound perfectly right if only it is an indispensable part of a rational and worthy idea. It is the idea that matters, not the chords quà chords; the sentence, the paragraph, the argument, not the words quà words. What you have to do then, is to get good ideas, and how will the books and the teachers help you to do this? The only people who can be taught, indeed, in music as in everything else, are the people who hardly need any teaching.

Do not misunderstand me. There are two misconceptions I wish you to guard against. In the first place, don't imagine that because the 'rules' of the text-books have no such authority as the professors would attach to them, you can therefore put anything you like on paper. If it is silly to do the usual thing simply because it is usual, it is equally silly to do the unusual thing simply because it is unusual. A composer can be as big a bore with consecutive fifths, with clashing seconds, with long successions of sevenths and ninths, as with the dullest grind of tonic and dominant. If there is no real virtue in the prohibition of consecutive fifths, there is also no virtue in fifths for fifths' sake. An idiom that is utterly unlike the conventional one may be as tiresome as the idiom that is all convention. Once more, it is a matter entirely of the idea. Your idea must speak clearly through the texture; the texture must justify itself as being the only possible way of expressing that particular idea. In other words, all you have to do is to be a genius; with something to say and a 'thorough knowledge of how to say it. And here again no text-book will give you much help that is worth having. For in music, as in prose and verse, every idea has its own pre-appointed, inevitable form of expression; and as the idea must be your own, so also must the expression of it. The misfortune of the harmony text-books is that they do not deal with ideas but with, so to speak, words and letters alone.

The second misconception against which I wish to warn you is this: Don't imagine that because the professors and their rules don't matter, technique doesn't matter. It really matters a great deal. You cannot work too hard at counterpoint and all its offshoots, and at the general technique of composition. But here again, if you are going to be a great composer—and I will assume that you are too benevolent a man to ask your fellow-creatures to listen to your music unless you are—you will simply have to make your own technique, or rather your ideas will make it unconsciously for themselves in the course of time. For technique of the highest kind is not a potted something that can be bought at an academy and then applied to ideas like brillantine to the hair. Indeed, just when technique is beginning to do its real work it virtually ceases to be recognisable as technique, and becomes that much more important thing, imagination—imagination working with a heaven-guided logic of its own of which technique is merely the humble, unconscious instrument. Technique will only give the composer, as it gives the pianist, a quick hand and a flexible wrist; it will not make a player or a composer of him if it is not heaven's will that he should become one—and, if I may permit myself for one moment to become the mouthpiece of Providence, very few people are intended by heaven to compose or to play, or at all events to play to and compose at other people. There is no excuse at all—beyond, of course, that of the necessity of earning a living—for doing a thing in public unless you can do it superlatively well. I am again assuming, as you will see, that you only want to compose because you feel you are one of the predestined great ones. If so, once more I say to you, you will require very little schooling of the bookish kind. Wagner learned all that the schools could teach him in six months; after that he had to make his technique himself. No one else could have taught him, for no one else could have had the least inkling of what it was Wagner wanted to say; and you simply cannot teach a man self-expression unless you know what his self is, and what it is trying to express. If you are big enough, you will make your own technique as you go on, partly out of what your books and your teachers have taught you, partly out of the urgent need of your ideas to find a voice and a form. For all things in this world, if they are genuine things, do really find their own form, their own voice, which is really their own logical self-expression. The form of a tree is just the realisation of the idea of a tree. All that you have to do, then, if you wish to be a great composer, is simply to have great ideas,—ideas so vitalised from their birth that you can no more stop them from evolving to their natural conclusion than you can stop a bulb from developing into a flower (given, of course, in the former case the right kind of technical preparation, just as the latter case implies the right kind of preparation of the soil). In a word, all you need to do is to be a genius. You will see, then, how easy it is to be a great composer if only you go the right way about it. The reason for there being so few great composers is that so few people do go the right way about it. Most of them begin too late. They commence by choosing a teacher: they really ought to have commenced, long before that, by choosing their parents.

(To be continued.)

Madame Clara Butt and Mr. Kennerley Rumford have decided to give the whole of the proceeds of each of the concerts (after deducting the actual working expenses only) during their forthcoming autumn tour to Her Majesty's 'Work for Women' Fund and other War Relief Funds. The tour, consisting of twenty concerts, commenced at Sheffield on October 15, and will last until December.

MUSICAL CLICHÉS AND COPYRIGHT.

By G. H. CLUTSAM.

Among other harmonic clichés that support the welfare of many an anæmic phrase making a dubious claim for originality as a melody, the following calls for attention:

There is much indecision as to the notation of the second chord. Some composers, like some theorists, express a preference for a B flat in place of the A sharp as above, and, although to avoid any question of their competency in solving harmonic riddles, have frequently been known to write both ways in the course of one composition. The temptation to follow this effective start with its corollary:

is difficult to avoid, and a statistical friend delving through some two or three hundred songs and salon pieces that were representative of the taste of the average London publisher found these phrases in various forms of primitive expression existent in fifty-nine per cent. of the publication. He also found that there was an interesting continuation of the corollary above illustrated in the following rich and luscious progression:

Also, in the second chord of this passage there is ever a considerable divergence of opinion as to the correct notation. Its first three chords, moreover, have been responsible for some important successes as a main theme, but as in this respect it is too brief and obvious to suffer an exaggerated repetition, the progression when plagiarised serves frequently for less important sections of the composition.

There is a variant of the harmonic cliché shown in the previous article:

hat has supported scores of really tuney tunes to phemeral appreciation on its broad shoulders, and, further, has finished off a million ballads, to the rapturous admiration of the lay multitude, with penultimate top note on the dominant.

A little phrase that joins up odd sections with a tartling unanimity of appreciation from all sorts and conditions of composers calls aloud for quotation:

and if you sharpen the fifth in the final chord, you give the thing a poignant touch that is practically certain of its emotional effect. The terrible use of the dominant with augmented fifth, in any case, should be the subject of a special committee of laymen and symphony-composers. Commercial artists, both creative and interpretative, and publishers on account of their prejudices, should of course not be represented. Other points that call for consideration are syncopated accompaniments, the falling in of the tune after the first beat of the bar (a bad habit acquired from the French), the extraordinary and almost uniform idea, in a thousand instances, of what a four-bar introductory symphony ought to be, and the one and inevitable triumphant conclusion that is hurled with a complacent barbarity in its beautifully banal completeness at the long-suffering but entirely contented public.

It may have been noticed that most of this article has been concerned actually with the song output of the English publisher, and although the matter is only touched upon in the most tentative of fashions, the idea of calling attention to the foregoing clichés (a few of many) is to put again a question as to the actual value to musical art of the copyright law as it is at present exercised. Only a few days ago the Master of the Rolls, in deciding a question of copyright in a certain popular song, which only concerned, however, the words, remarked: 'I regret that such rubbish as part of both songs should ever be brought before the Court, and that anybody should be entitled to protection in respect of it. However, if anybody has a copyright in rubbish, the Court must protect him!' The Master of the Rolls, of course, had little difficulty in deciding in this case from the literary point of view. If it had been a musical matter there would have been certainly a much greater difficulty in coming to a satisfactory decision. As a matter of fact, almost all the cases where a court of law has been called upon to decide a question of musical copyright have been concerned with the rights of musical rubbish. All the tremendous arguments and bickerings over legal points, fees, royalties, mechanical rights, arrangements between publisher and composer, and the thousand and one other things that have kept committees busily and hotly engaged week after week on end when the necessity for adjusting the copyright laws of the land has arisen, are mainly to assure some sort of security and assert a property in what is not secure, and what is decidedly not an individual property. The broad, grim, and essential fact insists itself that the copyright laws have their only value, and only exercise it, in protecting what, logically and practically considered, is not endowed with any characteristic worthy of protection.

They are absolutely necessary, of course, to secure any original work the just protection of its contents, but in the innumerable cases where a play of the musical imitative faculties on such or similar clichés as have been exemplified in this article results in the production of utterly banal and unprivileged music, that clamours for a protection in Great Britain, the Colonies, Canada, U.S.A., and all other parts of the civilised world (and gets it!), a revision and many reservations of the powers of copyright seem to be called for at the earliest possible moment.

Occasional Notes.

DR. RICHTER
AND ENGLISH DEGREES.

A doubt has been cast upon the statement (said by The Times to have been reported in the Berlin Press) that Dr. Richter had renounced the honorary degrees conferred on him by the University of Oxford and the Victoria University, Manchester. We thought it expedient to inquire of the Authorities, and have received the following replies from the Vice-Chancellors of the two Universities named:

Christ Church, Oxford.

October 20, 1914.

DEAR SIR,—So far as I know, no communication has reached the University from Dr. Hans Richter. Perhaps I may say that I do not see quite what he can do in regard to his Honorary Degree. An Honorary Degree does not confer membership of the University, or any other privileges connected with the University. It is merely a distinction conferred on a particular day. An Honorary Doctor can, of course, cease to mention it amongst his distinctions, but that is all.—Yours very truly,

T. B. STRONG, V.-C.

The Editor, the Musical Times.

From the Vice-Chancellor,
The University, Manchester.

October 20, 1914.

DEAR SIR,—In reply to your letter of the 19th, I beg to state that the Victoria University of Manchester has received no letter or any other indication from Dr. Richter that he intends resigning the honorary degree of Doctor of Music conferred upon him. I might point out that it would be impossible for him to resign the degree, though he can cease to use the title of Doctor of Music of this University which was conferred upon him. I trust, however, that the report which has found currency in the papers is incorrect.

Believe me, Yours sincerely,

F. E. WEISS.

The Editor, the Musical Times.

We have discovered a new field in which the out-of-work British musician, and especially if he be a composer, may find useful occupation. Let him summon forth all his powers of imagination, ready improvisation and musical suggestiveness, and apply for a job as cinema pianist. Magnificent tone-poems, it appears, are being turned out daily at our biodromes and cinadiums, or whatever they are called now, while moving dramas are unfolded on the screen. We have been unfortunate in our own visits, but surprising things, we are sure, are being done somewhere in the dark, if the 'instructions' issued to cinema pianists are any guide. Here are two specimens unearthed by 'Mr. Gossip' of the Daily Sketch:

'THROUGH LIFE'S WINDOW.' DRAMA.

As an introduction play light waltzes or tangoes, suggestive of society life—until he meets Helen—then love song—until the young officer goes to war—then change to dramatic theme, such as 'Humoreske'—until the battle scenes—then appropriate effects—continuing with classical selections—until Chester overhears them talking—then strongly dramatic piece suggestive of sacrifice—continuing emotional through the following scenes—until after the lapse of five years—then heavy waltz or gavotte—until Chester revisits the old scenes—then pathetic selection—closing softly with melody suggestive of benediction.

'TAKEN BY STORM.' COMEDY-DRAMA.

Opening with a strongly accented waltz—as Jim knocks his rival down—change to appropriate struggle music—continuing with Romanze, not too heavily, to suggest the humour of the situation—as he carries off the girl by main force—until the porch scenes—then comedy song—continuing with more dramatic melody of dignified theme—until they have a severe quarrel—then emotional music—changing to strongly dramatic as the villain induces her to go driving—then quicken to fast gallop with 'struggle music' as she tries to get away—continuing with this until she drives up and Jim helps her from the carriage—then strongly emotional selection—closing with love ballad in minor key.

THE ROYAL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY

The work of this famous old Society is to continue without interruption, and the 103rd season is announced, to open on November 3.

The death of Herr Mengelberg is a severe blow to the Society, five of whose concerts he was to conduct this season. It has been arranged for the first two concerts to be conducted by Mr. Thomas Beecham and the third by M. Savonov. A feature of the first concert will be the Flourish of Trumpets, written for the Delhi Durbar by Sir Charles Stanford, which will be played by the musicians of the First Life Guards, conducted by George Miller. The programme will include Saint-Saëns's C minor Symphony, Liszt's A major Pianoforte concerto, played by M. Sapelnikov, and Madame Kirkby Lunn will sing. For the second concert Berlioz's 'Te Deum' is promised, with a Northern choir to sing.

It was stated recently in numerous newspapers that the German Government had seized the whole of the plates of 'lead and zinc' used in the production of music scores for the purpose of melting them down to make bullets for the Army, and that this action had ruined several of the great music publishers of Berlin. We are incredulous, and almost uncharitable enough to feel that the news is too good to be true. Even if the statement be true as to the seizure, it would be easy to photograph existing copies of the music and thus print exactly as before. This what is being done now in this country with 'Peter' editions. Mr. Algernon Ashton complains that his plates may be all sacrificed. Nemesis!

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE HISTORY OF MUSIC PRINTING IN THE LIBRARY OF MR. ALFRED H. LITTLETON.

BY JEFFREY PULVER.

When I was privileged to inspect and handle the books contained in the collection owned by Mr. Alfred Henry Littleton, I was struck, not so much by the number—for I know of many much larger collections—not so much by their value, although some of the rarest examples of the music printer's art are included as by the great care that must have been bestowed upon the bringing together of the library. It is immediately evident that the object of Mr. Littleton was not so much to fill his shelves with a huge number of volumes; it is clear that his aim was to secure only such works as illustrated the origin and progress of the typographic art as applied to music. In this endeavour he has been eminently successful, for his book-cases contain what I hold to be veritable milestones in the history of music printing,—specimens showing the different methods in use during the first two centuries of typographical development. And think a very entertaining and instructive half-hour may be spent in considering a few of these objects, lessons in calf and vellum. Mr. Littleton's own method of cataloguing* may be adopted here with advantage: that of treating the publications in chronological order, keeping the productions of each country distinct.

As a fitting prelude to a consideration of the book printed in Germany and Switzerland must be mentioned the 'Psalmorum Codex' of Fust and Schoeffer (Mayence, 1457). Mr. Littleton possesses but two leaves of this, the first, printed book with dated colophon; but these two leaves are sufficient to illustrate the first method of supplying music in early printed works. Spaces were left in the appropriate places and the notation filled in by hand. What is undoubtedly the earliest example of printed music is shown in Johannes Gerson's 'Collectorium super Magnificat' (Conrad Fyner, Esslingen, 1473). In this interesting volume by Johannes or Jean Charles de Gerson, the music was printed together with the letterpress, the lines of the staff being filled in afterwards. The example under consideration has had the four-line staff supplied by the illuminator, while the copies preserved in the British Museum and in the John Rylands Library at Manchester lack the lines. The alternative method of supplying music in the early incunabula is exemplified in a 'Psalterium et Hymnarium'; in this work, which is undated, but which was most probably issued between 1470 and 1480, the lines only are printed, the notes having to be filled in in manuscript. Mr. Littleton's catalogue suggests that this may prove the printer to have been unable to supply the notes, or that they were intentionally omitted so that 'the authorities of individual churches might have the opportunity of serting the music of the service which was according to their own particular "use." The latter may, of course, have been the case, but the fact remains that many non-ecclesiastical works appeared which similarly had printed lines and manuscript notes.

* 'A catalogue of one hundred works illustrating the history of music printing from the 15th to the end of the 17th century in the library of Alfred Henry Littleton, master of the Musicians' Company, 1910-11' (Novello, 1911). This catalogue mentions the book shown at Fishmongers' Hall in 1904, in the Exhibition organized by the Worshipful Company of Musicians.

An exceedingly interesting and valuable specimen of 15th century music printing from wood blocks 'Flores Musice omnis cāsus Gregoriani, &c.' by Hugo von Reutlingen (H. Spechtshart), printed by Pryss, of Strasburg. This copy is undated, and may be earlier than the one in the British Museum which bears the date 1488. These two examples represent entirely different editions, for in the Littleton specimen the work consists of six hundred and thirty-five verses of Latin hexameters set out in separate verses, while in the Museum copy the poetry runs on. The types of the letterpress are also from different founts. I believe, however, that the musical examples in both issues were printed from the same blocks. The British Museum copy, which is exhibited in a show-case, lacks a woodcut which is present in Mr. Littleton's example, but the latter wants two leaves which have been supplied in manuscript. The Littleton copy, as is mentioned above, does not bear a date, while the Museum specimen has a colophon reading 'Imppsum Argentine p Johannem pryss Anno MCCCCXXXVIII.' This is, as far as my research enables me to judge, one of the first books to contain both notes and lines printed. There can be no doubt as to the date of the 'Agenda Parochialium Ecclesiarum,' for it bears that of 1488. This folio was printed by Michael Wenssler and Jacob de Kilchen, at Bâle, and the specimen in Mr. Littleton's possession is, according to Mr. W. Barclay Squire,* probably unique. To illustrate wood-block printing at the turn of the century, Nicolaus Wollick's 'Opus Aureum. Jusice Castigatissimū de Gregoriana et Figuratiua tq. contrapūcto simplici per comode tractans, &c.' may serve. This is a quarto, and was produced by Henricus Quentell at Cologne in 1501.

Another work, interesting on account of its great rarity, is the 'Melopoiaie sive Harmoniae Tetracenticae super XXII genera carminum Heroicorū Elegiacorū Lyricorum et ecclesiasticorum hymnorum,' by Petrus Tritonius. The printer was Erhardus Oglin, working at Augsberg. In comparing this copy with the one preserved in the British Museum (show-case) we find some interesting differences. The last page, which is blank in Mr. Littleton's copy, contains in the Museum example, 'Theoderici senii phrisii medici et poete Laureati ad Chunradum Celtem carmen'; eighteen verses follow beginning 'Orphea cum Siluis fluuios et saxa mouentem'; then, most interesting of all, the colophon: 'Impressum anno sesquimillesimo et VII. Auguste.' I am of opinion that the Littleton copy is the earlier of the two; there is, of course, no evidence other than circumstantial to support this assertion, but sufficient indications are, I think, forthcoming to prove the Museum example to be of later date. In the first place, the editor is more likely to have added the contents of the last page than to have removed them: the poem may not have been ready, or deemed unnecessary, when the first impression appeared. Perhaps more conclusive is the evidence of a slight crack in the block from which the picture on folio 10 was printed; this crack is much wider and longer in the Museum copy, and argues greater age. Mr. Littleton's copy may have been an early proof if not representative of a distinct impression. Apart from these points, the work itself is sufficiently rare to merit a little more notice. The music, which stands as 'the earliest known example of music-type applicable to mensural music in Germany'* was produced by two printings, and Oglin is thus mentioned at the end of the work:

'Inter Germanos nostros fuit Oglin Erhardus
Qui primus intidas† pressit in aeris notas
Primus et hic lyricas expressit carmine musas
Quatuor et docuit uocibus aere cani.'

The book contains twenty-two odes in the several representative metres set to music in four parts (Discantus, Tenor, Altus, Bassus), and gives a list of hymns that may be sung to the same melodies. On folio 2 there is a woodcut representing Apollo on Mount Parnassus playing upon a bowed instrument. Surrounding the central figure are others performing upon contemporary instruments. The cut on folio 10 shows Apollo, Pallas, Mercury, and Zeus, and the Muses playing on Trumpet, Lute, Tambourine, Hurdy-Gurdy, Dulcimer, Pan-Pipes, Horn, Viol, and Organ.

The committee of the Bristol Madrigal Society, which was instituted in 1837, propose at the seventy-ninth Annual Ladies' Night in January next to celebrate the fact that the musical director of the Society, Mr. Daniel W. Rootham, is to conduct for the fiftieth consecutive occasion. A representative programme of the finest madrigals of the Flemish, Italian, Elizabethan, and Jacobean periods is being arranged, and Sir Hubert Parry and Sir Charles Stanford have written works specially in honour of the occasion. It is also proposed to make a presentation to Mr. Rootham at the concert, and all old Madrigalians—at home and abroad—and indeed any who desire to join in so well-deserved a testimony to half-a-century's devoted work, are cordially invited to communicate with the hon. secretary of the Society, Mr. W. Roberts, 17, Victoria Square, Clifton, or the hon. treasurer, Mr. J. Simpson, Osborne House, Cotham Park, Bristol.

The Independent Music Club has undertaken the organization of concerts in military centres and camps, and has started an emergency fund from which fees can be guaranteed to the musicians engaged. It is believed that these concerts will not only be self-supporting, but will provide a small surplus for the fund, which it is proposed to use for relieving pressing cases of distress and destitution primarily among the members of the Club and then the profession at large. In support of this fund and for the promotion of such concerts an appeal is made to all music-lovers. Contributions should be sent to the honorary treasurer of the Emergency Fund, Independent Music Club, 13, Pembroke Gardens, Kensington.

The London Choral Society will open their season at Queen's Hall on November 4, with an all-British programme, in the course of which the following will be given under Mr. Arthur Fagge's direction: Sir C. V. Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet'; Mrs. Margaret Meredith's 'Recessional' (Kipling); and various small choral pieces by Mr. Percy Grainger. A concert of unaccompanied choral music is also announced.

Under the patronage of H. M. Queen Alexandra four concerts will be given at Leighton House on November 6 and 13, December 4 and 11, in aid of the War Hospital Service. A number of eminent British artists have been engaged to appear.

Mr. Daniel Mayer, who is a naturalised British subject, has resigned the position of Mayor of Bexhill in recognition of the feeling in the town that the office should be held by a British-born subject. His son, Mr. Rudolph Mayer, is serving with the British forces.

Mr. Clifford B. Edgar, Mus. Bac., has presented, on behalf of the Musicians' Company, of which he is the retiring Master, an equipment of instruments (bugles, fifes and drums) to the band of the new (10th) Battalion of the Royal Fusiliers (City of London Regiment).

MUSICAL NOTATION.

PRACTICAL WAYS OF EXPRESSING
DETAILS OF MUSICAL COMPOSITION.

BY H. ELLIOT BUTTON.

SECTION V.—ACCIDENTALS.

This comprehensive term is employed, for want of a better, to denote all sharps, flats, and naturals used apart from those in the key-signature.

An accidental is of course effective only in the bar in which it is written, but there are cases in which it is advisable to contradict it in the following bar, e.g., if the particular note affected is the last in that bar and the first in the next, the accidental must be neutralised. In such passages as the following :

the natural to B must be neutralised in the next bar by a flat. But if one or more notes had intervened the flat would not have been necessary or even advisable.

It is well to use as few accidentals as possible without leaving your intention indefinite or questionable. Some composers are addicted to adding unnecessary accidentals for safety, but more often than not these so-called 'safety accidentals' lead to slips in execution. In fact the inclusion of an unnecessary accidental is more likely to mislead than the omission of one that should rightly be inserted, but about which there can be no doubt.

A few examples will show clearly the employment of necessary and unnecessary accidentals :

'I saw the Lord.' CUTHBERT HARRIS.

Lord . . of Hosts. Thou art wor - thy, O Lord, f Gt. Ped.

In this instance, were it not for the natural to D, the sopranos would be liable to read D sharp because they might naturally expect the chord of B major. There is, however, no need to add the natural to D in the accompaniment, for the organist, grasping the harmonic scheme, would not be liable to play anything but D natural.

In the following example also the F natural implies the D natural :

But note that the contrary would not be the case—the D natural would not imply F natural.

The following passage is an excellent example of the correct omission of an accidental.

The G in the melody must of necessity be natural, as it is an appoggiatura to the F ; to add a natural would therefore be unnecessary.

There are, however, some cases in which a safety accidental is of great value. This passage :

was submitted to ten experienced musicians who were asked to read it at sight. The first stopped at the last crotchet, and after consideration played D#, but the other nine all played D# unhesitatingly. The reason is not difficult to discover. The D# in the previous crotchet is a grace note, and forms no part of the harmonic scheme. One therefore is inclined to take it for granted that the following D is D#, just as in the following example :

one would naturally play C# on the third crotchet, even if no # were printed, because the preceding C# is a grace note.

There is yet another reason why these musicians were misled into playing D#. It becomes a habit in reading contrapuntal compositions to follow mentally the various parts—to think horizontally, in fact, instead of vertically—and one is apt to forget that the # to D in the tenor also applies to the following D in the bass part. A sharp to the bass D is therefore not only advisable but necessary.

When an accidental occurs to a grace note there is no need to contradict it in the harmony note in the following bar, e.g. :

The natural to C is quite unnecessary, because the harmony is not affected by the grace note C sharp.

It will now be seen that there are several circumstances to be considered before deciding whether an accidental is advisable or superfluous.

If, when writing a piece with the signature of one sharp, you introduce a passage, say, in G minor, do not add a sharp to F unless you are sure it is necessary. Should you determine that the sharp is advisable, it should be used in every case throughout the passage, because the reader becomes accustomed to the sight of it, and, if it is omitted, will probably play F natural.

In enharmonic passages such as :

and—there is obviously no need for a natural to E in the first, or a natural to B in the second.

In scale-passages extending over an octave there seems to be no uniformity among composers as to the repetition of accidentals, though the majority seem to be in favour of using them to each octave except where the sign 8va..... is used, as in the following example :

It would seem to be more logical to add the accidentals to the last octave, since the notes are in a different position on the instrument.

The double-sharp and double-flat are sometimes contradicted by $\sharp\sharp$ and $\flat\flat$. These naturals are unnecessary, and therefore to be regretted, the simple sharp or flat being sufficient contradiction, and quite unmistakable. After all, $C\sharp$ can be nothing but C , even if a natural precede it ($\natural\sharp C$). The same remark applies with equal force in the case of change of key-signature. When changing from the key of G to the key of B \flat , to insert a natural to contradict the F \sharp before writing the two flats is unnecessary and clumsy. The principle, if carried to its logical conclusion, leads us into such an absurd complication as the following :

Even when changing from a key with three or four sharps in the signature to one with fewer sharps, the naturals may safely and with advantage be omitted :

The F# here is quite sufficient, and should the two naturals be added  the signature may readily be mistaken for one of three sharps if the light is bad or the player's eyesight indifferent. Such naturals, then, are not only useless but a source of danger.

When an appoggiatura makes it necessary for one note to bear two accidentals, great care must be taken that the arrangement is as clear as possible. Compare the following :

The composer must be guided by circumstances as to which is the clearest method of notating such passages.

In the following :

the difficulty can be got over by an enharmonic change of the appoggiatura, thus :

Here the harmonic objection is perhaps outweighed by the enhanced clearness of notation. But it must be acknowledged that none of these examples is wholly satisfactory. Let us hope that some better method may yet be discovered.

An accidental should not be repeated at the beginning of a bar when the note is tied to one in a previous bar :

But there are exceptions to this rule, e.g.:

would look clearer if written thus:

Church and Organ Music.

THE COMPLEAT ORGANIST.

BY HARVEY GRACE.

X.—OF CONGREGATIONAL SINGING.

Clericus, Laicus, Organicus, Auctor.

Auctor.—Well, reverend sir, how go things at St. Abinadab's?

Clericus.—I'm afraid we are a little unsettled. You remember our homely musical ways, our hearty congregational singing and simple music? I fear 'tis all gone, thanks to our new organist, against whom I have not a word to say, save that he is too good a musician for us simple folk.

Auctor.—How so? Surely you can't have too good a musician as your organist.

Musician.—I'm not so sure of that. Our people have been accustomed to making a joyful noise. We had a choir, but it was hardly necessary. It looked nice—some of it, at least—and the smoothing over of jealousies among the men, and the occasional handing over of a refractory boy to the secular arm, provided me with some sporting interest in the music. On the whole, we were uncultivated, but happy

His daughter, who also possesses the family ability to clothe a melody with appropriate harmony on the spur of the moment, takes a hand 'as well. Her contribution to the common stock is more melodious, being an exact reproduction of the tune a third below. This method is generally known in the humbler musical circles as 'singing seconds,' and is so-called, I suppose, because the interval of a third is used exclusively. I give it a more imposing title, and call it a canon in the third below, both parts being used simultaneously. So she sings:

The combined efforts of the family—mamma singing the melody—result in:

—harmony, by-the-way, which is as good as that of some popular mission hymns by which not a few of the clergy set great store. I do not object to it so much in itself. Sung by its composers, after Sunday evening supper, at 'The Lindens,' Acacia Road, it may have an appeal all its own. I protest only when it is used at St. Abinadab's side by side with the harmony sung by the choir, resulting, for the ears of those so placed as to be able to hear the tout ensemble, in this:

The chords marked * are much too Debussyesque for church use. If these good people want to sing in harmony, let 'em practise, and learn to read, or else for ever hold their peace.

Laius.—Quite so! But, better still, why not encourage them to sing in unison, and leave the harmony to choir and organ? This can be done only if hymns are pitched so that the average voice is suited. Everybody surely admits the fine effect of a crowd singing a melody in unison. Why not choose tunes of a broad type, pitch them fairly low, take them at a moderate pace, and try to make this imposing effect a feature at every service?

Organicus.—But how are you going to ensure that people will confine themselves to the melody only? If a man feels inspired to invent a new and original tenor or bass part, nothing can stop him. Brawling is an indictable offence, but not bawling. And what of the man who is a capable reader, and sings his part correctly from a tune-book? Would you ask him also to sing in unison?

Laius.—Yes. The effect of a solitary tenor or bass among a crowd of people singing the air is ludicrous. Such an one should be invited to join the choir, or else conform to the usage adopted by the bulk of his fellows. If he won't, he won't and there's an end to it. But I fancy that only a cantankerous one here and there would insist on his right to please himself.

Talking of hymn tunes, I should like to say (with all diffidence, and remembering that I am a layman and you an organist) that congregational singing demands a steadier pace than is usual. The accompanying of a crowd of people is not an easy task. Yet you will find your organists' instruction books almost silent on the point. Your pupils are taught how to play solos, and (sometimes) how to accompany a choir. Consequently, when they are asked to play for a crowd they have usually only one object, and that is to prevent the people dragging. Now you cannot expect an elephant to dance like a gazelle, and you must not expect a big crowd of untaught and unconded singers to move with the lightness and precision of a trained choir. You have also to remember that the slow pace at which sound travels is a factor even in a building of only moderate size. Our young organist, however, is usually obsessed with the idea that people will always drag if not goaded, spurred, and generally 'chivied' on by the accompanist, so he plays accordingly. Will he humour the mass at the end of a line, give them time to finish it comfortably, and take a deep breath before going on? Not a bit of it! For him, a note of one beat is a note of one beat,—indeed, in his haste, a note of three beats often becomes one of two and a-half. Dr. Vaughan Williams, who is as good a musician as most of you organists, says in the preface to the 'English Hymnal' that it is 'a painful experience to hear an organist trying to play through a C.M. or L.M. tune in absolutely strict time, regardless of the slight pauses which the congregation, with unconscious artistic insight, are inclined to make at the end of every line.' If you object that this pause disturbs the rhythm, I answer that it is to be welcomed for that very reason. Here is the rhythmic scheme of a C.M. tune as played by an organist who is determined that he will allow the public to take no liberties with the time:

And here it is under the hands of one who considers the spirit rather than the letter:

(The representation is only approximate. The actual effect is that of a slight pull-up and breath mark. A direction common in modern French music —cédez—meets the case.)

Judged as a scheme, can it be denied that the second is the more interesting? It is also curiously modern in feeling. Except for marching or dancing purposes the tendency nowadays is to get away from regular time. As an extreme example of a square-cut rendering, I may mention the performance by a large audience of Dykes's 'Melita,' under the baton of a famous conductor not long since. The last note of every line is of one beat, as you know. On this occasion the hymn was taken at a brisk pace, without a suspicion of rallentando or pause anywhere. We did our best to sing with heart and voice, but the latter organ made an indifferent show. We kept abreast of that iron baton, but only by ending each line with a semiquaver and a hiccup.

(To be continued.)

At West Ham Parish Church, on October 4, the service music consisted of the anthem 'In your day of gladness' and other compositions by Mr. G. B. Gilbert, who has completed his thirty-fifth year as organist of the church.

Julius Harrison's 'Harvest Cantata' was given at the Union Chapel, Islington, on October 11, under the direction of Mr. G. H. Betjemann, with Miss Nellie Rose-Innes and Mr. W. Forington as soloists.

Dr. Sinclair gave his hundredth recital at Hereford Cathedral on October 1. The proceeds of his recitals are devoted to War Funds, which he has benefited to the extent of £120.

Correspondence.

ENGLISH v. GERMAN FINGERING.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—It is easy to imagine the jubilation with which Mr. H. C. Tonking's suggestion to re-adopt English fingering in pianoforte music will be received by patriots all over the country. For nearly thirty years our treacherous teachers and editors of music have been doing their wicked utmost to establish a uniformity in fingering, quite regardless of the fact that the sequence of figures 1 2 3 4 5 represents a hideously Teutonic aspect of affairs!

Mr. Tonking tells us that publishers would be glad to print English fingering once more, but that is nothing to the radiant gladness that would illuminate the countenances of small music-dealers all over the country at the prospect of selling off their old stocks of 'Popular Classics' and early-Victorian copies of Beethoven, which have lain on their dusty shelves so long!

May I venture to call attention to another terrible evil in our midst? It is horrible to think that some dastardly teachers of Harmony are still allowing their pupils to write the chord of the German sixth, and may I suggest that some musician as distinguished as Mr. Tonking may come forward to protest against its use in the name of patriotism and National honour?—I am, Yours, etc.,

THOMAS DUNHILL.

October 9, 1914.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—The title of Mr. Tonking's letter is a misnomer: there is no such thing as 'German fingering.' There are two methods of indicating the fingering of pianoforte and organ music, one of which is adopted by the leading publishers of England and America and all the publishers of every other civilized nation, while the second method is adhered to by the less-important publishers of the two countries above-mentioned. Patriotism has absolutely nothing to do with the matter.

Thoroughly agreeing with Mr. Tonking as to 'the absurdity of having in England two notations for pianoforte fingering,' I would beg to refer him to an article on this subject in the Musical Times for February, 1890, from the pen of Dr. W. H. Cummings; an article which, so far as I know, has never been answered, and which appears to me to be unanswerable.—Yours faithfully,

ARTHUR T. FROGGATT.

MESSRS. BOSWORTH & CO.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—I am loth to ask for space on a personal matter, but such a mean, contemptible report is being spread about my firm that I am obliged to do so. It is said among other things, that 'Bosworth & Co. have closed up and gone back to Germany.' The inference, of course, is very obvious. I little thought when Sir Arthur Sullivan persuaded me to leave Chappell & Co., and go to Leipsic, in 1889 to publish his operas, that I should be subjected to a low attack of this kind from my own countrymen in 1914.

I am sole proprietor of Bosworth & Co. in the British Empire, and outside the Empire my only partners are my sons, who are as English as I am, and who are both in the British Army—one as an officer at the front, from Mons onwards, and the other a private in 'Kitchener's Army.'—Yours truly,

A. E. BOSWORTH.

London, October 14, 1914.

THE APPOINTMENT OF FOREIGN PROFESSORS AT ABERYSTWYTH.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—In connection with your remarks on the appointment of the five French musicians at the University College of Wales, Aberystwyth, your readers might naturally take the impression that as Professor of Music at the College I had a voice in the selection. I have already received letters from English musicians which implied that view. I wish to make it known that I had nothing whatever to do with the appointments; inasmuch as all the arrangements were made during my long illness last session, I was only consulted after the appointments were made.—Yours faithfully,

DAVID JENKINS.

Obituary.

By the death at Rochester, U.S.A., on September 13, of ROBERT HOPE JONES, the organ-building world loses one of its most prominent figures. Born at Hooton Grange, Cheshire, on February 9, 1859, he began his connection with the organ at the early age of nine, acting as a deputy-organist at Eastham Parish Church. In 1882 he was appointed chief electrician to the Lancashire and Cheshire Telephone Company, leaving after a few years to devote his attention to the 'diaphone,' an invention adopted by the Canadian Government for its fog signal stations. At Birkenhead, where he gave his services as organist and choirmaster at St. John's Church, he began the invention of those innovations in organ construction that were so soon to make his name the centre of heated discussion in the organ world. 'In spite of every form of opposition [says G. L. Miller in his book on 'The Recent Revolution in Organ-Building'] and of financial difficulties, he built organs that have influenced the art in all parts of the globe. He proved himself a prolific inventor, and can justly claim as his work nine-tenths of the improvements made in the organ during the last twenty years. Truly have these words been used concerning him—"the greatest mind engaged in the art of organ-building in this or in any other age." He left England for the United States in 1903, since when he had been associated with several of the most prominent organ-building firms in America. The best-known examples of his work in this country are at Worcester Cathedral, St. George's, Hanover Square, and St. Michael's, Chester Square.

We regret to record the death of Dr. D. F. WILSON, of Glasgow, on October 1. Dr. Wilson was a native of Kilmarnock, and while a youth became a pupil of the late Dr. A. L. Peace. He graduated Bachelor of Music at Oxford in 1886, and took his Doctorate in 1894. For many years he was organist of Ayr Parish Church and Town Hall, but he took up residence at Glasgow on his appointment as organist of Kelvinside Church. Soon after coming to Glasgow he was appointed Lecturer in Music at the Church of Scotland Training College, and continued as co-lecturer when the Provincial Committee took over the training of teachers. In this latter capacity the value of his work cannot be over-rated. Dr. Wilson, who was between fifty and sixty years of age, leaves a widow and family of three daughters and one son, for whom the greatest sympathy is felt.

It is with great regret that we record the death of WILLEM MENGELBERG, the great conductor, from concussion of the brain produced by a fall on the stairs. He was conductor of the Concertgebouw Orchestra at Amsterdam since 1895, and in recent years made frequent visits to England to conduct the Philharmonic and London Symphony Orchestras. His brilliant qualities, which drew unstinted praise from all who witnessed his work, were most notably illustrated in the music of Strauss, but they were far from being limited to one school. A portrait of Mengelberg and a sketch of his life by Mr. Alfred Kalisch were given in our issue for July, 1912. He was a Dutchman, born at Utrecht in 1871.

We regret also to have to record the following deaths:

GEORGE TOPHAM STRANGWAYS GILL, a director of Messrs. Novello & Co., Ltd., on September 26. He was born on August 18, 1846. He joined the firm in April, 1874, as manager of the printing department in Dean Street, Soho, and continued to serve in that capacity for a year or two after the removal of this department to the new premises in Hollen Street, Soho. In June, 1874, he married Annie E. Littleton, daughter of the late Henry Littleton, one of the chief founders of the firm.

T. W. PEARCE, organist of Bensey Road Wesleyan Church, Warrington; previously Hallé Scholar at the Royal College of Music, Manchester.

THE POSITION OF BRITISH MUSICIANS. MEETING AT QUEEN'S HALL.

On October 13 a meeting convened by a representative committee (formed at a previous meeting held at Paganini's Restaurant) was held in the small Queen's Hall to discuss ways and means of dealing with the position of musicians brought about by the War and the outlook generally for British executants. Sir Frederic Cowen took the Chair, and there was a large attendance of well-known musicians.

THE CHAIRMAN said they had met that day to propose a scheme for the furtherance of the position of the British musician in the immediate future. What they wanted to do was to get at the general feeling amongst the musical profession in all its branches, and then to form some scheme of action. They proposed to form a representative council and a committee to act on behalf of the whole or any part of the profession or trade upon points which may arise and which would need the action of a representative organization; such organization to issue protests and, if necessary, to take action to enforce the employment of British musicians who were available in the place of what were legally known as alien enemies; to encourage musical Societies to proceed as far as possible in their usual activities, and to offer amalgamation with any existing organization formed for similar objects. He had heard that there were already two organizations which had been formed for the purpose chiefly of providing funds to carry on musical work. It would be very much to the purpose if they could induce these organizations to amalgamate with the Association now proposed, and thus form one whole body. The Association designed to inaugurate a Central Bureau for the purpose of supplying information to employers, concert-givers, or traders, as to British musicians, British music, or British musical commodities, pianofortes and other instruments; and to form a combine immediately of orchestral players and of conductors for the purpose of enforcing a preference in every direction for native orchestral players as long as they were available and efficient. It was designed also to conduct a campaign throughout the country in the nature of a combined concert-lecture exhibition for the purpose of bringing before the public in a vigorous and attractive manner the possibilities and efficient actualities of British musicians, British music and commodities, as compared with German or Austrian, and to investigate, prove, and protest against any real instances which existed in the trade or profession of unfair and unjustified competition. Finally, in view of the fact that the musical profession of this country had no State recognition, it was necessary for the purpose of mutual protection to bring about some such conditions as prevailed in the United States, Canada, and Australia, by which means all foreigners would be obliged to pay a small percentage of the emoluments resulting from their professional activities in this country.

MR. HUBERT BATH said he had received a good many letters of regret, most of them, with the exception of perhaps two, in agreement with any well-balanced and well-organized scheme such as had been described that afternoon. Sir Hubert Parry in his letter remarked that there were 'very few Germans and Austrians left in orchestras and bands,' but he (Mr. Bath) had evidence that there were German and Austrian players still holding positions which should be undertaken and held by British players at this time. These players were enemies, really and technically.

MR. ERNEST PALMER said he was in full sympathy with the objects of the meeting. In 1903, when he founded the Patron's Fund, and had on that occasion the honour of receiving at the hands of the Worshipful Company of Musicians the Freedom of that Company, he referred to this very question of the status of the British musician. It struck him at the time, and had ever since, that it was monstrously unjust that the British musician, for one reason or other, had not fair opportunity or fair scope in this country. In every other walk in life a man or a woman was proud to be called an Englishman or Englishwoman, but when it came to music, somehow or other, in this country, unless one adopted a foreign name, recognition was difficult. He was not opposed to the best foreigner, man or woman, or the best foreign music, but he should very heartily welcome any scheme whereby British talent in this country could be put on a very much more satisfactory footing than it was at present. As to Hungarian Bands,—blue, and white, and all manner of colours,—and Viennese Orchestras, he had asked himself over and over again why were these orchestras here. It was simply that fashion had set that way [A voice: 'Royal patronage! Half of them may be disguised Englishmen.'] He believed that was so. He recollected an English musician telling him that he was in a Hungarian Band and had to put on a moustache. He hoped that the present opportunity would not be allowed to slip.

Sir EDWARD COOPER said he was whole-heartedly in sympathy with the object in view. He was old enough to remember when it was impossible for an Englishman to get a hearing at the Royal Italian Opera. Mr. Campbell, a Scotsman, had to be Signor Campanelli, and Mr. Bryan, an Irishman, was called Signor Ferrari. But things were improved nowadays, and English artists sang under their own names. As to Hungarian bands, he was once at a reception where there was a Hungarian band, and after they had played a certain piece, some of the ladies got very enthusiastic and said: 'Oh, how lovely. It reminds one of the woods and fields of the Austrian Empire!' The Hungarian Ambassador, who was standing by him, said: 'I don't think they are Hungarians; I will soon see.' So he walked up to them and spoke to them, first of all, in German. They looked very much astonished. He then spoke to them in that awful language, Magyar, and they seemed to be frightened. Then in English, he said, 'I am glad to say these ladies think you play beautifully.' The reply was, 'We are awfully glad to hear that!' They would never have had the engagement unless they had called themselves a 'Hungarian Band.' That was all wrong. He had not heard in the cities on the Continent any orchestras which were superior to the Philharmonic and the London Symphony; in fact, conductors at home and abroad said the same thing.

Sir HOMEWOOD CRAWFORD said that in forming the new organization they had to be careful that it should have a national character. With due respect to those connected with the music trade, he implored them not to make the association a trade organization. With regard to Hungarian and other bands, it had always struck him as extraordinary that it became absolutely necessary to don a particular uniform in order to satisfy some people that one was a good musician. This was monstrous and ridiculous. He was sorry to say that musical agents had pushed these orchestras. Time after time they had seen trade advertisements in which they found Herr this and Herr that, and his blue that, and his pink this and striped that—all, as a matter of fact, made up very largely of Englishmen. Quite recently he had occasion to investigate this matter rather closely. He found that some of the contracts which these performers had to sign contained a clause that they were to abstain from speaking the English language during a performance! He once attended a function at which the host prided himself on having gone, as he said, to the best agency and obtained the best 'Hungarian' Orchestra. It so happened that he (Sir Homewood) arrived a little too early and met the Orchestra going upstairs. He was surprised to hear at least five or six of them speaking in English, and some of it what he would call very very English. Afterwards not a word was uttered amongst them, until they got into the refreshment room. But we must not say we will have none but English. At this very moment there were with us splendid Belgian artists who had been driven out of their country because they had done their duty. Were we going to prohibit these? We should restrict our objection to alien enemies. He was sure that the Worshipful Company of Musicians would be glad to render any assistance in their power.

Mr. WILLIAMS, speaking as the general-secretary of the Amalgamated Musicians' Union, said that as far as his members were concerned, if this was a movement against all foreigners he believed it would be doomed to failure. [THE CHAIRMAN said it was not.] They would be against German, Austrian and Hungarian performers. But as to other aliens, he did not think that any movement would gain sympathy in this country which would be up against our comrades from Belgium and France. Some remarks had been made in regard to various Hungarian Bands. Those who represented the instrumental side had been saying for years and years past that it was absolutely scandalous that a British musician should have to disguise his nationality in order to earn his living in his own country. In connection with his own Society men had had various uniforms: some appeared as White Austrians one night, as Blue Hungarians the next; and next as raw Cockney as you could wish. When they found that a man named Billy Morgan could not get a living in his own country, but that if he assumed a foreign name he could get better terms than he could as an Englishman, that was a scandal. It was not the fault of the instrumentalist that he was obliged to disguise himself to get a living, he was simply playing down to a fashion, and unfortunately they had to say that high personages were partly responsible. America had been referred to. Was the profession on this side of the Atlantic prepared to go as far as American musicians went? Would they have the support of conductors in refusing to play the works of German composers? If they as instrumentalists refused to play alongside a German, or Austrian, or Hungarian, not particularly now while the fever was on, but in the future, were they going to be supported in that direction? He felt confident that as far as his Society was concerned they were prepared to take a definite stand. They were moving now in the direction of working so that all alien enemies should be expelled from the International Federation. They had taken action even against naturalised Germans, because there was a strong feeling that the leopard could not change its spots. They did not want a Society or a new movement inaugurated that was simply going to deal with this question while the war fever was on. The matter was one for the future of the British musician. In his view there was going to be very little work this winter, even for British musicians. The agent had been spoken of. With due deference to the agent his experience was that the agent was prepared to run anything as long as money could be made. Whether it was a British orchestra or a foreign orchestra it was immaterial to an agent so long as he could secure his commission. If the new Association intended to unite the agent working in conjunction with the instrumentalist, the conductor and composer, the trader and the music publisher, the problem was a bigger one than could be dealt with at an afternoon's meeting. He hoped that the profession would now seize the opportunity. It was an opportunity that they had never had before, and he prayed God that they might never again have to use such an event as a devastating war in order to bring the British musician into his own.

Mr. SYMONDS said it had been stated that this movement was not against those who were working as our Allies. He quite agreed that we should help our Allies, but were these to come in and take positions from native musicians? Sir Joseph Lyons at the present time was employing forty-seven musicians, and out of that forty-seven, twenty-six were foreign, nine being naturalised Austrians and Germans. [It was stated in the newspapers on October 20 that all 'alien enemies' had been discharged from Messrs. Lyons's establishments.—ED., M. T.] He had heard that there was a movement on foot to bring over French and Belgian bands to this country. Wherever they went they would be putting Englishmen out of employment. What difference would it make to an English player whether a Frenchman, a Belgian, or a Russian, displaced a German?

THE CHAIRMAN remarked they all felt acutely what had been urged, but their purpose that day was not to talk of what was happening or of what might happen, but to form a representative committee to devise means to ameliorate in every possible way the position of the British musician. Therefore he invited any gentlemen present who represented instrumentalists, agents, and the different branches of the trade to make themselves known. He appealed to Mr. Hambleton, asking if he was willing and prepared to bring the matter before his committee and endeavour to join them in this scheme?

Mr. HAMBLETON, of the London Symphony Orchestra, said that when he knew what was proposed he would be glad to bring the matter before his colleagues.

Mr. RAYMOND RÔZE said that in the Parliament of England everybody was represented except the Arts. He felt that their utmost endeavours ought to be directed to getting representatives according to the number of musicians, agents, orchestras, &c., into Parliament, and so secure the protection needed.

In response to requests from the Chair, Sir Homewood Crawford promised to bring the ideas of the meeting before Mr. Clifford Edgar, the Master of the Musicians' Company, and Mr. Palmer promised to sound the Council of the Royal College.

Mr. LANDON RONALD said that he supported heartily the proposed scheme. He would bring the matter under the notice of the Music Committee of the Guildhall School of Music, and he was sure they would give their support. Musicians must take the example of the entire country and band together, putting aside prejudice, and determine to improve the status of the British musician. Whilst war was on they should be patriots before being artists. They must absolutely forbid the enemy from earning a living in this country. There was ample time to consider what should occur after the war, for they would be able to have many more meetings before the war ended.

Mr. CORDER, of the Royal Academy of Music, said he was not clear whether there was any proposition that he could bring before the Royal Academy. It appeared to him that the music profession consisted of several separate entities. There was the bandsman, about whom they had heard a great deal; there were also the general performers, who were commonly called 'artists'; there were the agents; and last of all came the race that was most in need of help and protection, and which never got consideration, namely, the composers. But even in this category there were incongruous sections, for there were the commercial composer and the artist composer, and they had nothing whatever in common. It seemed to him that they were trying to bite off more than they could chew, unless they could divide the proposed committee into separate sections.

Mr. HUBERT BATH said that the general point was that this organization should be formed to deal with any matter which was ascertained to be detrimental to the cause of British interests in music.

Mr. WARWICK EVANS inquired whether Mr. Bath thought that the employment of Belgians was detrimental to the interests of British musicians at the present time? Art could not be mixed up with war. Sir Joseph Lyons had discharged Germans and put Belgians in their places. They had to look after their own people, who were the root of music in England and for whom nothing was done.

Mr. HUBERT BATH said that he feared that if a hostile attitude to their unfortunate Allies were adopted they would alienate every scrap of sympathy from the British public. It would be very unwise and impolitic at that moment to suggest any such action.

Mr. T. BATTY said that, like many other orchestral players, he felt that an indiscreet act had been committed when vacancies in one or two London orchestras had been filled by Belgian refugees. But the wrong had been done from generous motives, and not with any desire to overlook British musicians. The problem was a difficult one; the whole success and the prosperity of the labours of their committee would depend upon the influence they could have on British public opinion. If they were to say that no musician should live in England except a Britisher, if they brought oppression and aggression to bear on foreigners, British public opinion would revolt. He warned them that their main safeguard in dealing with this question would be in putting it on as broad lines as possible and in abstaining from anything of a personal nature. If a Belgian orchestra toured the country on behalf of that suffering people, and they opposed such a scheme, the whole trend of sympathy would be lost to the new Association. He hoped that the National Orchestral Association and the Amalgamated Musicians' Union would have committees to deal with this great question, and would come forward to help to form a settled opinion on the matter that would be of assistance to the gentlemen who were interesting themselves on the orchestral musicians' behalf.

Mr. JAMES GLOVER said that the discussion had been enlightening. The idea which obsessed them all that day was the furtherance of British music and the interests of the British musician. He commended the work done by the National Orchestral Association and the Amalgamated Musicians' Union. He said that recently he had been engaged to write, steal, beg or borrow music for the next Hippodrome revue. But he was not engaged because of his talent or cleverness, but because the German who had been engaged under a Belgian name had gone to the front to shoot at us. They must bring the conductors of the big orchestras into the national line. As to Belgian and French musicians, he trusted that no one would attempt to stem the tide of sympathy with our Allies in their trouble.

A speaker present promised to approach the Royal Philharmonic Society and Trinity College, London, with a view to enlisting their sympathy with the scheme.

Mr. W. W. COBBETT, representing the recently-formed Committee for Music in War-time, stated that their object was not entirely to raise funds or to alleviate distress amongst musicians. It was to encourage Societies and individuals to give concerts which otherwise might lapse. In this way they hoped to find engagements for competent artists who would otherwise be idle. There was no vestige of a charitable basis in the scheme. It was simply a wish to help artists and art.

Mr. AUSTIN, after suggesting that four representatives of the Orchestral Association should be on the committee, said he did not quite gather what was in the minds of the gentlemen who formed the preliminary committee. It appeared to him that they had to combat the prejudice that was in the minds of the British public against their own people. Recently a lady asked him to recommend a teacher for her daughter. On going through a list, he suggested the name of a teacher who was fairly well known. But the lady said: 'Don't you think it would be better if I had one of these with a foreign name? It sounds so much better.' That was the sort of thing they had to root out. He was tired and broken down with the labour connected with the circulars he had addressed to heads of Colleges in vain, and the miles of paper he had wasted. What was wanted—and what they never got—was the representative interest of the profession which gentlemen on that platform might exert.

Mr. ASHTON JONSON, representing the Independent Music Club, an organization started about three months ago, said that they realised the moment war broke out that there would be a very great distress, and they endeavoured to raise a fund to guarantee the expenses of concerts in country districts. They found that many authorities were glad to have the co-operation of the Independent Music Club in giving concerts to recruits and groups of young men who had nothing to do in the evenings.

The following resolution was then put from the Chair:

That this Meeting approves of the formation of a National Association for the protection of British interests in music, and supports the Council and Committee which will be formed to carry on the operations of the Association.

The resolution on being put to the meeting was carried unanimously.

MUSICIANS IN THE ARMY.

All information concerning professional musicians who have enlisted in the Army is naturally of interest to our readers, and we gladly print a list sent to us by Mr. H. V. Jervis-Read:

George Butterworth (composer), private, Duke of Cornwall's Light Infantry.

John Coates (singer), corporal, Hampstead Battalion of the London Division of the National Reserve.

A. J. Rowan Hamilton (composer), 2nd lieutenant, Irish Guards.

C. A. Harrison, (Athol Yates) (composer), corporal, Empire Battalion of the 7th Royal Fusiliers.

H. V. Jervis-Read (composer), private, Empire Battalion of the 7th Royal Fusiliers.

Frank Lambert (composer), private, National Reserve, Class II.

Edward Mason (conductor), private, 1st Public School Battalion of the Royal Fusiliers.

Douglas Sharpington (singer), private, 3rd County of London Yeomanry (Sharpshooters).

Geoffrey Toye (conductor), private, Duke of Cornwall's Light Infantry.

F. B. Wilson, private, Duke of Cornwall's Light Infantry.

Warren Wynne, 2nd lieutenant, 4th Highland Light Infantry (Special Reserve Battalion).

From the Daily Telegraph we learn that others who have joined His Majesty's forces are Mr. F. S. Kelly (pianist), Mr. Steuart Wilson (tenor), Mr. Francis Harford (bass), Messrs. Harold Bonarius, Thomas Peatfield, and Frank Thistleton (violinists), Mr. R. O. Morris, Mr. Geoffrey Gwyther, Mr. Coningsby Clarke, Mr. Wilfrid Page. Mr. Norman Wilks and Mr. Vivian Hamilton are at the front as interpreters. Mr. Reginald Herbert is Major Reginald Herbert Joseph, of the Royal Engineers.

MISS SCHLESINGER'S LECTURES.

Miss Kathleen Schlesinger has arranged a course of lectures at the British Museum on 'The place of Music in the evolution of man,' on Saturday afternoons at 3.30, admission being free. The scheme is as follows:

October 17. Peripatetic, visiting the Assyrian, Egyptian, and Ancient Greek collections. 'The Testimony of the Musical Instruments': Departure 3.25, Lecture Hall.

October 24. 'The Harmonic Basis of the Evolution of Music.' A new conception of music in antiquity.

October 31. 'The Music of the Bible, its significance and correlations.'

November 7. 'The Music of Ancient Greece,' I.

November 14. 'The Music of Ancient Greece,' II.

November 21. Peripatetic, 2.30.

Miss Schlesinger is a British subject by birth and parentage.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Scholarships have been awarded as follows: The Ada Lewis Scholarships to Desmond Roberts and Marjorie H. A. Perkins (singing), Kathleen Newton (pianoforte), Florence Richards (violin), and Orazio V. F. Fagotti (violoncello); the Campbell Clarke Scholarship (singing) to Ida Kiddier; the Dove Scholarship (violin) to Hilda May Cockram; the John Thomas (Welsh) Scholarship (any instrument) to Annie May Mulvey; the Maud Mary Gooch Scholarship (organ) to William R. Botting; the Henry Smart Scholarship (organ or composition) to Margaret M. G. Portch (for composition).

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

As a result of the competition recently held the following Scholarships and Exhibitions have been awarded for one year with possible renewal: Scholarships to Isobel F. M. Derry and Gertrude E. Harrison (singing); Celia L. Downie, Glyn John, Phyllis Novinsky, William Tookey, and Reginald Whitehouse (violin); Frank H. Belton and Donald I. Priestley (organ); Doris R. Drewery and Edric Greiffenhagen (pianoforte). Also a probationary scholarship for three months to Walter H. Whitaker (violin). Exhibitions to Mabel Apperly (violoncello), Fred Taylor (double-bass), Richard J. Cherry (bassoon), and Evelyn M. Moore (violin).

THE PROMENADE CONCERTS,

QUEEN'S HALL.

The interest of this series has never failed, and a peculiarly gratifying feature of its progress has been the prominence and excellence of British art, both creative and executive. Not only have novelties by native composers proved of high value, but in frequent cases works of older standing have been re-introduced with marked success. Among the artists who have distinguished themselves, those who deserve particular mention are M. Felix Salmond, for his performance of Dvorák's C major Violoncello concerto on September 23; Miss Una Truman, the South African pianist, who interpreted MacDowell's Concerto in D minor on September 30 with notable effect; and Mr. Albert Sammons, for an admirable performance of Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole' on September 29. Other notable features of the programme on September 30 were Elgar's Overture 'In the South' and Bantock's Prelude to 'Sappho.'

A welcome feature of the season has been the performance of some hitherto neglected works of César Franck. On September 24 his Symphonic Poem 'Psyche' was heard. The work is perhaps better described by the title 'Suite.' Its four movements contain much that even to-day sounds so subtle and modern that its early neglect is easy to understand. While the glowing phrases of the fourth movement—'Psyche and Eros'—made the most immediate impression, the whole work is one that we hope to have further opportunities of hearing.

Two British novelties that have added worthily to the record of the Orchestra may well be considered together, as they have features in common. On September 26, Mr. Oscar Borsdorf conducted the first performance of his Dramatic Fantasy 'Glaucus and Ione,' a musical illustration of the famous story told in Lytton's 'The last days of Pompeii'; and on October 13 the first performance of 'Perseus,' a tone-poem by Eugene Goossens on the story of Perseus, Andromeda, and the Medusa was given under the composer's direction. Both Mr. Borsdorf and Mr. Goossens are members of the Queen's Hall Orchestra. Their music is characteristic of the ambitions and achievements of our younger composers in its fervent seriousness and conspicuous orchestral mastery, and in its lack of real individuality. Neither of the composers has found musical ideas possessing significant dramatic truth or inevitable association with the event and moods of the 'programme'—qualities necessary to successful dramatic writing; but both succeeded in sustaining the variety and vitality of their music to the end. Mr. Goossens's work was undoubtedly wanting in thematic strength. But it was a remarkable display of resourcefulness in orchestral effect, which was no less interesting in that it suggested well-known Continental models. Both works were well worth the hearing, and gave assurance that when Mr. Borsdorf and Mr. Goossens achieve stronger inventive powers their ideas will be well expressed.

On October 3 the programme was brightened by the first performance of Mr. Balfour Gardiner's 'In May-time,' a vigorous and attractive expression of the associations of a spring day, especially such as are concerned with revelry. In common with all Mr. Balfour Gardiner's music it is inventive, and written with a firm hand. The quiet moments are charming.

Two pieces—Elegy and Scherzo—for violoncello and orchestra, by Mr. J. D. Davis, were the novelty for October 8. The Elegy proved to be a well-written and effective piece. The Scherzo began and ended well, and only failed to convince when early in its career it gave up being a Scherzo and became a meditation. The solo part was well played by Mr. Warwick Evans, and the works were much applauded. At the same concert Sir Alexander Mackenzie conducted a performance of the Overture to his Opera 'The Cricket on the Hearth,' and his Humoresque 'Under the Clock,' the cheerful strains of the former and the ingenious treatment of the 'Westminster Chimes' in the latter delighting the audience.

An orchestral Suite, 'Fairyland,' by Mr. Henry E. Geehl, was produced on October 10 and earned great favour. Its four contrasted movements, based on stories from Grimm, are cleverly conceived in the spirit of the title and constructed with some originality.

The most individual novelty of the season has been provided by Dr. Walford Davies, whose 'Conversations' for pianoforte and orchestra were played, with the composer as soloist, on October 14. The work is more of a miniature symphony than a concerto, and the suggestion of the title is admirably carried out by dialogue of all kinds between the pianoforte and instruments of the orchestra. Whether animated or subdued in tone the 'conversation' is always spontaneous and fruitful of idea. There is no assumption of philosophic depth, and the music is remarkable in achieving exactly what it sets out to perform. The idiom is Dr. Walford Davies's own, and in it are expressed some of his happiest ideas. The four movements of the work are entitled 'Genial company,' 'A passing moment,' 'Intimate friends,' and 'Playmates.' The second, a lively and clever Scherzo, was the most immediately successful, but all were well received.

Mr. Rutland Boughton's music to 'The birth of Arthur,' which, but for unforeseen circumstances, would have been heard at Glastonbury this summer in its proper setting, was exemplified at Queen's Hall on October 20 by the final Choral Dance under the title of 'Love and Night.' It could not be fully judged under such conditions, but it appealed as forceful, individual, and significant music.

Revivals that deserve mention are those of Dr. Vaughan Williams's Suite 'The Wasps' on October 3, Norman O'Neill's 'Blue Bird' music on October 6, and Sir Charles Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet,' with Mr. Plunket Greene (making his first appearance at the Promenade Concerts) as soloist, on October 17. Frank Bridge's 'Dance Rhapsody,' produced by the Musical League at Liverpool some years ago, was given its first London performance on October 15, under the composer's direction, and was well received.

The season came to an end, amid scenes of great enthusiasm, on October 24. It has inevitably been robbed of much of the interest that a long list of novelties promised to lend to the programme, but it remains an achievement of which Sir Henry Wood and the Orchestra can be proud, and for which the public may well be grateful.

London Concerts.

QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

A 'safe' programme was chosen for the first of the season's Symphony Concerts, given under Sir Henry Wood, on October 17. The Symphony was Beethoven's Fifth, and the Concerto that of Tchaikovsky in B flat minor, played, to the great satisfaction of a large audience, by the youthful Solomon. Brahms's 'Tragic' Overture and Sir Henry Wood's arrangement of a Suite in G for strings from the organ Sonatas of Bach completed the programme.

THE CLASSICAL CONCERT SOCIETY.

On October 14 this enthusiastic and hard working organization opened its season at Bechstein Hall with a programme of familiar music. Brahms's Pianoforte trio in B major was played by Mr. Carl Derenburg, Mr. John Saunders (in the absence of M. Jacques Thibaud), and Miss May Mukle. The other works heard were Schumann's D minor Violin sonata, Valentini's Sonata in E for violoncello, and three Pianoforte sonatas by Scarlatti.

The Society has announced a season of ten concerts, terminating on December 16.

SOUTH PLACE SUNDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

The twenty-ninth season of these excellent chamber concerts opened on October 4. The programmes are, as before, of the highest class, and artists of the first rank are engaged for their performance. The concerts take place every Sunday at seven, and admission is free, a small charge being made for reserved seats. The South Place Orchestra, conducted by Mr. R. W. Walthew, meets for practice weekly, and will take part in a South Place Sunday Concert in March.

The ballad concert season opened on October 3, when the first of Messrs. Chappell's series took place at Queen's Hall, and Messrs. Boosey gave the first of their London Ballad Concerts at the Albert Hall.

The first of the season's Popular Saturday Evening Concerts took place at the Wesleyan Central Hall on October 3, before an immense audience. The Band of the Grenadier Guards, under Lieut. Dr. Williams, lent the chief interest to an excellent programme.

The first Sunday afternoon concert at the Albert Hall took place on October 4, when the New Symphony Orchestra played a familiar selection under the direction of Mr. Landon Ronald. Miss Katharine Goodson and Madame Kirkby Lunn were the soloists. On the same afternoon, the Sunday Concert Society opened its season at Queen's Hall with an orchestral concert under the direction of Sir Henry Wood, the proceeds of which were given to the Prince of Wales's Fund and the Belgian Relief Fund. The Sunday evening Ballad Concerts at Queen's Hall opened on October 10.

A Russian Concert, in aid of the British Red Cross Society, was given at Queen's Hall on October 7 by Prince Tschagadaev, with the London Balalaika Orchestra as the chief attraction. Solos were given by Madame Kirkby Lunn, Mr. John McCormack, Mr. Boris Bornov, and others. Queen Alexandra and the Grand Duke Michael were present in the audience.

A strong personal interest helped to bring great success to the concert given by Madame Clara Butt and Mr. Kennerley Rumford at the Albert Hall on October 10, for apart from the magnetic attraction of the concert-givers themselves, the presence of Sir Frederick Bridge, Sir Frederic Cowen, Sir Edward Elgar, Mr. Landon Ronald, Sir Charles Stanford, and Sir Henry Wood as conductors of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, helped to draw together and interest a huge audience. The Royal Choral Society also helped. It was fitting that the programme was almost entirely in a patriotic vein, for the whole of the proceeds were assigned to H. M. The Queen's Work for Women Fund. The concert was given by Madame Butt and Mr. Rumford as a preliminary to a tour of Great Britain, undertaken for the benefit of the various National War Funds.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BIRMINGHAM.

Partly owing to the fact that the Town Hall was in the hands of the War Office, and probably also on account of the fear expressed in almost every quarter that the public would probably abstain from concert-going, many of the season's concerts were cancelled, but now that our noble Town Hall is again available things may change for the better. Of course we had already had a number of patriotic concerts in aid of the Prince of Wales's Fund, and considerable sums were realised; but in each instance the artists had volunteered their services, and the poor musical profession found plenty of occupation without remuneration. The first Harrison Concert of the season was given in the large Lecture Theatre of the Midland Institute, on Monday afternoon, October 12; and so will be the second of the series on November 23. The artists who appeared were Miss Florence Macbeth, the American coloratura soprano, Madame Ada Crossley, and Mr. Robert Radford (vocalists), Miss Isolde Menges, the talented young violinist, a pupil of Leopold Auer, of Petrograd, and Monsieur de Greef, the accomplished Belgian pianist, Mr. R. J. Forbes acting as accompanist. The programme submitted naturally included patriotic songs and popular items which were greatly appreciated by the audience.

In place of the Quinlan opera season the Theatre Royal management arranged for a fortnight's popular patriotic Promenade Concerts, from October 12 to October 24, at prices to suit the masses. The orchestra was that of the Theatre Royal, augmented to forty performers, ably conducted by Mr. Harry Rushworth. The programmes were principally composed of light and popular as well as patriotic items and operatic selections from the works of Sullivan and Edward German, the classical school as well as the romantic being entirely excluded. A vocalist or an instrumentalist appeared each evening, all the artists hailing from the Midlands. The experiment proved quite successful, and at least provided some employment for local orchestral players, who have been so hard hit this season. The Birmingham Festival Choral Society have not yet made it known whether they will give their projected series of Choral Concerts, nor have the various local amateur choral bodies notified the public of their resumption of the customary season's concerts.

BOURNEMOUTH.

A highly attractive prospectus of the autumn season arrangements has been issued by the Winter Gardens Committee, and little difficulty seems to have been encountered in planning a comprehensive and very attractive series of events. First and foremost, the Symphony Concerts and Monday 'Pops' are bound to rejoice the hearts of those who support the best type of music. No stupid boycott of the music written by the great German masters of former days has been instituted, although it is understood that no living Teuton or Austrian will find representation.

The inaugural Symphony Concert was given on October 8, the programme including Mackenzie's lively 'Britannia' Overture, Parry's 'English' Symphony, a work of solid worth, and Delius's charming Two Pieces for small orchestra (first performance at these concerts). Mr. York Bowen's performance of Beethoven's Pianoforte concerto in E flat was a model of soundness and steadiness, and in the orchestral items Mr. Godfrey and his instrumentalists repeated their successes of former years. The first Monday 'Pop,' on October 12, was devoted to British music by living composers, the following being the decidedly interesting selection made: Two military marches, 'Pomp and Circumstance' (Elgar); Overture to a comedy (Balfour Gardiner); 'Mock Morris' and 'Shepherd's Hey' (Percy Grainger); 'In fairyland' suite (Cowen); Overture, 'The land of the mountain and the flood' (MacCunn); Irish Rhapsody (No. 1) by Stanford.

Pavlova filled the bill—and also, be it said, the Winter Gardens—on October 5 and 6, her wonderful powers of dancing being exemplified in an extremely varied series of dances. A recital by Miss Marie Hall, at which the concert-giver was heard to the usual advantage, has been the only other event of importance up to date.

Mr. Philip Cathie, examiner and professor of the violin at the Royal Academy of Music, and Mr. S. H. Braithwaite, professor of theory at that institution, have recently been appointed to the staff of the Bournemouth School of Music.

BRISTOL.

In consequence of the war, several musical Societies of the city have made changes in their arrangements for the season. The Bristol Musical Society, under Mr. C. W. Stear, have begun to rehearse Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan.' The rehearsals of Elgar's 'The Banner of St. George,' the 'Hymn of Praise,' and Turner's 'Gethsemane to Golgotha,' by the Clifton Choral Society, are proceeding under the direction of Mr. A. E. Hill. At a committee meeting of the Bristol Symphony Orchestra, a hope was expressed that the Society might give the usual three concerts in the early part of 1915. There was a large attendance at the first meeting for the season of the Bristol Royal Orpheus Glee Society, Mr. George Riseley conducting. The Bristol New Philharmonic Society, of which Mr. Arnold Barter is conductor, are rehearsing Parry's 'Blest pair of Sirens,' Elgar's 'Twenty-ninth Psalm,' and B. J. Dale's 'Before the paling of the stars.' The Clifton Quintet, having invited the subscribers to express their opinion as to resuming the concerts, have received an overwhelming response in favour of proceeding, so that the concerts will be held as usual. Fortnightly organ recitals on Mondays are being given by Mr. Hubert Hunt at Bristol Cathedral, and there are vocal selections by the choir and special soloists. Mr. Hunt has postponed his first two chamber concerts until after Christmas.

The twenty-fifth annual report of the Bristol Choral Society has been published, and states that in consequence of the war the committee have decided to give only two subscription concerts this season, and a series of popular concerts, at approximately monthly intervals, on thoroughly popular lines, with prices well within the reach of everybody. The net profits on the whole of the season's concerts will be handed to the Lord Mayor for the relief of distress caused by the war. Mr. George Riseley will as usual direct the performances.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

To make the best of things is the guiding plan of musical Societies in this district, and the endeavours made to carry on as usual are laudable in face of the many difficulties. But in a town like Plymouth there is, however, an object for which to work, for 30,000 troops are quartered in the district, and in the recreation which it is found necessary to provide for them music forms the chief quantity. Music, that is, of the kind that 'Tommy' and 'Jack' love, which is rather different from that which engages the attention of orchestral and choral Societies in their usual occupation; but perhaps apart from the satisfaction of giving pleasure to their audience, the performers will not lose a great deal from the change, and may at least gain in sense of rhythm. Local musicians and Societies are giving liberally to these nightly entertainments in barracks, forts, and public halls, and a businesslike dated programme ensures their continuance for several months to come. Members of the troops often contribute solos, and many interesting stories might be told in association with the singers and players thus discovered. Concerts for relief funds have been numerous, and the propaganda of the Guildhall Choir and of the Plymouth Orpheus Male Choir include efforts in this direction. The Madrigal Society (Dr. Harold Lake) have had their annual meeting, and have started the session auspiciously.

The South-Western section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians made the occasion of their annual general meeting at Plymouth on October 10 an opportunity for performance of native music, and a programme limited of necessity to an hour was given to an invited audience. The hon. secretary, Mr. R. B. Moore (Exeter), was represented by 'Deux Polonaises' for pianoforte duet (played by Miss Eva Turner and Dr. Emilie Guard); Mr. D. Parkes played with Mr. Warwick Beare the slow movement 'Romanza,' from a Concerto of his for pianoforte and violin; Mr. Walter Weekes (pianoforte) and Mr. Leighton Fouracre (viola) played an Idyll composed by the former. Songs by Dr. Weekes, Mr. J. E. Campbell, and Miss Robinson, a vocal quartet by Dr. Emilie Guard, and a scena, 'A vision,' for baritone solo and chorus by Mr. A. C. Faull, were the vocal pieces.

On October 18 a largely augmented choir in Greenbank United Methodist Church gave Weber's 'Jubilee Cantata' and Schubert's 'Song of Miriam.' Mr. R. Lang conducted the choir of which he was master and the orchestra which was led by Mr. J. W. Wingate. The singing was spirited and expressive.

Ottery St. Mary Choral Society (Mr. S. Chipperfield) are rehearsing 'The last Judgment' for performance in church; and Mr. Raymond Wilmot's Choral Society at Exmouth, though announcing a deficit in the accounts, have decided to give a patriotic concert in December, and to perform 'Elijah' in the spring.

The musical management of the Torquay Pavilion are making every effort to maintain the usual order of things under Mr. Basil Cameron, who, as noted in our last issue, has adopted his maternal family name in preference to the German-sounding professional title by which he has been hitherto known. The programmes are varied according to precedent with the frequent introduction of the patriotic element, and the classical concerts are much appreciated. Mr. Austin Wilshire, the popular manager, had gratifying support at his benefit concerts on September 29, at which he had the assistance of excellent artists.

Miss Scriven (organ) and Mr. Ernest Newland-Smith (violin) gave a recital at Lynton on September 28.

EDINBURGH.

A series of organ recitals in the Usher Hall has been arranged by Mr. J. C. Lumsden, and the first of these, on October 3, by Mr. A. Hollins, drew a very large audience. Dr. Ross, on October 10, and Mr. Edwin Lemare, on October 17, were equally successful in maintaining the enthusiasm of the first night. Other eminent recitalists are engaged. These recitals evidently supply a musical need. The Royal Choral Union has resumed its work under the conductorship of Mr. Inches, who has returned from Germany after a very varied experience in operatic conducting on the Continent. The conductorship was rendered vacant by the detention of Herr Feuerberg, last year's nominee, under the Aliens Act. The programme for the season includes Gluck's 'Orpheus' and Elgar's 'The Music Makers.' Other Societies have in the meantime abandoned rehearsals. Many charity concerts have been organized, notably one by Robert Burnett, the eminent baritone. Paterson & Son's Subscription Orchestral Concerts are announced, but it remains to be seen what response these will meet with at the present time. On October 17 the first of the Harrison Concerts was given in the Usher Hall. M. Arthur de Greef had a great reception, although the audience was not so large as usual. Madame Ada Crossley, Miss Florence Macbeth, Miss Isolde Menges, and Mr. Robert Radford were the other artists.

GLASGOW.

At the tenth annual meeting of the Scottish Singing Masters' Association Mr. John Tannahill read a paper entitled 'Can the singing lesson be made more attractive.'

There was at first some doubt as to whether the Choral and Orchestral Union would proceed with their scheme of concerts this season, but it was afterwards felt that any break in the continuity of the Union's work would be detrimental to success in the future. Consequently, after an appeal to the subscribers and guarantors, it has been decided to carry out the usual scheme, which embraces fourteen classical concerts and a like number of Saturday Popular Orchestral Concerts. The choral works selected are 'Messiah,' 'Elijah,' 'The dream of Gerontius,' and, for a first performance in Great Britain, Novovjejski's Oratorio 'Quo Vadis.' M. Emil Mlynarski will again act as conductor-in-chief, and the choral concerts will be under the direction of M. Henri Verbruggen. The personnel of the Scottish Orchestra will show some change, as the recently-appointed leader as well as several other foreign members are at the present time ineligible.

The Harrison Concerts will take place as usual, and the City Hall Saturday Evening Concerts have already been resumed successfully. The Y.M.C.A. Choir (Mr. R. L. Reid, conductor), which is chiefly educational, takes up 'Elijah' and 'Messiah.' The Bach Choir under Mr. J. M. Diack will give four concerts, the programmes selected being the 'Christmas Oratorio,' the 'St. John' Passion, some chamber music, and the secular cantata 'Phoebus and Pan.' The operations of most of the smaller choirs and organizations are meanwhile in abeyance, but active work will probably be resumed later on. Mr. Herbert Walton has just concluded a highly successful series of organ recitals at the Cathedral.

LIVERPOOL.

The first concert of the Philharmonic Society, on October 6, drew together a very large and representative audience, and the programme sounded a stirring note of patriotism by commencing with the four National Anthems of the Allies. Elgar's 'Pomp and Circumstance' March No. 2 in D (dedicated to the Liverpool Orchestral Society) also appropriately found a place; and no less English in its quaint rusticity was Balfour Gardiner's 'Shepherd Fennel's Dance.' Mr. Landon Ronald conducted a fine performance of Rachmaninov's second Symphony in E flat, which renewed favourable impressions of an important work previously heard here under the direction of the composer. Songs were sung by Miss Florence Macbeth, who used her fresh and flexible soprano voice with manifest art.

The first meeting of the Rodewald Concert Club was held on October 12, when the Rawdon Briggs String Quartet, assisted by Mr. S. Speelman, played Mozart's Quintet in D, No. 7, Brahms's Quintet in F, Op. 88, and two movements of Debussy's Quartet in G, Op. 10. The Brodsky Quartet had been engaged for this evening, but the programme had to be remodelled owing to the absence of Dr. Brodsky and Mr. Carl Fuchs, who are out of England, and unable to return at present.

The usefulness of the Church Choir Association in various directions is shown by the provision of a large number of boys selected from Association Choirs who will assist the Philharmonic Choir in the Society's Christmas performance of 'The Children's Crusade,' by M. Gabriel Pierné.

The old-established Societa Armonica announces two concerts to be conducted by Mr. Vasco Akeroyd, and two other excellent bodies—the Liscard Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. P. R. Smart, and the Oxtan and Claughton Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. James E. Matthews—are able to outline their usual winter concerts. A newcomer to the ranks of local orchestral conductors, Mr. Frederick Hanley, also announces two subscription concerts in the Bootle Town Hall, and two concerts by the Wallasey Orchestral Society in the Assembly Rooms, New Brighton. There is also welcome activity among the smaller choral Societies, and despite this unexampled time of national disquiet, there are sufficient numbers of tenors and basses left to carry on the work of the excellent Cymric Vocal Union of male voices, the Wallasey Gentlemen's Glee Club, and the Hoylake and West Kirby Male-Voice Choir.

Mr. Percy Harrison has also been able to arrange his usual series of four concerts. The first of these took place on October 15, when a strong company included Miss Florence Macbeth, Madame Ada Crossley, Mr. Robert Radford, the gifted violinist Miss Isolde Menges, also M. Arthur de Greef, the Belgian pianist, who received a significant welcome. As usual Mr. R. J. Forbes was an excellent accompanist. The audience in number was very far from what is customary at these concerts, for it was regrettably small.

The Organists' and Choirmasters' Association opened their winter session with a social evening held at the 'Bear's Paw' on October 5, when Mr. Albert Orton's pianoforte solos were outstanding features among the musical items. The syllabus contains a projected plain-song service on December 7, and lectures by Mr. Frank Dibb and Dr. James Lyon.

A course of free lectures given under the auspices of the Liverpool Corporation at the Parish Hall, Dundonald Road, Aigburth, was opened on October 7 by Mr. W. A. Roberts, whose subject was 'Handel's Operas and incidental music.'

The Southport Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. W. Rimmer, announces three subscription concerts, opening on November 27. The season's programme includes Symphonies by Tchaikovsky (No. 5), Svendsen (in B flat), and Raff (the 'Leonore').

We are asked to state that Mr. Ehremayer, the inventor of the well-known system of pianoforte sight-playing, which is advertised in our columns, is of French birth and is domiciled in England.

Mr. J. H. Larway has sent 100 guineas to the Prince of Wales's Fund as a first instalment of the proceeds from the sale of the new patriotic song 'The Motherland's a-calling.'

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

The formal opening of our musical season took place on Saturday, October 3. When Henri Verbrugghen, fresh from lecturing on the war for the Belgian Relief Fund, stepped on to the Free Trade Hall platform to conduct the first 'Prom.' of the Manchester Orchestra, Limited, instantaneous and unusually prolonged applause greeted him—a mingled recognition of pity for, and pride in, his compatriots.

The Hallé Concerts up to Christmas will be conducted as follows: October 15, Sir Edward Elgar; October 22 and December 3, Mr. Thomas Beecham; October 29, Mr. Landon Ronald; November 5, 26, and December 17 (all choral), Mr. R. H. Wilson (chorus-master); November 12, M. Henri Verbrugghen; November 19, M. Safonov; December 10, Sir Frederic Cowen.

The opening Hallé concert under Elgar served to dispel somewhat gloomy anticipations. True, the subscription list has suffered by numerous defections, chiefly in the higher-priced seats, but if support does not fall below the level of the first concert there may be reason for satisfaction. Elgar indulged in more fanciful abandon in his 'Enigma' Variations than most conductors would care to risk; an irresistible appeal to all ears was the result. In the Tchaikovsky fourth Symphony there was none of the inexorability of fate which some find in it—it was a Tchaikovsky smiling and winsome which emerged under Elgar's sympathetic handling; later this year Mr. Hamilton Harty is to play the same work. Not the least interesting feature of this season will be the play of the young modern spirit upon those works which many of us have received at the hands of some of the mighty conductors of the world, and the experience promises to be enjoyable and instructive. Mr. Arthur Catterall made his first appearance as the new leader of the Hallé band (now somewhat smaller than in recent years), and appeared too as soloist in three movements from Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole.'

The new orchestral music arranged to be heard at Manchester this winter includes Bantock's 'Fifine at the Fair,' October 22; Rachmaninov's No. 2 Symphony, October 29; Vincent d'Indy's 'Istar' Variations, November 12; Balakirev's 'Tamar,' December 3—all at Hallé's. At the Brand Lane Orchestral will be heard Moszkowski's 'Krakoviak,' November 7; Schönberg's 'Five characteristic Pieces'; Balfour Gardiner's 'In Maytime'; Percy Grainger's 'Colonial Song,' all on January 9; and Stravinsky's 'Fireworks,' February 6. New work will not bulk so prominently at the Manchester Orchestra 'Proms,' but Hamilton Harty's 'Comedy' Overture, November 14; Coleridge-Taylor's 'Bamboula,' December 12; and Bantock's 'Scottish Highland' String suite, along with the 'Greek Tragedy' Overture, February 27, constitute a real addition to our knowledge of current musical literature.

The opening concert of the eighty-first winter session of the Gentlemen's Glee Club (founded 1830, but in abeyance during 1833-36) was held at the Albion Hotel on October 6. It is of interest to learn that 'Strike the lyre' and 'When hands meet' were composed for this Club and sung for the first time at one of its early gatherings. The present secretary and treasurer, Alderman T. H. Jenkins, has been a member for fifty years, and has held office for forty-seven years.

In the hinterland of Ancoats region of mill, warehouse, and foundry, there are to be given a dozen concerts for 5s. 6d., which, quality considered, surely cannot be equalled anywhere. Last autumn the seats were sold in advance, and no single admissions could be taken. These concerts of 'Musical appreciation,' as they are styled, opened on October 7, when Messrs. R. J. Forbes and Anderson Tyrer gave an evening of pianoforte music for four hands, an experience never met with in Manchester before, I think.

The Harrison Concerts have necessarily undergone drastic revision. Kreisler, Gerhardt, and Nikisch all fall out, being replaced by Elgar, and others of less renown, the whole series revealing a perhaps inevitable drift to the style of ballad concert prevalent a decade ago. At the first, on October 14, Miss Lucy Nuttall (a local contralto who first emerged at a Blackpool Festival some years ago) replaced Madame Ada Crossley, who was reported as invalided at Sheffield. The Louvain pianist, M. Arthur de Greef, has not been here for nearly twenty years, and revealed musicianly qualities of a sound order.

The Manchester Musical Society opened its season on October 16. The Cathedral organist, Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson, urged sympathy with the newly formed National Committee for Music in War-time in its object of keeping music going wherever possible, and especially to further the cause of British music. A proposal has also been put forward by Mr. Nicholson for a concert of British music given by British musicians, with a programme chiefly of a patriotic and national character, the proceeds being devoted to the Prince of Wales's Fund. A special choir, he suggests, might be brought together, forming afterwards the nucleus of a permanent body for working in the interests of British music.

The second Manchester Orchestra, Limited, 'Prom.' on October 17 was chiefly notable for Wagnerian playing, which in sonority and glow of colour far exceeded anything yet achieved by this band. Mr. Frank Mullings is quickly establishing a reputation as England's most heroic tenor—the subtlety of his numerous and felicitous touches in verbal emphasis, allied to unusual virility, contribute to this distinction.

On October 19, at the University, Principal W. H. Hadow lectured on 'English music of the Tudor period'; choral selections, under Dr. Keighley, by Stockport Vocal Union, illustrated the lecture.

NEWCASTLE AND DISTRICT.

The Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Union has decided for this season to cancel the announced subscription concert and suspend the subscription list. Four popular concerts will be given instead on November 25, December 23, February 10, and March 24. The first will consist of patriotic music, with Madame Gleeson-White and Mr. Robert Burnett as soloists; at the second, 'Messiah' will be given, with Miss Marie Houghton, Miss Cecilia Kemp, Mr. Henry Brearley, and Mr. Robert Radford; at the third, 'Elijah,' with Miss Katherine Vincent, Miss Maud Wright, Mr. Walter Glynne, and Mr. Robert Charlesworth. The programme of the fourth concert is to be announced later. Both the old Chamber Music Society and the Classical Concerts Society have suspended operations for the present.

The Darlington Choral and Orchestral Society is continuing as usual. Two concerts will be given in the Court Kinema on December 8, with a programme of patriotic music, and on February 9, when 'Elijah' will be given. The Darlington Chamber Music Society announced the usual five concerts on October 27, November 27, February 11, March 11, and April 1, the first of the series to be given by the Henkel Pianoforte Quartet. The programme will consist of Brahms's Quartet in A major, Op. 26, Mozart's in G minor, and that of Strauss in C minor, Op. 13.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

Many interesting works have been performed at the Harvest Festivals. On September 20 the Albert Hall Choir gave Wesley's 'Wilderness.' Spohr's 'God, Thou art great,' and John Cullen's 'The awakening' (written for the fiftieth year of the Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society) were given by the choir at Halifax Place Chapel, Nottingham, on September 20, under the direction of Mr. E. M. Barber. The soloists were Miss Emmie Warner, Madame Ethel Parkin, Mr. J. Franklin Pearson, and Mr. Joseph Asher, Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson being the organist. On September 27, the second part of 'Elijah' formed the programme at Wesley Chapel, Broad Street; and on October 11, at St. Andrew's Church, Bernard Johnson's setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, together with Elgar's anthem, 'Fear not.'

Halifax Place are giving Sullivan's 'Prodigal Son' on November 15. On November 29, at the Albert Hall Choir Festival, Mr. Allen Gill will conduct a performance of Brahms's 'Requiem.' The Sacred Harmonic Society have decided to give 'Elijah' on November 5 for the War Relief Fund, with Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Margaret Balfour, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Frederick Austin as soloists. The usual Christmas performance of 'Messiah' is to be given.

Miss Cantelo's Subscription Concerts, which provide the city with the very best of chamber music, are to proceed. The first is on November 19, when the London String Quartet (British artists) is engaged; the second will take the form of a pianoforte and vocal recital on December 4, and the last, on February 10, will be given by the Brussels String Quartet. It is to be hoped that these concerts will receive the support they deserve under such trying circumstances.

From Leicester we hear of a series of organ recitals on Sundays at the De Montfort Hall, from September 20 to January 10, by visiting organists, including, among others, Messrs. H. T. Balfour, Meale, Dr. Barrow, Edwin Lemare, C. W. Perkins, Goss Custard, and Herbert Ellingford.

'Elijah (Part 2) was given at Wesley Chapel, Broad Street, on September 27, under the conductorship of Mr. C. B. Morris. Miss Beatrice Johnson, Miss Mary Roebuck, Mr. J. Franklin Pearson, and Mr. Charles Heywood were the soloists, and Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson was organist.

YORKSHIRE.

Of music in Yorkshire there is still little to chronicle. The chief event has been the first of the Bradford Subscription Concerts, on October 9, when Mr. Thomas Beecham conducted the Hallé Orchestra, and made a distinct impression by his fiery and brilliant readings of such things as the 'Thamar' of Balakirev, and Berlioz's 'Carneval Romain' Overture. He also gave a fine performance of César Franck's Symphony, which at last seems to be entering upon a period of comparative popularity. Very enjoyable, too, was a Handel Concerto in E minor, a remarkably fresh and vigorous work. Mr. John Coates was the vocalist, and we had two examples of the art of another native of Bradford in Mr. Delius's recent pieces for small orchestra, 'The first cuckoo' and 'Summer night on the river.'

On October 3 the Leeds Choral Union gave a concert on behalf of the War Relief Fund which, if not of great artistic significance, served its purpose as a patriotic effort. Extracts from Handel's martial oratorios, 'Judas Maccabæus' and 'Israel in Egypt,' with various National Anthems, were sung with great verve under Dr. Coward's direction, and Mr. H. Brearley and Mr. William Hayle, both of the Leeds Parish Church Choir, were excellent vocalists. The Leeds Saturday Orchestral Concerts opened a season of six concerts on October 17, when Mr. Fricker and the Leeds Symphony Orchestra offered an attractive programme of well-tried orchestral music, including Beethoven's Violin concerto, of the solo part in which Mr. Rawdon Briggs gave an artistic interpretation. There was a very large audience, whose enthusiasm indicated that there is a place for such concerts, even in these times.

The Harrogate Symphony Concerts came to an end on October 14, when the programme consisted entirely of music by British composers—Sullivan, Coleridge-Taylor, Delius, George Boyle's accomplished and very interesting Pianoforte concerto (with Mr. Arthur Shattuck as soloist), and an Orchestral Ballad by the conductor, Mr. Julian Clifford. Mr. Clifford gave his benefit concert on October 9, being assisted by Sapellnikov, with whom he played Saint-Saëns's brilliant Variations for two pianofortes. He also introduced to Yorkshire an American cinematograph version of 'Tannhäuser,' for which Mr. Ernest Farrar and he had arranged a musical accompaniment in the shape of a cleverly contrived mosaic of themes and passages taken from the opera. Though still leaving something to be desired as a musical commentary on the action, it served to indicate a direction in which much remains to be done.

Mr. George Carr, of Southsea, informs us that he has ceased his connection with Messrs. Rudolph Ibach Sohn. He has accepted the managing-directorship of H. Austin Storry, Ltd.

The report that Kreisler has been wounded while serving with the Austrian Army seems well substantiated. It is understood that his violin playing will not be affected.

We regret to have to hold over Reviews and Answers to Correspondents.

YOU CAN MASTER TECHNIQUE WITHOUT CONSTANT "PRACTICE."

Why do you waste 4 or 5 hours a day "practising" when you could achieve the result you desire with scientific certainty in a far shorter period, and without waste of valuable time and energy, by my "From Brain to Keyboard" System? The success of 6,000 pupils has proved beyond doubt that

"From Brain to Keyboard"

MACDONALD SMITH'S SYSTEM
OF PIANOFORTE TOUCH AND TECHNIQUE

GIVES PERMANENT MASTERY OVER ALL DIFFICULTIES OF TECHNIQUE.

Pianist's Cramp; Stiffness; Wooden Touch; Lack of Power and Independence; Thumping, Nervousness, Inability to read at sight, to play arpeggios, trills and long skips; Faulty Inflection and Accentuation; are all overcome with amazing rapidity by the eight minutes twice daily application of this System. In fact, there is not a single technical requirement of the pianist or organist, from beginner to the most advanced, which is not successfully met by this System. And the results are permanent and not materially affected by neglect of the instrument. By adopting this system the necessity for perpetual keyboard "practice" is totally abolished—a point of the highest value to the busy hard-working pianist.

Write for my FREE BOOK to-day

I shall be pleased to send you post-free "Light on Pianoforte Playing" which explains my System and its principles. If you will detail any special difficulties you have, I will explain how they can be permanently overcome by the "From Brain to Keyboard" System. My System has been used and cordially endorsed by Sir Frederick Bridge and other leading musicians, and it is therefore well worth your while at least to study carefully the possibilities it holds for you. It is taught by post, does not interfere with your present arrangements, and is indisputably the cheapest, quickest, and most certain way to the permanent mastery of technique. Write to-day to

M. MACDONALD SMITH,
19, BLOOMSBURY SQUARE, LONDON, W.C.

PIANISTS' EYES

Require to be trained, as well as their fingers, if they wish to secure that unalloyed pleasure which the ability to readily can alone give. Mere knowledge of the relations between notes and keyboard will not do this. The act of sight-playing consists in muscular actions, which must become automatically associated with the symbols which represent them if the best results are to be secured. It is the object of the Ehremayer System of Pianoforte Sight-Playing to achieve this in a surprisingly short time, thanks to the application of certain fundamental, but hitherto neglected, scientific laws. My Booklet sent post free on application explains how.

PLAY AT SIGHT

"P. F." reports: "It is becoming harder to play wrong notes, as I feel as though I hit the spots on the paper as I see them, and forget that the pianoforte keys are there at all."

The inventor of this System is a Frenchman domiciled in England.

ALFRED HENRY LITTLETON.

BORN FEBRUARY 15, 1845.

DIED NOVEMBER 8, 1914.

Go to the dreamless bed
Where grief reposes;
Thy book of toil is read,
The long day closes.

It is with much sorrow that we record the death of Mr. Alfred H. Littleton, the Chairman of Messrs. Novello and Company. After a long illness he passed away peacefully at his Brighton residence on November 8. To those who were intimately associated with him in the conduct of a great business the event affords food for many reflections, some of which inevitably are sad in that they arise from the pang of parting with a deeply, and it may be said, affectionately respected chief, and others which are cheerful and inspiring, because they come from a contemplation of the fair retrospect of a long, honourable, and well-spent life. By a larger circle, even though engrossed with the fearful and tragic drama now being unfolded before humanity, the passing of such a personality from the musical world will it is believed be considered worthy of a tribute.

As a sketch of Mr. Littleton's career (with a portrait) was given in our issue for June, 1911, it is not now necessary to do more than briefly recapitulate the leading incidents there recorded. He was born in London on February 15, 1845. After a period spent at University College School in London, he completed his general education at Heidelberg. In 1862 he entered the business of Novello & Co., of which his father, Henry Littleton, was for twenty years sole proprietor. The story of how Henry Littleton, after serving Alfred Novello in a humble capacity, rose to become the head of the greatest music publishing business in the British Empire, is duly recorded in the full obituary notice by the late Joseph Bennett that appeared in the Musical Times for June, 1888. Mr. Alfred Littleton was the elder of two sons, and on his father's retirement in 1887 he became the head of the firm, and on its incorporation as a limited liability company in 1898 he became chairman, a position he retained until his decease. His personal relations and intimacy with leading musicians at home and abroad, and many of his activities, are chronicled in detail in the sketch referred to above. No incident in his career better exemplified his quiet influence, talent for organization and driving power, than his mobilisation and guidance of the forces that brought to a successful issue the International Musical Congress held in London in 1911—a year that coincided with the centenary of the establishment of the House of Novello, and with Mr. Littleton's period of office as Master of the Worshipful Company of Musicians. At the time of his death he was a member of the Committee of the Royal Choral Society, the Council of the Royal College of Music, and of the Council of the Musical Association.

The history of his life during the last forty years is the history of the House whose fortunes he did so much to shape. A publisher has to suffer much from the super-sensitiveness of the artistic temperament, and a fierce light of criticism beats about his throne from many quarters. He is the rope in the everlasting tug-of-war between the composer and the public. In the controversies as to policy that inevitably arose now and again, Alfred Littleton always bore himself with a dignity that compelled respect. His jealous care for the reputation of his House for artistic production found congenial expression in the publication of éditions de luxe that brought more fame than profit. Less governed by impulse and intuition than by a sagacious caution and a tendency to ponder, he would not act until he was thoroughly convinced. To him at least 'Raw haste' was 'half-sister to delay.' His critical, almost fastidious taste, and the means he possessed to indulge it, enabled him to acquire a fine library and many rare artistic curios. By nature he was modest and even shy, and he had a shrinking horror of vulgarity in any form whatever. As a host he was unique, and one saw him at his best when he was genially ministering to the pleasure of his guests. In short he was a lovable man who compelled the willing allegiance of all who were privileged to know and serve him.

Sir ALEXANDER MACKENZIE writes:

'A friend and companion never meet amiss. Looking back upon an unbroken intimacy—covering nearly half a lifetime—the ancient axiom rises to my mind in all the sincerity born of personal experience, and with an application of nearest and closest kind. The pen moves slowly while I recall the varied events in the passage of the thirty-three years during which I enjoyed Alfred Littleton's friendship and aid. Singularly enough, the incidents and happenings of chiefest interest directly connected with the art which brought us together—of which there are many worth recording at a more fitting time—fade into the background, are but dimly remembered as of small moment when compared with the constant fellowship and familiar intercourse now lost to me. The very privilege of writing these few words will, I hope, excuse the personal note which, perforce, obtrudes itself.

The production of a cantata at Worcester in 1881 brought me, a stranger, from Florence to Berners Street, and thence, on the day of arrival, to Sydenham. This invitation proved to be the first of a series of frequent and prolonged stays in the most hospitable house, which bore witness, in its every corner, to that fine, almost fastidious taste in Literature and Art—indeed in all things—for which my host was distinctly remarkable. Clearly, in him the critical sense of the connoisseur was predominant. The Laird of Monkbarns, of antiquarian memory, could hardly have relished the possession and contemplation of ‘things of beauty’ in a higher degree.

Mention of his sound judgment and oft-times surprisingly keen ception of the best in music would seem unnecessary in these pages: of these I have had frequent experience. But one may in all propriety point to many occasions when the interests of the publisher willingly receded before the generous instincts of the discerning lover of music for its own sake. Of that—not to multiply instances—there exists convincing proof in the handsome volumes published in the name of the ‘Purcell Society,’ the three volumes of ‘Early Bodleian Music’ (edited by the Stainers and Nicholson), ‘Dufay and his contemporaries,’ &c., &c.

In such efforts Littleton delighted. Any undertaking whereby our British art might benefit aroused genuine enthusiasm and invariably claimed his personal attention. Moreover, I have often thought that he preferred to occupy himself with big things, and tackled obstacles with increased zest. Those who served with him on the Committee of the Congress of the International Musical Society in 1911 readily acknowledge that but for the energetic work of our friend and his House the brilliant meeting could hardly have come to pass. ‘Historic’ be it now justly called, in the hope that some of our illustrious—but now, alas! estranged—guests may remember the spirit of hearty welcome in which they were received by British musicians.

But this is merely a single, albeit typical, example of an influence and authority exercised unobtrusively in favour of all musical enterprise in this country. Indeed, there can be but few Societies or Institutions extant which at some time or other have not sought that profitable counsel or active co-operation which was so freely given in the quiet manner so characteristic of the man. And which of us does not look upon the withdrawal of a level-minded and friendly adviser as a loss, irreparable at this most critical moment for music and all that pertains to it? Invariably calm and gentle, kind-hearted, forbearing, slow to pass judgment on others, and as ready to overlook their faults, Alfred Littleton’s habitual reserve tended rather to hide than reveal these estimable qualities to the many. Hence they were perhaps only fully known to, and prized by, the few who were closely associated with him. One conspicuous trait was a never-failing source of best-humoured banter between us. Certes, even when in communicative mood, he was sparing of words. I have sat for hours, travelled with him for days in monosyllabic conversation—perhaps the truest test of real companionship. Be it admitted that the gift of reticence was not bestowed too liberally upon myself. ‘I hate your silent men!’ I once blurted out, when describing the difficulty I had experienced in extracting a direct and satisfactory answer from someone. Littleton smiled, and pointed to himself as if putting a serious and obvious question. But no sound escaped his lips, until we both joined in a hearty laugh at my blundering frankness.

Our friend is all-silent now! But all that which he lovingly accomplished in his generation—and it was much and invaluable in many directions—in the best interests of music and musicians, will continue to speak for him with the voice and in the spirit of deepest gratitude.

The funeral took place at Hove (Brighton) on November 12. A full choral service was held at All Saints’ Church. The choir, which consisted of twenty boys and eight men, sang the opening sentences of Croft’s Burial Service with impressive earnestness and solemnity. The service music included the hymn:

Jesus lives!—thy terrors now
Can, O Death, no more appal us,— sung to a tune composed by the deceased many years ago and which was sung at his father’s funeral in 1888.

Mr. Frank Butler, the organist, played ‘I know that my Redeemer liveth,’ ‘O rest in the Lord,’ and the Dead March in ‘Saul.’ Besides Mr. Augustus Littleton, Mr. Henry W. Brooke, Mr. A. J. B. Littleton, Mr. Walter Littleton, Mr. Hugh Littleton, Mr. Frank L. Pearson, Mr. McLulich, Mr. Passmore, Mr. Percy Riley, Mr. Charles Brooke, Mr. Harold Brooke, and other members of the family, there were present members of the Staff of Novello & Co., including Mr. C. Chapman, Mr. Henry King, Mr. E. Bryant, Mr. Wiseman, and Mr. Charles Fry, who for many years was associated with the firm. Amongst the musicians present there were Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Sir Hubert Parry, Sir Frederick Bridge, Sir Charles Stanford, Mr. John E. West, and Dr. McNaught. Mr. Arthur F. Hill represented the Musicians’ Company.

At the interment in Hove Cemetery a portion of the choir sang the hymn, ‘Lead us, Heavenly Father,’ to the tune by F. Filitz.

CHRISTMAS CAROLS.

BY EDMONDSTOUNE DUNCAN.

Everyone has some liking for those curiously-fashioned little songs which come into brief prominence for a season at the end of the year. Carols there were of every kind—Easter, Whitsun, Midsummer. 'This carol they began that hour,' says the poet, with an eye to the secular love-song. A great essayist elaborately distinguishes between hearse-like airs and carols. To a modern ear the word has but one meaning, and that smacks of Christmas. To one, it spells comfortable enjoyment of well-executed pieces by a church choir, after Matins or Evensong. Another will be put in mind of those tiny groups of shivering mortals whose quavering note heralds the coming of the great Christian festival—a performance liable to an abrupt close in the pocketing of jingling pence. A third lover, distrustful of itinerant or ecclesiastical carolists, will himself elect to become concert-director, artist, and auditor. In the multitudinous choice of carols it is disconcerting to note how the same stock-pieces crop up year after year, to the exclusion of other and better things. We are too easily put off with the expedient in art; our children do not properly prepare their little programme; our choirmasters all too naturally reach down the old, time-worn sheets that have done duty so long. And our solitary student is as often as not in the hands of the hymnodists.

Carol-singing is as old as the Druids: and to retrace its steps is to exhaust the Christian calendar. The Greeks had their birthday hymns and similar pièces d'occasion. So much is vouchsafed of history. And if one could penetrate the veil of the past, doubtless all nations of the earth would be discovered engaged from the first in the simple chants of birth, love, and death. But first comes the love-song. As a French author puts it: 'Adam a dit à Ève, "Je t'aime," et la femme a répondu en serrant l'époux dans ses bras. Ce fut la première chanson, une chanson d'amour. La seconde chanson a dû être une berceuse, la mélodie naïve et douce d'Ève berçant son premier-né.' Carol, Noël, and Yule bear some analogy to each other. Yule had its origin in the Anglo-Saxon Gal—merry. The word was used as a cry, just as afterwards was Noël, which signified Nativity (Natalis Domini) with Latin races and Christianised Celts. Carol, Caral, or Kyrriole reminds us by its orthography that the early carols were danced as well as sung. The Latin Choraulæ were flute-players in the choral dance. Chaucer's use of the word (spelt 'karolling' with him) is generally in the sense of the dance. The feast of Noël was instituted by Telesphorus,* Bishop of Rome, during the 2nd century. His decretal epistle declares that: 'It is ordained that in the holy night of the Nativity of our Lord and Saviour they do celebrate public Church services, and in them do sing the angels' hymn.'

From this period the scant history of carolry is easily traced. St. Ambrose, maker of a hundred hymns and some ten great melodies, loomed large in the 4th century. He it was who introduced the Alleluia and antiphonal song (of earlier Greek use) into the Christian Church. The same century brought forth the first known carolist in Aurelius Prudentius, Spanish poet and hymnodist, whose pieces include a certain famous Christmas song beginning:

Quid est quod arctum circum
Sol jam recurrens deserit
Christusne terris nascitur
Qui lucis auget tramitem?

Another piece of his is still to be heard at Christmas in the well-known 'Corde natus ex parentis' ('Of the Father's love begotten'), which we sing to a 13th-century carol.

With the arrival of the 5th century the word 'wassail'* (so much associated with carolry) came into use. Spain now began to introduce organs into her churches. St. Jerome speaks of carols being in use at this time. And in fact the period yields us one in the celebrated 'A solis ortu cardine,' claimed by Dr. Grattan Flood for Ireland:

Ex. 1. Dr. Neale's translation.

5th Century.

From lands that see the sun a-rise . . . To earth's re - mo - test . . boun - d'ries, Of Vir - gin born to - day we sing . . The Son of Ma - ry, Christ the . . King.

The Latin hymn, says this authority (in 'History of Irish Music,' p. 9), is by the Irish Sedulius, or Shiel, author of 'Carmen Paschale.'

During the 6th century Pope Gregory systematised music, and some twenty-four songs were admitted into ecclesiastical use. Music schools were founded in North Britain, and Bede

* Telesphorus died A.D. 138.

* As for example in the carols, 'Here we come a-wassailing,' and 'Wassail, wassail all over the town.'

lent his powerful aid to the art. Intercourse between the dwellers on either side of the Channel grew to such an extent that Anglo-Saxon youths studied in France. Brittany bells were hung in our churches. The 8th century brought Charlemagne (born at Liège 769), and the great fairs that did so much to encourage secular song. The Mysteries and Passion plays (which often included carols) took their rise at this period. The age of Alfred the Great brought forth Notker's famous Sequences. Helmore dates the rise of carolry from Notker. But we have shown it was much older.

Cornwall, always a carol centre, is credited with our first specimen, 'Ut tuò propitiatus,' which is contained in a 10th-century Bodleian MS. The piece, employing a letter notation, is in two-part harmony—perhaps representative of gymel or twin-song.*

A Paris MS. of the 11th century preserves the carol 'Congaudeat turba fidelium':

Ex. 2.

Con - gau - de - at . . . tur - ba . . . fi - de - li - um, . . . Vir - go ma - ter pe - pe - rit - fi - li - um . . . in Beth - le - hem . . .

which became known through the famous Swedish collection, 'Piæ Cantiones' (1582). It was afterwards included in Helmore and Neale's 'Carols for Christmastide' (1853) and the 'Cowley Carol Book' (1902).

From this point the difficulty disappears in making a chain of carols linking the earlier centuries to our own. 'Dies est leticiæ' and 'In hoc anno circulo' are of the 12th century, and both are contained in the works just mentioned.

The 13th century, often held to be the keystone of mediævalism, is also musically rich. 'Piæ Cantiones' alone contains half a dozen carols of the time, including 'Tempus adest floridum,' a fine Spring carol which we rather foolishly chant to Neale's feeble 'Good King Wenceslas,' and 'In dulce Jubilo,' in Latin and Swedish—one of the first polyglot carols. Some of these Latin pieces obtained European celebrity; and 'In hoc anno circulo' (for example) can show old vernacular versions in almost every European language.

That most remarkable Church ceremony, the Festum Asinorum, in which everything seems to have been a travesty excepting the music, bequeaths us a choice little melody which has braved its way through the centuries to the modern collections, in association with Rev. J. H. Clark's translation, 'Soldiers who are Christ's below.' The MS. from which our facsimile† quotes (dated 1227) is among the Egerton collection in the British Museum.

The song is not impossibly as old as Charlemagne. The English language was beginning to establish itself at the period, as may be seen from the well-known Summer carol, 'Sumer is icumen in,' of almost identical date.

We have a little Polish specimen of this time, interesting apart from its period, because it gives a hint of the Polonaise rhythm characteristic of much old folk-song:

Ex. 3. 13th century.

W zło - bie, leży K toż po bieży, Ko - len - do wac ma - le mu. Je - su so - wi Chrys - tu so - wi Dzis nam na - rod - zo rem - u. Ras - tusz ko - wie przy - by - waj - cie, Je mu weliezcznie przy - gry - waj - cie Ja ko Pa - nu - na - sze - mu.

By some strange irony, the carol appears in the 'Hymnal Companion' shorn of its one glory—the rhythm—in order to accommodate Montgomery's 'Angels from the realms of glory.'

One of the most popular carols ever written—'Resonet in laudibus,' which Neale paraphrased in 'Christ was born on Christmas Day'—comes to us from the 14th century. This is another jewel in the casket of 'Piæ Cantiones.' Speculation as to the origin of such remarkable melody fails. Dr. Neale decided in favour of Swedo-Finnish inspiration. But the oldest of all these pious songs, as we have seen, is found in an ancient French MS. Tobias Norlind testifies to the popularity of this fine carol collection. The numbers (says he) were sung and danced until almost late times by school children as Christmas and Easter carols. For useful modern editions of these old airs, readers are referred to Helmore and Neale's 'Christmas Carols,' (Novello), and the 'Cowley Carol Book' of the Rev. G. R. Woodward, editor of the original work (in its reprint) for the Plainsong and Mediæval Music Society.

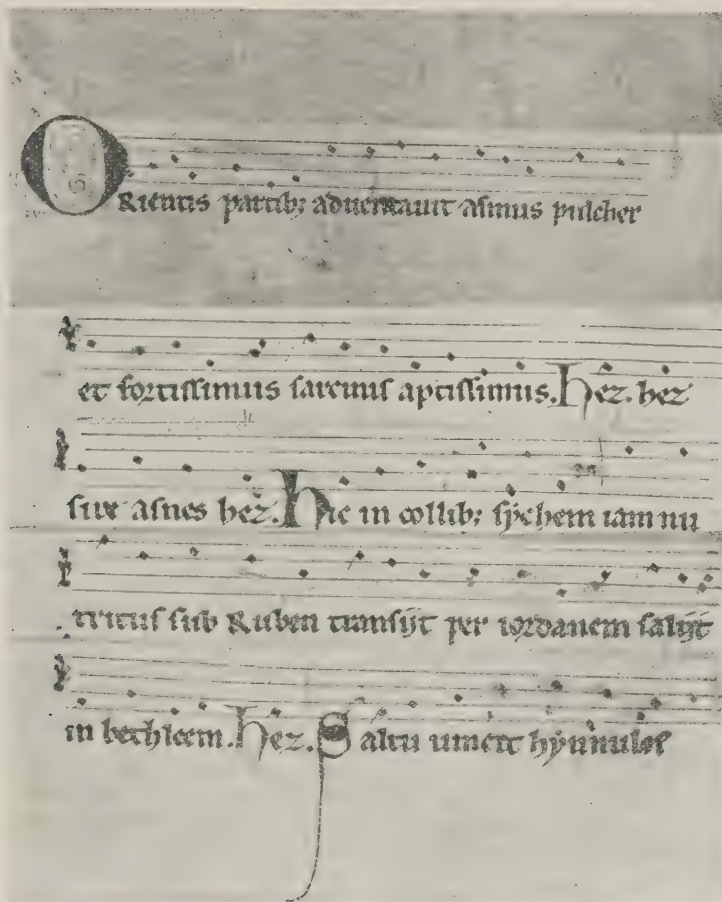

The beginning of the musicians' period was the 15th century, when Dunstable and the great Netherlands School laid the foundations of a nobler and profounder art. Dunstable quite possibly contributed some of the carols in the Agincourt roll preserved at Cambridge.* The strong melodic lines, stiff contrapuntal workings of their several parts, stamp them as some of the best work of their century. But the eight Christmas pieces are essentially musicians' art, having little in common with that folk-melody which lies at the root of all carolry. The remark may be extended to nearly all the studied work of the masters who followed—from the madrigals and motets of Palestrina, Du Caurroy, Nanini, Marbeck, and Byrd to the great works of Bach and Handel, or the choice Christmas songs of the modern masters.

* This has been given in the Musical Times. It is rather too crude for present purposes.

The dates of some of our carol books show that these were amongst the earliest things printed. Wynkyn de Worde's 'Christmasse Carolles' (1521), a single leaf of which was saved, gives us the popular 'Boar's Head Carol.' Not a few other carols treat of the same Yule-tide custom which came to England from Scandinavia during the 12th century, when Henry II. had the seasonable dish served up with a flourish of trumpets. The merriest of these Boar carols is that given in the 15th-century Porkington MS., beginning:

Hey, hey, hey, hey,
The borrys hede is armed gay
With garlond gay in porttoring,
I pray you alle with me to syng,
With hay.

A later one, in a Museum MS., sings with more dignity thus:

Nowell, Nowell, Nowell, Nowell,
Tidings good I think to tell:
The Boar's head that we bring here
Betokeneth a prince withouten peer,
Is born this day to buy us dear, Nowell.

So much for the books and MSS., which the most ardent believer in oral folk tradition must admit seem formidable enough. But there is, or was, a history,—could we but trace it,—that took one into fields and lanes, by snug cottage firesides, away from the libraries of the learned, right to the heart of simple peasant life. Some of the first carol collectors, Davies Gilbert and William Sandys, did good service in this direction, just as have done (in later times) the Folksong Society and Mr. Cecil Sharp. That the publishers not seldom aided the collectors' efforts is seen from such carols as 'Remember, O thou man,' which Ravenscroft published in 'Melismata' in 1611, though the traditional versions have continued to be heard in the Cornish lanes, as is shown by Mr. Thomas Hardy, who quotes the piece in 'Under the Greenwood Tree.' Cornwall and the west of England were prolific of carols, though if Chope's record is to be taken as trustworthy, few were of the highest quality.

Where are the Welsh carols? We have records of Midsummer carols, Winter carols, and similar songs to the nightingale and to Cupid, but with the exception of 'Nos Galan' ('Deck the hall') and 'Tôn Garol' ('The old year is passing') there seem to be few or none of these pieces accessible to the public. There is a curious affinity of language and music between the Welsh and the Bretons. For example, the well-known 13th-century 'Captain Morgan's March' may be seen in Villemarqué's scholarly work on Breton folk-song; and not many days ago the Welsh Fusiliers discovered, to their surprise, that they could converse freely with their Breton comrades at the front! Similarly the Danish and Dutch books contain numerous airs that we fondly thought were ours.

Scottish carols long ago died a natural death; for, as Hone discovered in 1823, no Church feasts have been kept since the days of John Knox. In spite of this, 'Ane Compendious Booke of Godly and Spirituall Songs' (1621) contains one specimen in:

I come from hevin to tell
The best nowelis that ever befel! :

which was sung to the tune of 'Baw-lula law,' a title Lamb explains as derived from 'Hé bas! là le loup' ('Hush! there's the wolf'). There is another, sadly handicapped by words opening with 'Jewry came to Jebusalem' (sic), preserving a pretty English ballad-air named 'Dulcina,' which had escaped the vigilant eye of Chappell. Irish carolry, for a different reason, has fallen into total neglect. Luke Wadding's 'Pious Garland' (of 1680) merely employs famous ballad airs for its music. When the writer, some years ago, asked Dr. Joyce if his great collection contained any carols, he was inclined to give a negative answer, adding that in South Limerick, during his boyhood's days, carol-singing was unknown. But when it was pointed out that his own book gave specimens with such titles as 'The star' and 'The leading of the star,' Joyce admitted these were plainly carols; and he afterwards remembered having heard them (in the year 1854, or thereabouts) in Dublin streets.

France is rich in notable carols. There is a fresh, liquid beauty in many of them that mirrors the heart of a people.

Sir John Stainer was almost the first to draw attention to the rich store of carolry enjoyed by our neighbours across the Channel. This he did by lecture and publication. In his 'Twelve Old Carols' (Novello—circa 1885) are brought together Besançon, Tyrolese, Poitouan, Arpajon, Bas-Quercyan, Gascon, Norman, and Flemish carols. These, besides sharply contrasting several interesting phases of provincial melody, well illustrate distinct phases of carolry. We have the 'Shepherds' awakening' (which has been sung by scores of Noël's), 'Their Conversations' (a scarcely less fruitful theme), and the 'Adoration' with which Nature—typified by bird, beast, and flower—salutes Nativity Morn. Most famous of these varied Noël's is the 16th-century 'Tous les bourgeois de Châtre,' which was composed by a priest named Crestot in l'Île de France. The air was also sung as a hymn to words beginning 'Le Fils du Roi de gloire':

'NOËL DE COUR.'

Air—'Nous nous mîmes à jouer.'

Tous les bourgeois de Châtre Et ceux de Mont-lhé-ry, S'en al-laient quatre à quatre, En chas-sant le sou-ci, Cet-te jour-née i-ci. . . Que la Vier-ge Ma-ri-e, Prés le bœuf et l'Â-non, don, don, De Jé-sus ac-cou-cha, la, la, Dans u-ne ber-ge-ri-e.

All through French minstrelsy there runs a vein of sunlight and laughter. And the Noël's enjoy a full share of its radiance. We may look long before matching the gaiety and sheer joy of such a melody as the Besançon 'Chantons! Bargies, Noué, Noué' ('Hail! ever hail, auspicious morn'—in Sandys), or the almost conversational freedom of 'Voisin, d'où venait ce grand bruit?' ('Dict. de Noël's'). The Norman 'Noël de Greville,' 'O bienheureuse nuit' (given in Stainer), is tenderness itself. The Lorrain Noël's are full of character and colour, and alone would fill a volume. Not a few, like 'Il est né, le Divin Enfant' ('Dict. de Noël's'), favour a gavotte rhythm. There is also a chatty, lilting, saucy air about some of the country carols which turn the shepherds' visit to the Birthplace into a homely legend or play, somewhat theatrical, but usually of sound taste.

Many writers have held that carol-singing came from the mediæval Mysteries and more particularly from the ecclesiastical ceremony of the prasipio or crèche which St. Francis inaugurated in 1223. That the institution of a simple Holy Night observance would tend to confirm previous practice (which we have shown to exist) there can be no doubt.

French carolists borrowed and remoulded many of the old Church melodies. Thus, secularised versions of 'Jesu Redemptor omnium' and 'O filii et filiae' run through most of the collections. In our own country the tendency has been rather the other way; and we find sacred words wedded to such downright ballad-airs as 'Greensleeves,' 'Crimson Velvet,' 'Sellenger's Round,' or even the hanging-tune 'Essex's last Good-night.' We have gone further, and appropriated our neighbours' 'Song of the Ass.'

A glance at Bordes's collection of Basque Noël's reveals the fact that 'Eguberriren jitiáz' is simply a country version of 'Jesu Redemptor.' The other melodies as a whole are paler of hue, less full-blooded and lively than the French. One of the best is 'O Eguberri gaia,' which sings of the glad night of Noël and the joy it gives to the pure in heart. Being short, it merits quotation:

Russian school-children and country choirs mark the season pretty much as they do in France or in our own country; and they have some fine old material to offer. Here is a brief example from Prach's collection of 1815:

'OLD TWELFTH NIGHT SONG.'

PRACH'S 'Russian National Songs,' 1815.

These old Twelfth Night songs, judging from those contained in Prach's collection, are thoroughly characteristic of Russian folk-song. Their terseness is quite remarkable. One suspects that they have been used for extempore song, after the manner of the Scandinavian Stev, or the well-understood custom of Welsh Penillion and Croatian peasant singers.

It may be said that as a whole the pieces our carolists now sing are traditional songs of the class Sandys collected in 1833. Take, for instance, 'God rest you merry, gentlemen,' 'The first Nowell,' 'A Virgin most pure,' 'Novels' and the 'Cherry Carol' that Miss MacKinlay so sweetly sings. The rarer legendary pieces, 'The seven Virgins,' 'The Carnal,' and 'The Crane,' or the old version of 'The Holly and Ivy,' do not seem to possess popular tunes.

It is passing strange that Ben Jonson's fine carol, 'I sing the Birth,' in spite of Sullivan's setting, is so little sung, whereas the modest hymn to 'Christmas Day—for Dolly'* easily reached the ears of Christendom. Had Byrom and the old Manchester organist some secret which the more illustrious pair lacked?

Two things stand clear: a man can no more make a carol than a Christmas tree. Such things only grow in the ages. The other is—How easily we can do without German carols, if we try! 'On chante tant Noël qu'à la fin il vient,' says the old proverb of Villon's day.

ON FORM AND COMPOSITION: AN OPEN LETTER TO AN EARNEST YOUNG MUSICIAN.

I will take it for granted, then, that in a few years you will have developed at any rate the basis of a splendid technique by incessant labour along the right lines—though which lines are the right ones for you it will be for yourself to discover, for neither your books nor your teachers can help you much there. In the last resort, as Sir Charles Stanford says in his book on Composition—the most interesting and the most rational book that I have ever seen on the subject—'the composer is his own trainer; the teacher can only make suggestions as to the direction and scope of the training.' But obviously everything depends on the fortuitous concurrence of the right teacher and the right pupil. Can we imagine a Reger teaching a Debussy, or a Moussorgski a Brahms, with any advantage either to pupil or pedagogue? Really you will have to be as careful in choosing your teacher as in choosing your parents; and your experience, I am afraid, will have made you hardly any riper for the later choice than for the earlier one. Wagner once suggested that it would have been all the better for Berlioz's music if he could have been prevailed upon to submit it to Cherubini for criticism and advice. I will not pause to ask what Wagner would have said if anyone had suggested that he should submit his scores to the judgment and kindly advice of Brahms or Schumann. I will merely point out that what was lacking in Berlioz's music is not something that Cherubini might have given it, but something that Berlioz himself should have given it, but could not. Had Berlioz been a trifle bigger than he was, he would have learned from himself precisely what it was that was wanting in him, just as Wagner learned from himself just what it was he lacked, himself making the Wagner of 'Tristan' out of the Wagner of 'Lohengrin.' Moussorgski is another example of a composer of genius who, through some tiny but most important element having been omitted from his make-up, was unable either to use other peoples' technique satisfactorily or to develop a thoroughly satisfactory one of his own. You, of course, will avoid the errors of these half-and-half men; you will already, I doubt not, have taken good care to be born the right sort of genius.

But supposing you to have acquired the finest possible technique both of the bookish and of the personal kind, you are still only at the very beginning of the task of writing great music. And here, I am afraid, the text-books will hardly help you in the least. The 'form' of the great masters is rightly the object of our special admiration. In the highest sense 'form' simply means the best possible way of expressing a particular idea or sequence of ideas. But the text-books too often confuse 'form' in this highest sense with 'form' in the much lower sense of 'pattern' or 'proportion.' They approach music at the wrong end. They make the cardinal mistake of supposing that a Beethoven symphony, for example, is great—this among other reasons, of course—because it exhibits a certain symmetry of pattern. The truth is that the pattern is only interesting because the music is great. The greatness of the symphony does not come in the smallest degree from the pattern—which really might have been modified by Beethoven at a hundred points had the nature of his thought demanded it—and the pattern is therefore no help at all to you, for instance, in trying to compose something equally great. By copying the pattern without equalling the idea you merely fire a blank cartridge, or make a wax figure that has the proportions of a man without the life of him, or, as Wagner would have said, you make swords without blades. Or perhaps I may be allowed to characterise the process in words that I have used elsewhere: 'the text-books and the professors only teach form because the spirit is unteachable. No great musician ever was, or ever will be, great in virtue of what the text-books call his form. Any numskull can reproduce the form of any work whatever, simply by planning his sections, his repetitions and so on, in the same order and on the same scale. He can copy the form of a Beethoven allegro to a hair's breadth by using the same number of themes and figures as Beethoven, cutting them to the same size and pattern, going up when Beethoven goes up and down when Beethoven goes down, modulating when Beethoven modulates, entering upon his working out, his recapitulation, and all the rest of it at precisely as many bars' distance from the commencement as Beethoven does, and adding a Coda of the same length and build as Beethoven's. But his work would be no more like Beethoven's than an isosceles triangle is like the West pediment of the Parthenon.'

* Byrom's 'Christians, awake!' Set to music by Dr. Wainwright in 1766.

I am well aware that some of the best composers and teachers recommend the student to work inch by inch, as it were, upon a model of this kind. Elgar tells us he did it in his young days, and Sir Charles Stanford recommends it in the admirable book to which I have already referred. A practice with such a backing certainly deserves respectful consideration. But I would point out to you that both these composers have, almost in the same breath in which they have recommended it, laid bare its limitations. 'This system of studying form,' says Sir Charles Stanford, 'is the only possible one for the all-important control of shape and proportion.' That is true, but only, I think, in a very limited sense. It teaches shape and proportion only as regards work of the same type as the symphony or the sonata that is taken as the model; it would obviously not teach Wagner how to plan out the proportions of the 'Ring' or Strauss the proportions of 'Elektra,' or even of an ordinary symphonic poem, in which the logic of form has to be a blended logic, a satisfaction at once of the poetic and the architectural sense. Elgar, again, has said that what is, wrong with the teaching of form is that it teaches building but not architecture. The innate defect of the method comes from the fact that there is no such thing as an invariable norm of balance and proportion in music or in anything else. Balance may be an affair of two equal halves, or of three equal thirds, or four equal quarters, and so on. But it may also be based on the principle of the steel-yard, in which a greater or smaller length of arm may be compensated by a smaller or greater weight somewhere along the line. We have only to examine, say, a hundred representative pictures to see that there are at least a hundred ways of giving the impression of perfect balance. There is such a thing as a mathematical centre, and such a thing as a psychological centre. The material of a picture may be arranged regularly about a mathematical centre, as in a typical primitive Italian altar piece. Or a very intense point of interest at one side, occupying a relatively small portion of the canvas, may balance perfectly a larger but less intensely-charged space on the opposite side. Similarly one picture may have a large foreground and a small background, and another a large background and a small foreground, and yet each may be a model of proportion. Or again, one picture may be round, another square, another oblong, another fan-shaped, another octagonal, each of them involving a different problem of balance. The upshot of it all is that balance and proportion are not necessarily simple matters of plane mathematics; they can be modified in a hundred ways by psychology, by atmosphere, by perspective, and so on. So it is with music. The pattern, the relation of dimensions that may be the best for one work are by no means necessarily the best for another of a different kind; and it may do a young composer positive harm to become possessed of the notion that it is linear dimensions alone that make form and proportion.

You will not, then, benefit greatly by a slavish study of 'form' on the lines of taking a particular composition as a model, though you will undoubtedly benefit unconsciously by listening to music in which good form is implicit, just as the eye unconsciously develops a superior sense of linear proportion by constantly living among beautiful statuary. If, as you say, you wish to be a great composer, you will need a good deal more than the inch-rule sense of proportion that the analyses of the text-books will give you. But after all, the writing of a great masterpiece is simplicity itself. There are only three parts of any composition that you need to trouble about—the beginning, the end, and the part between. Get each of these right, and your success is certain. You cannot help getting them right if you are a genius; therefore, once more, make quite sure that you are a genius before you begin to compose. If you carefully examine the works of the great masters—or, better still, if you associate with them for a lifetime, and, instead of trying to wring their secrets from them, let them tell these to you at their own time and in their own way—you will discover that what makes, say, the first movement of the 'Eroica' so great is not at all the 'form' of it—which any donkey could copy—but the fact that you seem to be listening to the endlessly eloquent, endlessly changeable, and invariably logic conversation of a great man. He begins by attracting your attention with a remark that strikes you as decidedly worth following up. He develops this line of thought until it is apparently at the point of becoming exhausted, when suddenly he diverges to another line. He changes his point of view, his line of approach, a hundred times in the course of the conversation; he never holds to a point a single instant after he has driven it home. At times he will modulate so delicately into a new argument that you hardly know how he has carried you over from the one to the other; at other times he will make you sit up sharply in your chair, all eyes and ears, by a change of manner, of mood, or thought, the amazing abruptness of which is supportable only by the still more amazing feeling you have that the more this extraordinary man seems to diverge from his point the closer he is really keeping to it. In a word, he never fails to do the right thing in the right place—and that is genius. I therefore cannot sufficiently impress upon you, if you would be a great composer, the necessity of always doing the right thing in the right place. See to that, and everything else is easy.

I need hardly say that you cannot be too careful in the choice of your themes. Make sure at the very commencement that you have hit upon a unique idea that will preserve its vitality for generations. All the great men abound in ideas of this kind. They need not be elaborate ones by any means. The opening subject of the C minor Symphony, for example, or that of the ninth, or the descending bass of Bach's G String aria, for instance, are so simple (almost absurdly simple, indeed) that one wonders why they had not previously occurred to a hundred composers. There are two things I would urge you to be particularly careful about in inventing your germinal themes. First of all, make sure that they are of the sort that will endure, and, so far from exhausting their secret for humanity as time rolls on, will seem to acquire a new wonder, a new profundity, each time they are heard. You could not take a better model in this respect than Wagner, whose leit-motifs, for all the years they have been current, are as fresh to-day as coins from yesterday's mint. The real difference between the great composers and the little composers is simply this, that in the course of a hundred years or so the great ones are discovered and the little ones are found out. You will therefore see that you begin with themes as vital and as durable as those of Wagner, Bach, and Beethoven. Secondly, make sure that your germinal themes have really the power of germination. One of the most puzzling things about the themes of the big men is the way they seem to contain in themselves the whole of the coming composition. It is this quality, among others, that makes Hugo Wolf's songs so remarkable. Their opening themes have a physiognomy as definite as that of a human being, and all through the song they talk and walk, and rage and sigh, and break and melt, in just the natural way that an interesting human being would do in interesting circumstances. It is not merely that the first phrase of 'Anakreons Grab' is so suggestive a pictorial symbol of the tender drooping of the branches over the tomb of the old Greek poet who was happy in life and happy in death, but that it also seems to cling like a second self to every line of Goethe's poem, every fold of its tissue. What and whence is this magic? I do not know; and no analysis of the 'form' of the song, nothing that I could put in a text-book, would come within a hundred miles of accounting for the magic. That is Wolf's secret; he does this kind of thing simply because he is Hugo Wolf, not because he is anybody's pupil,—indeed, he was no one's pupil; and he is Hugo Wolf because he can do this kind of thing so often and so infallibly! You will at once go and do likewise; but I warn you in advance that the treatises on form will hardly help you in the least to do so, any more than they would have helped you, had you been Beethoven, to bring the horns stealing in with the original tonic theme of the 'Eroica' upon that apparently irrelevant dominant seventh harmony in the violins. All you have to do, you see, is to be a genius, and the rest shall be added unto you.

You will be equally careful with the middle portion of your work, whatever it may be,—symphony, sonata, opera, or song. It is here that you will realise, in time, what I mean by technique being so fused with imagination as to be indistinguishable from it,—fused into a magical something that is as distinct from the mere separable matter of technique as the expression of a touching human glance is from the rods and cones of the eye. It is in the centre part of compositions, especially of long ones, that the big men do their most dazzling feats. How do they manage to sustain the conversation as they do, constantly diverging from the point without ever losing it, always talking coherently, consecutively, and interestingly? Again I do not know; that is their secret. I only know they do it; perhaps they themselves could not tell us how it is done, or had any notion, when they began, what they were going to say or how they were going to say it. What on earth made Mozart think of that exquisite modulation to the chord of the seventh in the final repetition of the theme of the Romanza in the 'Kleine Nacht-Musik'; what demon told Bach how to pick up again and again the threads of the organ toccata in F just as he seemed to be on the point of laying them down, they having honourably done their work and nothing more to be expected of them; what ministering angel stood by Wagner's side when he was writing the second Act of 'Tristan, and whispered to him not only what he was to say and how to say it, but—which was just as important—when to say it? During the writing of 'Tristan' Wagner discovered, as he told Frau Wesendonck, that the secret of musical composition lay in 'the art of transition.' There you have it in a nutshell. Make sure that all your transitions are interesting in themselves, logically related to what goes before and what comes after, and that they come pat at the proper moment, and all will be well with you. Can I recommend a book that will teach you this, I fancy I hear you asking. I am afraid I can't. Then will a study of the transitional methods of Bach and Beethoven and Wagner help you? Not in the least, I am sorry to say, except in the general way that looking at harmonious statuary will make a sculptor's eye fastidious, and so less likely to tolerate inharmonious work of his own. These things help the student negatively rather than positively; they may make him resolve to turn the devil out of doors, but they will not of themselves bring him angels to entertain. You cannot crib Bach or Beethoven's game. You will have to play the bowling off your own bat, as they did. But though the books and the teachers cannot help you, do not despair. The thing is really simplicity itself; all you have to do is to think of the right thing in the right place, as your great forerunners had the common-sense to do.

And so with the end of your work—in some respects the most difficult part of it. Nothing is so impressive as a good exit from the stage; and the manner of it must necessarily vary with the play, the character, and the situation. If you learn from a book on form how Beethoven manages his codas, and then try to apply the information to a work of your own, you will be like an actor who dies like somebody else's Hamlet in the part of Macbeth. You may see quite clearly how an effect is made, yet that of itself will not enable you to produce the living equivalent of it. Take for example the end of the aria of Bach that Max Reger has used as the subject of his variations and fugue. The serene dignity of the conclusion is plainly due to the departing actor—for so we may call the theme—turning half round when he has all but left the stage, giving the audience an eloquent look and making an impressive gesture, and then turning slowly on his heel and walking gravely and majestically off. It is this frustration of anticipation—one of the most cunning and effective devices in art—that so magically renews our interest in the actor precisely when we have reconciled ourselves to parting from him. Or see, again, how artfully Wagner prolongs the moment of farewell in the 'Kaisermarsch.' Yet admirable as this long-drawn method is, that method is no less admirable—under certain circumstances—that consists of cutting off the music with a guillotine stroke, as Strauss does at the end of 'Elektra.' When are you to use the one method and when the other, I am sure I hear you inquiring. Ah, don't ask me. If I knew, I would write a text-book on the subject on the lines of the text-books on form; but I am afraid I should tell you, in the end, little more about the real thing than they do. I take it that your object is to create art from the inside, not to pass an examination in the externalities of it.

And after all, why worry? I have given you a prescription that I am confident is infallible; do the right thing in the right place, and you cannot go wrong. What is the right thing, and where the right place, I must leave it to you to discover.

The simple rules I have given you will, I trust, help you more than any text-book to become a great composer. I have reiterated this last one because it is so very important; but the others are not to be despised. Make sure, then, (1) that your parents give you genius; (2) that you assimilate all the technique that the books and the professors can teach you, and then superimpose upon it a technique of your own, that is in part the child and in part the parent of your own manner of thinking; and (3) that the beginning, the middle, and the end of your compositions are all vital in themselves and organically connected with each other. There are other rules I could give you, but perhaps these will be enough for you at the commencement of your studies. You may, of course, have gathered from all I have said that composition really cannot be 'taught,' except to people who have no business to be composing,—that the best form of teaching is, as Sir Charles Stanford says, merely critical advice, and that ninety-five composers out of a hundred would be none the worse for intelligent teaching of this kind long after they have ceased to be students. The things it would do Strauss good to be told, for example! Perhaps you are right; but keep it dark.—Yours faithfully,

ERNEST NEWMAN.

MUSICAL NOTATION.

PRACTICAL WAYS OF EXPRESSING DETAILS OF MUSICAL COMPOSITION.

BY H. ELLIOT BUTTON.

SECTION VI.—SMALL NOTES.

A diatribe on graces and ornaments does not of course come within the scope of this article, but it will be as well to discuss a few points in which composers are often inconsistent or indifferent in their means of expression. This probably arises from the fact that the effect intended is so obvious to themselves that they do not realise the possibility of their notation being misunderstood by others.

There is one rule that it is most important to remember: Always write grace notes in the positions in which they are to be played or sung.

The grace notes in the following examples:

S. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR (Op. 39).

Romance in G.

are evidently intended to be played in the previous bar, and in one instance:

the composer has so written them; but it is somewhat confusing to the executant to have these grace notes printed sometimes before and sometimes after the bar. They should always be written where they are intended to be performed.

With some composers the appoggiature ♭ and ♮ and ♯ are often used to signify the same effect as the acciaccatura ♯. Appoggiature (in small notes) are seldom now used, but composers that prefer this means of expression should be careful that they are so placed that the meaning is not obscure.

Where a chorus should be left unaccompanied for a few bars, it is customary to arrange the parts in short score, using small notes in the staves of the accompaniment. This practice may be useful occasionally where the unaccompanied portion is very short, but where passages are more extended it is preferable to have them printed in large notes and a direction such as Voices alone inserted in the centre. To enclose the passage in brackets is also useful, as pointing out quite distinctly where the accompaniment again enters. If the passage is intended to be played at rehearsal it should obviously be printed in notes large enough for the accompanist to read easily; but if the music is quite simple it is far better to write rests in the accompaniment instead of a compressed vocal score, and thus encourage the habit of reading from the four line score.

GENERAL HINTS.

It is expedient when writing for the pianoforte to keep as far as possible the top staff for the right hand and the bottom for the left hand. Although not an unalterable law, it is a useful rule that should not be broken unless for some amply sufficient reason. Experienced performers can of course distribute the parts between the two hands for themselves, but even they will be able to give more attention to the æsthetic effect if the mechanical difficulties are thus lessened, however slightly; whereas in the case of the less experienced the help thus given will be of great value. A glance at the two bars of the first of Bach's '48 Preludes and Fugues' quoted below will show the advantage, from a pianist's point of view, of keeping the right and left hands on separate staves:

(Short score, showing part-writing.)

'Ascribe unto the Lord.'

(As originally written.)

S. S. WESLEY.

(As revised.)

THE END.

(Arranged for the hands.)

The advantage to the performer is obvious.

Do not overburden your score with unnecessary rests or slurs. After finishing a composition or arrangement, it is a good plan to look through it carefully and eliminate those rests (and perhaps also slurs) that can evidently be dispensed with. Such a passage as the following:

would have the same effect and be much clearer if written thus:

It is well to keep the note to be trilled on a separate stem, and not joined to the other notes of the chord:

In writing Anthems, Services, &c., in which the organ accompaniment has, for reasons of space, to be printed in two staves, it is most important that the notes to be played on the pedals should be plainly indicated and written on a separate stem, not joined to the left-hand part. The remark made above as to keeping the notes for the right and left hands on the respective staves applies here with equal force.

The following is a passage from the organ accompaniment of an anthem, printed firstly as the composer wrote it, and secondly as revised in accordance with the above rules:

'IT'S A LONG, LONG WAY TO TIPPERARY.'—AN ARMY MARCHING-SONG.

This is a facsimile (reduced) of the original manuscript of the chorus edition of 'Tipperary' as it was brought by Mr. Jack Judge, the composer, to Messrs. Feldman & Co. The alterations were made at the suggestion of Mr. Bert. Feldman. The repetition of the word 'long' and the lengthening of the third syllable of 'Tipperary' (eight bars from the end) were certainly great improvements.

By the favour of Messrs. Feldman & Co. we are able to place before our readers a facsimile (somewhat reduced from the original) of the manuscript of the chorus section of 'Tipperary' as it was offered by the composers, and also a music-type setting with the words added. This we have sought permission to do in order that future historians may find in our pages the essential part of a song that in all English-speaking countries, including the United States, has become associated with the great War.

Of all the numerous songs that have acquired vogue during war-time, surely 'Tipperary' is the most remarkable. In the first place, the words have absolutely nothing whatever to do with war, and sound no patriotic note; they reflect simply a rollicking, inconsequent jocularly and naive wistfulness, and unlike far too many of the songs we suffer in music-halls there is no taint of vulgarity in the verbal expression, no silly attempt at phonetic representation of what is supposed to be the special pronunciation of the masses, and no affected bad grammar (many fairly educated people are capable of 'has fairly drove me'). An Irishman in London plaintively gives vent to his hankering to get back to his beloved Tipperary, and especially 'to the sweetest girl' he knows. The sentiment is 'Home, sweet Home' and 'The Girl I left behind me' combined, 'A touch of nature that makes the whole world kin.'

The words are as follows:

Up to mighty London came an Irishman one day;
As the streets are pav'd with gold, sure ev'ryone was gay;
Singing songs of Piccadilly, Strand and Leicester Square,
Till Paddy got excited, then he shouted to them there:

It's a long way, &c.

Paddy wrote a letter to his Irish Molly O',
Saying, 'Should you not receive it, write and let me know!
If I make mistakes in "spelling," Molly dear,' said he,
'Remember it's the pen is bad, don't lay the blame on me.'

(Refrain.)

Molly wrote a neat reply to Irish Paddy O', Saying, 'Mike Malony wants to marry me, and so
Leave the Strand and Piccadilly, or you'll be to blame,
For love has fairly drove me silly—hoping you're the same!'

(Refrain.)

It is all in the language 'understanded of the people.' But perhaps the most extraordinary thing is that, of the millions who sing the refrain, very few indeed have more than a nodding acquaintance with the narrative part of the words and the associated tune. It is true that this section makes no special musical appeal as melody or rhythm. The real living feature is the irresistible flowing momentum of the refrain. It is all so singable. The rhythm of its phrases, with its passing obeisance to rag-time, is so well varied and balanced, the tonal cadences all lead on, the melody not ending before it leaves off, and its range is only slightly more than an octave. It is all born of an intimacy with the psychology of the music-hall goer which our best composers do not attempt to assimilate.

Mr. Jack Judge and Mr. Harry Williams collaborated to write the words and music, but the former well-known music-hall singer is the chief author and composer.

Although Mr. Judge was born at Birmingham, he is an unadulterated Irishman, his parents being natives of County Mayo. 'Tipperary' was ready for publication in 1911, but it was not until 1912 that Messrs. Feldman accepted it for publication after it had been rejected in several other quarters. Even after publication it was found that copies were not selling, and on Mr. Judge expressing his disappointment, Mr. B. Feldman replied, 'Take my word for it, that not only Edinburgh but all the world will one day ring with your song.' An acute prophecy! The sales have now passed the second million.

We are asked to announce that The Queen's Work for Women Fund has arranged for the early publication, through the generosity of Mr. S. E. Palmer, of a song entitled 'Children of Britain,' music by Mr. Hubert Bath and words by Mr. Alfred Noyes. The song is set to music with organ obbligato, and as a four-part song for mixed voices; also as a unison song with and without pianoforte accompaniment. It is to be published by Messrs. Novello & Co., Ltd. The profits derived from the publication in its several forms will be devoted entirely to the benefit of The Queen's Work for Women Fund, and a considerable demand is anticipated, especially as Madame Clara Butt has kindly promised to sing the song. Arrangements have been made for publication in London and New York on December 7, on which day Messrs. Novello & Co. will be prepared to deal with orders; but it is recommended that applications for copies should be made before publication day with a view to facilitating distribution.

A lecture on 'Sea-songs and chauties' was given by Dr. R. R. Terry before a meeting of the Incorporated Society of Musicians at the Regent Street Polytechnic on November 14, under the chairmanship of Dr. E. Markham Lee. He distinguished between the two types—sea-songs such as those by Dibdin, sung chiefly by landmen, and sea-songs proper that emanated from village- and sailor-folk. These 'chanties,' he said, were the true folk-songs of the sea. They were influenced by the English folk-song idiom, and also largely by the West Indies native songs.

In a recent libel action brought by Mr. Mark Hambourg against certain journals it was established that Mr. Hambourg is of Russian parentage on both sides, and was born in Russia.

The article on the late Mr. Littleton's library, which began in our November number, will be concluded in our next issue.

Church and Organ Music.

THE COMPLEAT ORGANIST.

BY HARVEY GRACE.

X.—OF CONGREGATIONAL SINGING.

Clericus, Laicus, Organicus, Auctor.

Laicus.—It is an odd thing, that while all the clergy agree as to the importance of congregational singing, and practically all musicians are prepared to testify to its impressiveness from a merely musical point of view, yet little or nothing is done to make the most of it. At present its effectiveness is largely fortuitous. I admit that its spontaneity is a factor, but I feel sure that, without destroying this element, we might organize and develop the popular side of church music with advantage. Even within the limits of hymn-singing much might be done towards the attainment of something more than a steady pounding through things. Here are a few excellent musical effects to be got by simple means, practised at, so far as I know, but few churches. First, there is the antiphonal singing of choir and congregation. Many well-known hymns lend themselves admirably to this arrangement, e.g., 'Onward, Christian soldiers,' 'Forward! be our watchword,' 'Brightly gleams our banner,' 'We plough the fields,' 'Praise, O praise our God and King,' 'To Thee, our God we fly,' 'A few more years shall roll,' 'Jerusalem on high,' and many others. All these are long hymns with a refrain. Why should not the first and last verses be sung by everybody, and the remainder with verse and chorus by choir and people? Or, if it is felt that this method gives the people too little to do, choir and congregation might sing alternate verses. I suggest it only for long hymns. This would be less fatiguing to both voice and ear than the rendering of six, eight, or even ten verses with exactly the same disposition of voices. 'Forward! be our watchword,' for example has eight verses of twelve lines! Any chorister will bear me out when I say that the singing of processional hymns is most fatiguing work. With the choir taking the verse, and the people the chorus, all would remain fresh, and the spirit of the hymn would be unflagging. Again, with the other long hymns made up of short verses, welcome variety would be provided by giving the odd verses (after the first) to the people, the choir singing the even, with the first and last full.

The second effect which is not sufficiently made use of is the alternation of light and heavy voices. Hymns that are sung in unison, such as plainsong, or those stirring French ecclesiastical melodies that I am glad to see are becoming popular here, give us an opportunity for this. Again, let the first and last verses be sung full, with even verses by boys of the choir and women of the congregation, and the odd ones by all the men. This not only gives us vocal contrast, but enables the organist to use his instrument in the least monotonous way. The boy's and women's voices can be accompanied with various light combinations, the men's with heavy, and the harmonies of course should be varied throughout. Here you have the maximum of effect and variety produced by the simplest of means. Compare any of these methods of treating long hymns with the usual performance of every verse alike, and see which will best keep up the interest of all concerned. I have no fear as to your verdict.

Clericus.—It sounds all very nice, but who is to tell the people what and when to sing?

Laicus.—You have your Parish Magazine, and your notices at the Sunday services, and when a hymn is announced, a reminder may be added as to the singing of it. The vicar and the organist need only to take counsel as to the most effective arrangement, and then make it known. I don't expect the first few performances will pass off without a hitch. That leading boy of yours with the inconveniently keen sense of humour, will find something funny in standing silent for a verse, and the strenuous efforts of a lady a few yards down the nave will provide him with material on which to exercise his imitative faculties for the rest of the week. But things will soon settle down, and after a few months a tradition will be established.

Another way of adding to the interest of hymn-singing is the revival of some of the old settings of psalm-tunes with the melody in the tenor. The 'English Hymnal' contains a few specimens—'Dundee,' 'Old Hundredth,' 'Bristol,' and 'Winchester Old.' I have heard these sung without the people being one whit confounded by the faux-bourdon of the boys. The arrangement should be used for only a few verses, and it is well to strengthen the tenor part by the addition of the first basses, if they can be spared. Of course the verses so treated should be sung unaccompanied. The effect is very fresh and at the same time ecclesiastical. I wish some enterprising editor and publisher would put their heads together and give us a selection from the old psalm-books. There must be many excellent settings buried. If anything of the sort is done, it would be well to include adaptations for such as do not wish to retain the old 'gathering-note.'

Auctor.—All this is very fine, but do you think that the average choir, which finds its time well filled in preparing services and anthems, is likely to have any to spare over such small fry as hymn-tunes?

Laicus.—I fear that they must be prepared to sacrifice themselves a little for the common good.

Auctor.—I can see them at it! No, sir, the increase of unison singing, and the general simplification of the music will lead to trouble. Resignations will fall on the vicar and organist like leaves in autumn.

Laicus.—Arising out of that remark, as they say in the House, may I ask who selects the music for the average parish church?

Clericus.—Usually the organist, while the vicar retains a right of veto.

Laicus.—A good arrangement, if it could be carried out. As a matter of fact, however, the choice is ultimately that of the choir. Many a vicar and organist is restrained from doing what he feels best for the music of his particular church by the fear of his choirmen. Their interest must be maintained, they must have opportunities of showing what they can do: too much unison-singing will damage their precious voices, and so on. The result is a type of chorister who comes to church when there is interesting music to sing—or at least music interesting to him—and stays away at other times. I know of more than one church where you shall find the whiterobed ministers of song in full force, well primed with voice-pastilles, for the due performance of Gounod or some such toothsome morsel, but a scant attendance when Merbecke or some other congregational setting is down.

Organicus.—Well, you can hardly expect a man with a good voice to take much interest in music where his voice, training, and musical skill have no scope.

Laicus.—Not if he is a choirman first and a churchman a long—a very long—way after. I should like some such test as the following to be applied:

the music for three months to be simple, though of course good of its kind. Let as much pains be spent on its preparation as would ordinarily be devoted to what I have heard clergy irreverently describe as 'Figgins in Q.' At the end of the term you would have lost some of your choir and some of your congregation. But you would not have lost one keen churchman. We shall never get the right kind of material in our choir until every member of it, asked whether if he were not in the choir stalls he would be in the body of the church, can honestly answer 'Yes.' They need to be taught that they are merely members of the congregation, sitting in a special place for convenience' sake, and doing a bit of church work. I wonder what Clericus would say if Miss Acidula Tombs, who is a district visitor, should decide that she could no longer act as such because the particular street allotted to her was not sufficiently interesting—'The people are not of the type I like. The architecture of Tippins's Mews also offends me. I must therefore in future be allowed to transfer my activities to the more congenial Acacia Road, or I must cease to be a district visitor.' Would Clericus weakly give way?

Clericus.—I should smile!

Laicus.—Exactly. And if Acidula is of the right sort, I can see Tippins's Mews still brightened by her weekly visits. If she is of the kind to resign, you and Tippins are well rid of her. Now when you and your clerical brethren are prepared to deal just as firmly (though tactfully, of course) with Acidula's brother who is pardonably proud of a light tenor voice, but who has been known to absent himself when a solo that he had hitherto regarded as his own special tit-bit was given to another, or when music that he considered dull was to be sung, you may really claim to be governing your church-workers and choosing the music. At present your choirmen choose it.

Auctor.—But what of the congregation? Don't you think that they will also resent the simplifying of the service music?

Laicus.—Here and there you will meet a member of the flock who wants a sacred concert without paying more than a penny or a button for it, but I am sure that the majority will not repine—always provided (1st) that the simple music is as well done as was the elaborate, and (2nd) that they are encouraged to take a bigger part in the singing themselves. Simple music cannot have a fair trial till it has pains spent on it. We want in our services more simple things done well, and fewer ambitious things maltreated. As to the effect of the type of music on attendance, I fancy there is little in it. I could take you to several London churches where there is a good choir, elaborate music, and a sparse attendance, and to just as many where the music is simple and the congregation large. Similarly, it would be easy to find dozens of cases where the reverse holds good. On the other hand, it will not be so easy to find a church where there is good preaching and a poor attendance, so that it looks very much as if the pulpit is a bigger factor than the organ loft. Harking back to what I was saying just now about antiphonal singing by choir and congregation, I was about to add, when I began to wander, that excellent opportunities for this are provided by some settings of the evening canticles recently published by Novello, and edited by Messrs. S. Royle Shore and Francis Burgess. They consist of alternate unison and faux-bourdon verses. The former should be sung by the congregation, and the latter by the choir unaccompanied. The effect of this is admirable. Although the harmonies of the faux-bourdon verses are simple, the proper free rendering of them, keeping of pitch, and blending of voices, provide work much more profitable to a choir than some of the indifferent 'settings' which they have been fed upon for so long. I gather that at lectures given by Mr. Royle Shore, the audience have sung these settings readily.

There are some splendid specimens of ecclesiastical harmony in the faux-bourdon verses. Hear this from Tallis:

Ex. 1.

and this from Orlando Gibbons:

Now I am quite in sympathy with the natural desire of an organist to give a fine choir a chance of edifying the congregation. It is good for everybody concerned that they should develop their powers and use them in the church. But I would respectfully submit that the time has come when they might reduce their elaborate and too often somewhat secular service-music in favour of something simpler, and devote their skill to giving us extra-liturgical performances of some of the great store of beautiful sacred music that is so far unknown to the average layman. These performances, in the case of shorter works, might form part of an organ recital, or (that the tail might for a change wag the dog) they might be given as choir-recitals, with a couple of organ solos by way of relief. What an improvement in the musical taste of both choir and congregation would result from the performance in this manner of such works as Gibbons's 'Hosanna to the Son of David,' Wesley's noble 'Let us now lift up our hands,' or a Bach cantata! Our choirs would be just as busily employed—even more so—and they would be spending their energies on fine music instead of, as is too often the case now, complacent platitudes strung together for purely commercial reasons.

I observe Organicus stealthily consulting his watch, so I must not attempt to develop several other points. They must remain up my sleeve until we meet again. I will content myself with saying that I have not overlooked the fact that the Compleat Congregational Songster cannot come into being without some trouble on his part. This brings us to Congregational Practices.

Ah!

Dr. W. H. Hadow, in a pamphlet on 'Hymn Tunes,' published for the Church Music Society by Humphrey Milford, Amen Corner, draws attention to the neglect of many fine hymn-tunes in favour of melodies of weak or trivial character. While there will be those among his readers who will chafe at the casting down of some of their idols, they will find it difficult to deny the force of the author's contentions. There are two useful appendices, the first of which collates the 1875 and 1904 editions of A. & M., the 'English Hymnal' and the 'Oxford Hymnal' in regard to standard tunes. Guidance is given as to the various versions by the use of varied type. A glance at these columns shows the last two hymnals to have taken a bold line in restoring the old forms of some of our finest tunes. (We note a misprint in column I, page 16, where the 1875 A. & M. number of 'Wareham' should be 63, not 263.) Appendix II. suggests tunes for well-known hymns. The pamphlet, both by virtue of its subject and treatment, should be studied by every clergyman and choirmaster.

The Grail music from 'Parsifal' was performed on November 10 at Southwark Cathedral, on the occasion of the annual Festival Service of the Southwark Diocesan branches of the Queen Victoria Clergy Fund and Clergy Pensions Institution.

Nearly fifty choirs were represented at the forty-first Annual Festival of the London Church Choir Association, held in St. Paul's Cathedral on November 12. The anthem was Wesley's 'Praise the Lord, O my soul.' Mr. Charles Macpherson conducted, and Mr. Gerald Bullivant was at the organ.

Correspondence.

THE UNIFICATION OF FINGERING.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—It is evident from the correspondence that all agree as to the absurdity of having two notations for keyboard fingering. My only object in writing is to try to unify the keyboard fingering with that used by stringed instrument players all over the world. Therefore there is a strong claim for what is known as the English fingering x, 1, 2, 3, 4; and may I point out that string players have not yet been so foolish as to have contradictory fingerings. It is not a question of origin or patriotism; but the present is an opportune time to be firm, and give up aping the long-haired foreigner any longer. Chords and interval sound the same anywhere, but to call the third finger the fourth, and the little finger the fifth, seems only fit for lunatic asylum. Theory without practice will not always work, and as a teacher of more violin than organ pupils, can testify to the great annoyance of this inane contradiction of signs.

Obituary.

A GLADLY MADE CORRECTION.

In our last issue, in accordance with the positive report circulated, we announced the death of Willem Mengelberg. We are now glad to hear that the injury received by the celebrated conductor was not so very serious, and that he hopes soon to resume his work.

We regret to record the following deaths:

CHARLES E. RUBE, hon. treasurer of the Royal Academy of Music, on October 30, aged sixty-one. By his untimely removal the Royal Academy of Music loses a prominent and sincerely-esteemed member of its Committee of Management. His staunch devotion to this Institution and the constant care bestowed upon its interests—artistic and financial—were unceasing, even during the long illness which deprived his colleagues of his ever-welcome presence. Charles Rube was a genuine lover of music in all its departments, and liberal with his time as with his money on its behalf. His annual prize for quartet-playing is greatly appreciated by the string-students of the Royal Academy of Music. The busy man also found leisure to serve as a member of the Associated Board of the two leading music schools, whose meetings his quick perception and valuable advice were of the greatest advantage. He was a member of the Worshipful Company of Musicians and of the Council of the Royal Choral Society.

FRANK LAND, formerly the leading baritone of the Arthur Rousbey Opera Company, at Limerick, on November 10. He was born at Clonmel, county Tipperary, in 1859. He joined Rousbey in 1889, and toured with the Company till 1897.

CHARLES HENDERSON, timpanist of the London Symphony Orchestra, on November 2. He was long known as one of the leading members of his branch of the profession.

JEAN BAPTISTE FAURÉ, the famous French baritone, at the age of eighty-four.

BRIGHTON MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

Having left London in a gloomy darkness on November 10, it was a relief to find oneself in streets with brightly-lighted shop-windows and preserving the general air of 'business as usual.' True, the sea-front at Brighton was as ink as Langham Place; the piers were invisible, only a few arc lights prevented one from walking into the rails which both separate the footway from the road and prevent the passenger from plunging headlong from the promenade on to the foreshore. But the front was not the attraction. The Dome, that queer survival of Hanoverian Orientalism, was the goal towards which all steps were turned. Seven concerts were to be given there, a Festival beginning on Tuesday night with 'Elijah,' ending on Saturday night with 'Messiah,' and including between these stalwart bulwarks orchestral music ranging from Debussy and Stravinsky to the modest efforts of two young lady composers, other music by honoured veterans of the profession in England,—Sir Hubert Parry, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Sir Charles Stanford, and Sir Frederick Bridge,—liberal selections from Tchaikovsky,—the 'Pathetic Symphony,' part of the Violin concerto, and songs,—and still more liberal ones from Wagner, including Act 3 of 'Lohengrin' and the last two Acts of 'Parsifal.'

Mr. Lyell-Tayler, musical director to the Corporation, had devised this Festival. He had planned the programme so as to include things which would appeal to every, or nearly every, kind of musical taste; he had brought down seven guest-conductors to conduct either their own works or those which are famous in their répertoires. Besides the four composers just named were Sir Henry Wood, who directed 'Elijah' and orchestral selections from Wagner; Mr. Thomas Beecham, who gave a programme of strenuous modern music; Mr. Landon Ronald, who made the audience revel with him in the luscious sentiments of Tchaikovsky. It was Mr. Lyell-Tayler, however, who brought the material of the Municipal Choir and Orchestra into shape for the visitors to work upon, and himself conducted 'Lohengrin,' 'Parsifal,' and 'Messiah.' Before touching upon details we must congratulate him and all who worked with him upon the spirit of the undertaking at such a difficult moment, and the remarkable skill with which it was carried out in every direction.

The choir made the first and the strongest impression in 'Elijah.' We have been used to talk with pride of our Northern choirs, but we may begin to have some for our Southern ones. The Brighton choir has the alertness and spring, together with a certain incisiveness of quality, which we have been used to associate with the North. It has not a great weight of tone (the singers number about 300), but that hardly matters. What impressed us most was the readiness to turn from one type of expression to another. The chorus 'Behold, God the Lord passed by' was a conspicuous instance. Sir Henry Wood's treatment of 'Elijah' is never conventional or humdrum; it is occasionally eccentric, but in every choral number he got broad effects from this choir ranging from the savagery of the Baal choruses to great tenderness in 'He watching over Israel.' The one never degenerated into blatancy nor the other into sentimentality, faults of which the solo parts were not entirely free. These latter were undertaken by Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Doris Manuelle, Mr. Gwynne Davies, and Mr. Herbert Heyner. The contralto and the tenor lacked the wide experience of the other two, and Miss Manuelle, who made her first appearance at the Promenade Concerts recently, was probably singing the part for the first time in a performance on a Festival scale. When her style grows up to the level of her vocal abilities she should be a valuable addition to the ranks of oratorio singers.

The Municipal Orchestra was not quite strong enough to balance the choir; but on Wednesday night, under Mr. Thomas Beecham, the players showed their mettle in their playing of Debussy's 'Printemps,' Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Antar,' Stravinsky's Suite from 'L'Oiseau de feu,' and Delius's 'Dance Rhapsody,' none of which had been given in Brighton before, and which must have been almost as strangely new to some of the players as they evidently were to the majority of the audience. Stravinsky's work, most difficult of all, was extraordinarily well played. A little rest was provided in the middle of the programme by Miss Doris Woodall's singing of Liddle's 'Abide with me.'

Thursday contained two concerts, afternoon and evening. Whereas Mr. Beecham had had the difficult task of piloting the orchestra through strange country, Mr. Landon Ronald had the almost more difficult one of making them take a new route through a familiar one. The players were inclined to search out the tracks which they had been used to follow. In other words, they had played Tchaikovsky dozens of times before under their own conductor, and had considerable difficulty in responding to the very individual requirements of the newcomer; but he made them trust him. No doubt with more time Mr. Landon Ronald could have suggested improvements to Mr. Harold Ketelbey, the leader, who played the solo part of the first movement in the Violin concerto conscientiously. The day began with Miss Edith Swebstone's 'Two scenes from the Morte d'Arthur,' which Mr. Lyell-Tayler conducted sympathetically. The two scenes remind one of many things besides the 'Morte d'Arthur,' but they are thoughtfully written. Sir Charles Stanford followed with his fourth Irish Rhapsody, the Ulster one produced this year at the Philharmonic.

In the evening the choir had a chance of letting themselves go in Sir Frederick Bridge's ballad 'The battle of the Clampherdown' and of showing subtler qualities in the last Act of 'Lohengrin' under their own able conductor. In this Act the solo-singers were Miss Mabel Bartlett (Elsa), Miss Gertrude Pitcher (Ortrud), Mr. John Booth (Lohengrin), and Mr. Frederic Austin (The King). The last-named was at his best in the final Scene from 'Die Walküre,' given earlier. Between these two Wagner extracts came the one new work written for the Festival, a short Symphonic-poem for orchestra in two linked movements by Sir Hubert Parry. It is called 'From death to life,' and consists of a lament and a section called 'Consolation.' Its importance rests upon the lofty beauty of the first slow movement and the fact that its thought has been directly suggested by the War. The second part recalls the quick-step march with which a regimental band leaves the soldier's grave. After all, it says, life does not stop because death intervenes; the latter is but an incident. There was also a little Scherzo by Miss Ethel Scarborough which the composer conducted.

The remaining concerts consisted of Wagner and Handel. How surprised Wagner would have been by the association, and the discovery that his music has become to the British public of the early 20th century what Handel's was to that of the late 18th! Sir Henry Wood conducted large extracts from 'The Ring' on Friday, and had the assistance of two solo-singers, Madame Gleeson-White and Mr. Webster Millar. Mr. Coates was the Parsifal, and Miss Carrie Tubb the Kundry on Saturday afternoon, and Mr. Lyell-Tayler conducted both the Saturday concerts. Altogether the Festival was as refreshing as was the keen air of the sea-front and the Downs. The music and the wind blew away some of the clouds of anxiety, and gave to many people a glimpse of the blue sky beyond.

The

Competition Festival Record

No. 77.

We are glad to note that in accordance with our plea that wherever possible the children's sections of competitive Festivals should be carried on, committees in several districts are exhibiting some activity in this direction. Glasgow is trying to arrange to hold children's competitions on May 1, and the Hon. Mrs. Serocold and her committee have also decided to hold the junior competitions at Macclesfield as usual in the spring. Coleraine (Ireland) is also busy arranging its children's programme for the end of May, and Failsworth will go on with its scheme already announced. Stratford (E. London), Cleveland and Durham, Plymouth, South and West London, Wharfedale (Ilkley), West Sussex (Chichester), and Hastings propose to carry on their full programme. Morecambe proposes to limit its Festival to two days (May 7 and 8).

The London Working Girls' Club Union is also going on with its old-established competition. The Federation of Girls' Clubs (London) will hold their Festival on March 20, and an embarrassingly large entry is anticipated.

The St. Cecilia Working Girls' Clubs are busy preparing for their Festival, which is to be held at Whitefield's Tabernacle on Saturday, December 12. Reading also announces a promising competition of girls' clubs to be held on May 8.

The Manchester and District Tonic Sol-fa Association is another body that has determined to go on with its work. It will hold a Festival on March 27.

In our last issue we reported the results of the Mansfield (Nottingham) Competition, and did not mention that Mr. A. T. Akeroyd was the adjudicator.

DR. COWARD ON PREPARING FOR A COMPETITION.

In his 'Choral technique and interpretation' (Novello & Co.), Dr. Coward gives some very useful advice as to the preparation for competition. He says:

THE PENALTY OF COMPETING.

The primary fact which should be burned into the mind of every competitor, from the conductor to the humblest member of the choir, is that trouble is inevitable. This trouble may be taken before or after the event. If taken before, it assumes the form of hard work and self-sacrifice. If competitors refuse to take it in this form they get trouble all the same, only it comes after the event in the shape of disappointment and chagrin which may rankle for years. Therefore, let each competitor be prepared to take just the kind of trouble which he or she is called upon to bear, and not begin the slacker's whine that if it had only been some other kind, of burden or pinch they would have borne it without a murmur. Really there should not be a murmur, because if anyone goes into a competition in the right spirit, the doing, striving, and working are the pleasant features of the whole business, just as the exhausting efforts in hockey, tennis, football, and cricket are the joy of the sport. Therefore let the point of view be, Work with pleasure, and the outcome will be the pleasure with the work.

HOW TO ACHIEVE SUCCESS.

The heartbreaking thing about many Societies is the 'Come easy, go easy' attitude of a large percentage of the members. In a competitive choir you stand on a different platform. You can regard inertia as non-existent, and can frame your plans on fighting lines. Therefore, as you have only to command and obedience is given, let the following be two of your working axioms:

- (a) Method is the secret of success;
- (b) Divide and conquer.

Do everything methodically in the sense that you know why you are doing it, and do not try to do too many things at once. First make sure of the music, then the words, then the expression, then the blend and balance of voices, the attack and release. Of course these things will be considered together, but let the emphasis be placed on each point in turn, so that it may not be overlooked.

HOW TO MASTER THE MUSIC.

To accomplish this in the minimum of time it is essential that the conductor be absolutely familiar with every note before the rehearsals begin. I do not know whether it be telepathy, sympathy, or what, but if a conductor knows the work, somehow the choir learns it in half the time, although he may say little and correct less frequently than if he did not know the work well.

Therefore he should obtain the music at the earliest moment and play it over—or better, get someone else to play it—a dozen times. Personally I find a score of times preferable. This is to get a subconscious grasp of the key progressions and a sense of the harmonic structure. Meanwhile he should sing each part in succession and put a circle round every difficult interval for reference at rehearsal. Specially hard or strange transitions and unusual discords should be played over and over again till they have sunk into his inner consciousness. With this equipment, and concurrent independent study of the words, he will be prepared to begin rehearsals.

THE LATE MR. HARRY EVANS.

This is the first opportunity I have had of referring to Harry Evans, whose premature death on July 23 removed a musician of great attainments and still greater promise. Many of our musicians have found their way from small and humble beginnings to positions of importance, and not a few could be mentioned who have equalled Harry Evans in his accomplishment as a choir-trainer, and still more as a composer. But it was as a conductor that he achieved exceptional distinction, and though he lived to make the Welsh Choral Union known far beyond the boundaries of Liverpool, it was the opinion of many who knew him that he had by no means reached the summit of his career. For reasons into which it would take us too long to enter, British conductors have hitherto not, as a general rule, been a brilliant success, but Harry Evans was a prominent exception. He had, as a typical Welshman, the fire which is lacking in most Anglo-Saxons, he had also a far wider outlook than most of his countrymen, he was in equal sympathy with choral and orchestral music, and he possessed the genial, sympathetic, enthusiastic temperament that is so essential to a leader of men. Those who were present at the first and only Festival, at Liverpool, of the Musical League, will not soon forget how brilliantly he accomplished the task of conducting a number of complex, difficult new orchestral works by young and ambitious composers, a feat which well deserved the public tribute paid to it by Sir Edward Elgar on that occasion. Combining, as he did, the virtues of a first-rate choir-trainer and a really able conductor, he may without exaggeration be said to have occupied a unique position among British musicians, and for the present it seems impossible that his place can be filled.—Mr. Herbert Thompson in the Yorkshire Post.

MUSIC IN WAR-TIME.

On November 3 Mr. H. C. Colles read a paper at the first meeting of the Musical Association on 'Music in War-time.' He said that musicians had been conscious lately that they had become less interesting to their fellows than they normally were, and many found, though perhaps ashamed to confess it, that music itself interested them less than it used to do. Yet music remained and musicians remained, and the question was 'What were we going to do with them?'

For many years past this country had trained a large body of men and women exclusively for the purpose of making music. It had given them no other training through which they could make a living; it had encouraged them by scholarships, by funds for performing the works of young composers, and by societies for bringing out young performers, to believe that they had only got to make themselves efficient and then to display their powers before the public to get the appreciation and the rewards which their talents merited. But while we had taken the education of our musicians tremendously seriously, we had never quite taken the results of the education seriously. We had cultivated a race of specialists and not given them sufficient opportunity for exercising their special talents. At the best of times the practice of music had been a hand-to-mouth business, and in a time of stress like the present the hand did not even reach the mouth.

The result had been that the artists—the composers and the performers—had been continually preying upon another branch of the profession, the teachers. One might maintain that all professionalism was economically and artistically wrong, but one could not maintain that it was economically and artistically right, first to create the professional artist, and then condemn him to a life of worry about the perpetual difficulty of making two ends meet. He (the lecturer) knew of cases where the strain of teaching exercised a deleterious effect upon artistic efforts, with the result of waste all round. There was need for those who knew the inestimable value of art to press it home to people who did not know it. As we had failed to do so in season, we must now tackle it out of season.

As soon as war was declared there was a general cancelling of musical engagements all over the country. The public felt no responsibility towards the artist. But the war had not really created this situation; it had only brought into glaring prominence the economic weakness of one which had been created years ago by our shiftless, haphazard way of supposing that artistic employment would make itself.

Then there was the relation of the musical artist to the musical tradesmen. The latter, as part of their trade, had taken up a large part of the duty of providing the artist with a livelihood which others had refused to recognise. They had financed concerts, they had paid fees to artists to play on pianofortes of their manufacture, they had paid them to sing into gramophones, and to write music which was not music but which would sell in their shops better than real music. The musician was only too glad to get the jobs they offered. They were quite honest jobs, but many of them, like the snatching of teaching, had a deteriorating effect upon the music produced. Those who wanted music for its own sake, who wanted it clean and healthy and aspiring to the best possible ends, viewed these relations of art and trade, and the need of the musician to make a livelihood through the trade, with constant suspicions and occasional dismay. These influences had to be kept at arm's length, and would be kept at arm's length if we could only cultivate a straighter attitude towards art, a finer appreciation of its real value and its real influence upon life, and if, consequently, we were as a country more prepared to pay for it.

Now that we had jumped from the frying pan into the fire, what were we to do? The musical trade was depressed, and could not hold out those opportunities which it had been holding out in peace. The only two things to do were to make work or to give money. The former way was the better, though it did not seem possible to make everyone recognise the fact that even needy artists would rather work for their living than take money for nothing. The Committee for Music in War-time and other societies were engaged in keeping an open door for music, pressing upon people the idea that it was worth while to think of things which were more permanent than the scraps of news and fiction which daily filtered through into the newspapers from the Front.

Our lack of system in this country was proverbial. It shocked to the very soul the sensibilities of our enemies, which was perhaps the best reason for maintaining it. He (the lecturer) did not hope much from carefully arranged systems either for meeting this particular crisis in the musical profession or for establishing a better state of things after the war, but he did believe in a gradual growth,—the way in which most of our best institutions had come into existence. It might be illogical, it might be foolish, but it happened to be the way in which this country generally succeeded in getting its wants satisfied. We must be content, for the moment, each to work at small sides of the great problem. Ultimately the war would help us. It would sweep away many of the luxuries of past years, and with them the foolish dalliance with music as an expensive toy. From that would come a more sincere, a simpler, and a purified art, and one which would spring more directly from our national consciousness.

London Concerts.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

The performance of 'Elijah' with which the Society opened its session on November 7 had been postponed from a previous date in order to test the popularity of an afternoon time. It is gratifying to record that the audience drawn was a remarkably good one, a fact that suggests that the plans of the future performances of the Society will be again altered in this direction. The choir displayed their wonted alertness and ease notwithstanding that the tempi generally were faster than usual. The chief soloists were Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Ada Crossley, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. F. Ranalow, and the supplementary quartet was Miss Coral Peachey, Miss Alys Gear (who gave a sympathetic interpretation of 'Woe unto them'), Mr. Walter Glynn, and Mr. Graham Smart. Sir Frederick Bridge conducted.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The 103rd season of this venerable but rejuvenated Society opened at Queen's Hall on November 4 in a novel and imposing manner. Conducted by Mr. George Miller, a company of 'musicians' of the 1st Life Guards played the 'Fanfare' for trumpets and drums composed by Sir Charles Stanford for the Delhi Durbar—a very effective piece of writing. The National Anthem was then given, and the programme proper opened under Mr. Thomas Beecham's conductorship. Debussy's 'Printemps,' an interesting piece that might profitably be performed more often, was heard with great favour. Two new movements by Cyril Scott—Passacaglias for orchestra on Irish tunes—illustrated the composer's characteristic methods of wedding elaborate and highly inappropriate chromatic harmonies to simple diatonic themes. Mr. Mark Hambourg was brilliant and forceful in Liszt's Hungarian Fantasia, and Madame Kirkby Lunn gave an admirable interpretation of Saint-Saëns's 'La Fiancée du Timbalier.' The Symphony was that of M. Saint-Saëns in C minor.

QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA.

The Saturday afternoon Symphony Concerts of this Orchestra opened on November 7 with an estimable programme that was dominated by Beethoven's 'Eroica' Symphony. Miss Isolde Menges interpreted Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto with her usual spirit and eloquence, and Dr. Walford Davies played the pianoforte part in his own 'Conversations.' These, which were produced at a recent Promenade Concert, deepened the impression then made of their ingenuity and musical interest.

THE PROMENADE CONCERTS.

Two British novelties remain to be added to the number that we have recorded in connection with this series. October 22 brought the first performance of Cyril Scott's 'Britain's war-march,' an interesting but not very stirring martial piece in which familiar melodies occur. On the last night of the season, October 24, 'Three Scottish dances,' by Algernon Ashton, written as pianoforte duets twenty years ago, were given for the first time in an orchestral version.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first of the series of concerts announced by this Orchestra took place on October 26 in the presence of Queen Alexandra, The Princess Royal, Princess Victoria, and a large audience. An institution dependent for its existence upon the support of the public can afford to take no risks, especially under present circumstances, and the programme was unadventurous to critical eyes. However, Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony, under M. Savonov's direction, showed again its power to draw the public in large numbers and to arouse enthusiasm to a high pitch. The programme also contained a Symphony by Haydn in E flat, Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in F for violin, flute, oboe, trumpet, and string orchestra, and Beethoven's second 'Leonora' Overture.

Brahms's fourth Symphony was the most considerable work played at the concert on November 9, but Tchaikovsky's four-movement Serenade for strings (Op. 48) was the chief success of the evening. Under M. Savonov's direction it was exquisitely performed, and doubtless surprised many with its attractiveness. Among the great number of neglected Pianoforte concertos, that of Rubinstein in G, No. 3, which Miss Vera Brock played on this occasion, is not one of the most worthy, in spite of excitingly brilliant passages. Berlioz's 'Carneval Romain' Overture completed the programme.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.

With enthusiasm that merits the highest praise Miss Gwynne Kimpton has embarked on a new series of her excellent Orchestral Concerts for Young People. These are being held as usual at Æolian Hall on Saturday afternoons. The first took place on October 24, when Miss Kimpton conducted Mozart's 'Figaro' Overture, Haydn's Symphony in G (No. 13), Roger Quilter's Three English Dances, Mendelssohn's Violin concerto, with Miss Marjorie Hayward as soloist, and two of Stanford's 'Sea songs,' interpreted by Mr. Herbert Heyner. Mr. Stewart Macpherson gave a short preliminary lecture on the Symphony for the benefit of those of the audience who came as students.

CLASSICAL CONCERT SOCIETY.

The performance of Dr. Ernest Walker's Five songs from 'England's Helicon' for four solo voices and pianoforte, Op. 10, was the chief feature of a varied programme given by this Society on October 21. The singers, Miss Edith McCullagh, Miss Emily Thornfield, Mr. John Adams, and Mr. J. Campbell McInnes, were also heard in Brahms's 'Zigeunerlieder.' Miss Thornfield gave a group of songs, and Miss Johanne Stockmarr a selection of pianoforte pieces.

The English String Quartet supplied a programme for the concert on October 28 at Bechstein Hall. They played Schubert's String quartet in G major, Op. 161, and, with Mr. Ernest Tomlinson as second viola, Mozart's String quintet in E flat. Mr. Plunket Greene sang Somervell's cycle 'Maud,' accompanied by Mr. S. Liddle.

On November 18 the programme included Bach's A major Violin sonata, No. 2, Brahms's E minor Violoncello sonata, and Beethoven's E flat major Pianoforte trio, with Miss Fanny Davies as pianist, Miss Jelly d'Arányi as violinist, and Madame Guilhermina Suggia as violoncellist.

LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY.

The first concert of the season given by this Society on November 9 was happily adapted to the needs of the moment. The programme included Mrs. Margaret Meredith's setting of Kipling's 'Recessional'; Stanford's five 'Songs of the Fleet,' sung by Mr. Thorpe Bates; songs given by Mr. John Coates, including his own 'Rally-Call'; and, among the rest, a novel and interesting item in the shape of six sea-chanties, used by British sailors in the Far East, as arranged by Mr. Arthur Fagge. The choir performed its work throughout with characteristic spirit and capability under Mr. Fagge's direction. The concert was well attended, and the programme was received with great favour.

A memorable patriotic concert was given at the Albert Hall on October 24, in aid of the St. John Ambulance Association. The programme was supplied by the Royal Choral Society, the Queen's Hall Orchestra, and massed Military Bands of the Brigade of Guards, with Sir Frederick Bridge, Sir Henry Wood, and Lieut. Dr. J. Mackenzie Rogan as conductors, Madame Patti, and a group of well-known artists. Madame Miura, a Japanese vocalist, earned great applause with her singing of Verdi's 'Caro nome.' The King and Queen and a brilliant suite were present.

Madame Clara Butt gave a highly successful concert at Queen's Hall on November 1, assisted by Mr. Kennerley Rumford, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and the Queen's Hall Orchestra under Sir Henry Wood. It was announced that the receipts of the concert amounted to £350, and that the profit was to be devoted to funds in aid of artists and musicians who were suffering by the War.

Chausson's Double Concerto for pianoforte, violin, and string quartet was the chief number in the programme of the Royal Academy of Music Students' Concert at Queen's Hall on November 2. A Pianoforte sonata by Alec Rowley was given for the first time.

The Royal College of Music gave a students' orchestral concert on November 3 under the direction of Sir Charles Stanford. Mr. Topliss Green (vocalist) and Master George Whitaker (violin) appeared with success, and Mr. A. L. Benjamin's setting of Masfield's 'Captain Stratton's Fancy,' with orchestral accompaniment, was given for the first time, with Mr. Samuel Mann as vocalist. The programme included Beethoven's fourth Symphony.

Students' Chamber Concerts given by the College on November 5 and 19 gave additional proof of effective teaching.

A matinée organized by Miss Elizabeth Asquith in aid of the Arts Fund, and given at Covent Garden on November 5, was of particular interest to the musical, as it provided a stage performance of Bach's 'Phœbus and Pan.' The solid humour of the piece was admirably interpreted by Mr. Maurice d'Oisy (Phœbus), Mr. Harry Reynolds (Pan), Miss Edna Thornton (Mercurius), Mr. John Coates (Midas), Mr. Frank Mullings, and Miss Eveline Matthews. The Beecham Orchestra, under Mr. Thomas Beecham, did good service in the 'comic operetta,' in an independent selection, and in the Ballet 'Le Carnaval,' danced by Miss Lydia Kyasht with a Russian company.

The recital given by Miss Helene Dolmetsch at Æolian Hall on November 14, in aid of the Belgian Relief Fund, made a contrast with the stirring note of current concert-giving. 16th- and 17th-century instrumental music, discreetly executed, made the bulk of the programme. Miss Dolmetsch played both the viol da gamba and the violoncello—the former in Bach's G minor Sonata, with Miss Dorothy Moggridge as pianist.

A series of concerts in London and the provinces has been organized by three Belgian musicians—M. Désiré Defauw (violin), M. Joseph Jongen (pianoforte) and Madame Weber-Delacre (vocalist) for the benefit of the Queen of the Belgians' Relief Fund. The first, which took place at Æolian Hall on November 16, attracted a large audience and proved highly interesting. Chausson's Concerto for violin, pianoforte, and double string quartet, with which it opened, is a work of great beauty and originality, and in it M. Defauw showed himself a violinist of very high rank. Madame Weber-Delacre was heard in César Franck's 'Panis Angelicus' and Debussy's 'The blessed Damsel.' The programme, in which Miss Lilian Lambert also assisted as vocalist, ended with Belgian folk-songs. The small choir and orchestra that took part performed their work effectively.

A War Emergency Entertainments scheme has been set on foot by Lady Helmsley, Miss Elizabeth Asquith, and Mr. Gordon Selfridge, who have brought an influential committee together. The object is, by concert-giving, to help to supply work for artists. The first concert took place on November 17 with a high measure of success.

The annual prize-giving concert at the Guildhall School of Music took place on October 31, and provided an excellent illustration of the value of the work carried out at the School. The principal prizes were awarded to Miss Gladys Hildersley, Miss Hilda Sparksman, Miss Nellie Walker, M. Godowski, Miss Phyllis Harding, Miss Rebe Kussmann, Miss Dorothy Waring, Miss Margaret Harrison, Miss Elsie Cohen, Miss Irene Alexander, Miss Phyllis Hay, Miss Phyllis Dicksee, and Miss Lilian Stiles-Allen.

A Belgian programme was arranged for the South Place Sunday Popular Concert on November 8. M. Joseph Jongen took part as pianist in his Quartet in E flat, Op. 23, for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, which was given for the first time in London. The programme also included Lekeu's G minor Sonata for pianoforte and violin, played by Madame and M. Désiré Defauw.

We regret that we can do no more than mention the excellent series of patriotic concerts that are given weekly at Kingsway Hall and the Crystal Palace. The former are directed by Mr. Frank Idle and the latter by Mr. Walter W. Hedgcock, in conjunction with the conductors of various well-known military bands.

Suburban Concerts.

The People's Palace Choral and Orchestral Societies opened their season on November 7. The programme consisted of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha,' of which a most excellent performance was given. The choir, which now numbers 250 voices, sang with precision, warmth of tone, and much expressive effect. The soloists were Miss Mary Leighton, Mr. Gwynne Davies, and Mr. Frederick Ranalow, all of whom sang with fine dramatic feeling. Mr. E. O'Brien led the orchestra, Mr. Herbert Hodge was at the organ, and Mr. Frank Idle conducted.

Numerous students of Upper Tooting College of Music took part in a concert given at Balham Assembly Rooms in aid of the Prince of Wales's Fund, on October 21. The concert was under the direction of Mr. Allan Brown.

Mrs. Mary Layton gave her annual pupils' concert on October 15, at the Fulham Town Hall. An important feature of the evening was the singing of the Belgian, French, and Russian National Anthems, the last being sung to an Esperanto version of the well-known hymn, 'God, the All-terrible.' 'La Brabançonne' and 'La Marseillaise' were impressively sung by a Belgian lady pupil, Madame Lermite, who also sang French songs by Delius and Hahn. The programme also included a selection from Rossini's 'Stabat Mater,' Liszt's psalm 'By the waters of Babylon,' and songs by Laurent de Kille, Wostenholme, and Elgar. There was a very large audience, and a collection was taken during the evening for the Belgian Relief Fund.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BELFAST.

The committee of the Philharmonic Society wisely decided to carry on their work during this season, in spite of the depletion of male members.

The Society's first concert took place on November 3, and the programme, for chorus and orchestra, included the National Anthems of Japan, Russia, Belgium, France, and England, and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Bon-bon Suite' (with one number omitted). Mr. Ivor Foster was the soloist in the latter. The other principal attractions were M. Arthur de Greef's finished and inspiring work on the pianoforte, and Miss Gertrude Fuller's violin playing. The choir and orchestra did good credit to the careful training of Mr. E. Godfrey Brown, the Society's conductor.

Dr. Caradog Roberts has succeeded the late Mr. Harry Evans as director of music at the University College of North Wales, Bangor.

BIRMINGHAM.

Now that our Town Hall is again free for the purpose of concert engagements, matters musical are assuming their normal aspect to a certain extent. The first concert given was that of the Birmingham Festival Choral Society in aid of the Prince of Wales's National Fund, which took place in the afternoon on October 31. The work performed was 'Elijah,' the principals being Madame Agnes Nicholls, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Robert Radford, who rendered most artistic help, the whole performance being one of the most impressive and noble ever heard at Birmingham. The singing of the choir was a special feature, and to Dr. Sinclair, the conductor, in a measure we are indebted for the great success achieved. It should also be mentioned that Mr. C. W. Perkins was the organist as usual.

On October 27 the Catterall Quartet, in conjunction with the Birmingham Chamber Concerts Society, gave their first chamber concert of the season in the New Gallery of the Royal Society of Artists, and upheld their growing reputation as one of our most finished quartet parties.

Mr. Max Mossel has after all been able to arrange to give his customary series of four Drawing-Room Concerts, the first of which took place at the newly reconstructed Grosvenor Room of the Grand Hotel on November 5. The principal share of the programme was assigned to Miss Irene Scharrer, the charming pianist, who is a great favourite here, and the gifted vocalist, Miss Carmen Hill. Miss Maud Delstauche, a capable Belgian violinist, was heard in Handel's Sonata in D major, No. 4.

The Birmingham Police held their annual concerts at the Hippodrome on Friday afternoon and evening, November 6, the proceeds, probably exceeding £250, being handed to the Prince of Wales's Fund. The Police Band supplied the instrumental portion of the two programmes under the able conductorship of Bandmaster Inspector Henry Cannon. The vocalists were Miss Emily Breare, Madame Doris Woodall, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Stewart Gardner.

The Birmingham Choral Union, so ably conducted by Mr. Richard Wassell, gave their first concert of the season at the Town Hall on November 7. They gave a revival of Goring Thomas's cantata the 'Swan and the Skylark,' originally produced at our Triennial Musical Festival in 1894, a year and a-half after the composer's death. Its melodic and sympathetic strains strongly appealed to the large 'popular' audience present, the whole work being well performed. The principal parts were sung by Miss Beatrice Vernon, Miss Amy Carter, Mr. Ernest Ludlow, and Mr. Alfred D. Butler. Mr. Wassell's superb Male-Voice Choir contributed several items given with splendid tone-power and precision. Mr. Nat Bishop, a well-known bass, sang with effect Sargeant's 'Blow, blow, thou wintry wind.' The second Act of Gounod's 'Faust' was also in the programme. Mr. C. W. Perkins was the organist.

Two Matinées Musicales were given by Madame Minadiou at the Repertory Theatre on November 10 and 12, in aid of the Birmingham Prince of Wales's Fund, the Theatre being crowded on both occasions. The programmes concluded with a patriotic finale for chorus and orchestra, the music to which was specially written by Mr. Bernard Jackson.

The Birmingham Choral and Orchestral Association's first concert of the season, held in the Town Hall, November 14, was specially interesting, as it provided the first performance of the late Alfred R. Gaul's posthumous work 'The Bard of Avon,' a Shakespearean suite for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra, orchestrated by Mr. Julius Harrison. In its simplicity and melodiousness the work is characteristic of the composer. Mr. Joseph H. Adams conducted with his customary watchfulness. Madame Aimée Wathen-Cole was the solo soprano, and Mr. Richard Ripley sang the tenor solos. The second part of the programme consisted of Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise.' Mr. C. W. Perkins gave valuable help by his judicious organ-playing.

Although the season of the Alexandra Palace Choral Society was cancelled owing to the occupation of the Palace for national purposes, the work of the choir is proceeding, we are glad to note, as far as circumstances permit. Rehearsals are being held under Mr. Allen Gill at the Crouch End Picture House.

BOURNEMOUTH.

It has been effectively shown at Bournemouth what an opportunity is now present for British artists to destroy the legend of their necessary inferiority to musicians from the Continent. Miss Agnes Nicholls gave a recital on October 21; a concert was given by Madame Ada Crossley on October 24; and a joint recital was given by Miss Phyllis Lett and Miss Irene Scharrer on November 7. These are names that stand for the highest artistic endeavour, and no foreign musicians could have aroused or more fully deserved the enthusiasm with which their efforts were received.

Other events have included a visit from Solomon, the wonderful little pianist. A Saturday evening orchestral concert on October 31 was markedly popular as an expression of national feelings. Mr. Denis O'Neill's Irish songs were warmly acclaimed, and Mr. George Stone, a local comedian, also won favour. On November 11 Mr. Isadore de Lara gave a recital in aid of the 'War Emergency Entertainment Fund for the benefit of artists out of work'; on November 14 Mr. Max Darewski was heard with the orchestra in Saint-Saëns's G minor Pianoforte concerto. A Sunday evening concert in aid of the local War Fund was an innovation that justified itself: Mr. Pedro de Zulueta's singing was somewhat unequal in effect.

At the Symphony Concerts there has been much orchestral playing of a high order, in one or two items Mr. Dan Godfrey and his instrumentalists excelling themselves. Works of special interest to be recorded are Rachmaninov's E minor Symphony, Schubert's Symphony in C, Beethoven's fourth Symphony, Brahms's E minor Symphony, César Franck's Symphony, Elgar's 'Enigma' Variations, Stravinsky's 'Fireworks' Fantasia, and Borodine's 'Prince Igor' Overture. These last two were played for the first time at these concerts, and another first performance here was that of R. H. Walthew's 'Friend Fritz' Overture, which the composer himself conducted. The soloists have comprised Mr. Percy Frostick, who was rather overweighed in the Glazounov Violin concerto; Miss Adela Hamaton, who played Balakirev's expressive Pianoforte concerto (the first performance at Bournemouth); Miss May Mukle, whose interpretation of Davidov's melodious A minor Violoncello concerto (another 'first performance at these concerts') charmed all ears; Miss Madeline Royle, excellent in MacDowell's D minor Pianoforte concerto; and M. Albert Geloso (of Paris), whose peculiarly sweet tone and finished phrasing found a charming medium in Mozart's E flat Violin concerto.

The Monday 'Pops,' too, have shown a marked eclecticism, the scheme being recently as follows: October 19, Tchaikovsky programme; October 26, International programme (including two Flemish dances by Jan Blockx); November 2, Wagner programme; November 10, French music.

Mention must not be omitted of the annual opera week of the Moody-Manners Opera Company at the Theatre Royal and Opera House. We were only able to attend one performance, that of Benedict's old-fashioned 'Lily of Killarney.' The few vocal gems therein were ably delivered by the reliable soloists concerned, and the opera went reasonably well as a whole. Mr. Aylmer Buest conducted.

BRISTOL.

On October 28 a patriotic concert was held by the Bristol Choral Society at Colston Hall, and there was a numerous audience. The chorалists distinguished themselves in Stanford's 'The Revenge' and 'Last Post,' and in Elgar's 'Britain, ask of thyself,' and besides these stirring pieces they sang the English and French National Anthems. The proceedings also included Mackenzie's 'Britannia Overture,' played by a large orchestra, songs given by Miss Caroline Hatchard and Mr. Percy Heming, and 'Tipperary,' sung by Mr. Heming and the audience, with Mr. George Riseley (the conductor of the concert) at the organ. Colston Hall being required for a body of troops, the Society announced that they could not hold a second concert.

Prof. G. H. Leonard delivered a lecture on 'Patriotic songs, old and new' at Bristol Central Library on November 6, illustrations being supplied by the Choral Society of Bristol University, conducted by Mr. Cedric Bucknall.

The first Clifton Chamber Concert for the season was held at the Victoria Rooms on November 9. Brahms's Sextet in G (No. 2) and Tchaikovsky's Sextet in D minor were excellently interpreted by Messrs. Maurice Alexander and Albert Morgan (violin), Alfred Best and Edgar Hawke (viola), and Percy Lewis and Reginald Hunter (violoncello). Mr. Herbert Parsons gave pianoforte solos by Chopin.

Colston Hall was too small for all who desired to be present on November 12, when Madame Clara Butt gave a concert for the Work for Women Fund. In Mr. Kennerley Rumford's absence, Mr. Percy Heming sang in his stead, and there was a choir of 400 voices directed by Mr. George Riseley. Madame Butt delighted by her vocal display, and sang additional pieces in obedience to recalls. It was stated that the net proceeds of the concert handed to the fund were £500.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

PLYMOUTH.

The amalgamation of the 'Three Towns'—Plymouth, Devonport, and Stonehouse, came into effect on November 9. Of numerous concerts given for patriotic funds only a few can be mentioned. The Plymouth Orpheus Male Choir raised £120 for the Belgian Refugees on October 21 by an excellently-organized effort for which, with veritable inspiration, they secured the appearance of three Belgian refugee artists whose performances were of such high standard as to check any sense of excuse. The choir, conducted by Mr. David Parkes, sang their best in patriotic pieces, the chief of which was Elgar's 'The reveille.' On October 28, the choir of Moreton branch of the League of Young Patriots gave an entertainment; on November 4 the Belgian refugees were again the object of musical effort, when the Roman Catholic Boys' Brigade and others gave an excellent concert. Plymouth Guildhall Choir, conducted by Mr. H. Moreton, presented £67 to the Queen's Work for Women Fund as the result of a performance of Rossini's 'Stabat Mater' and a miscellaneous patriotic programme. An orchestra gave assistance, and the principal vocalists were Miss Mary Leighton, Madame Amy Dewhurst, Messrs. Frank Webster and Robert Chignell. The appealing patriotic chorus by P. E. Fletcher, 'For Empire and for King,' made instantaneous success. The Plymouth Orpheus Choir have also given several sacred concerts during the month.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

The management of the Torquay Pavilion deserve commendation for the excellent enterprise they have shown in sustaining the interest of the concerts. The Municipal Orchestra have given many and varied characteristic programmes, and the visits of Mr. Walter Hyde, Miss Dorothy Webster (a favourite contralto), and Mr. Mark Hambourg have been events of the month.

Exeter Amateur Operatic Society on October 25 were granted the use of the theatre for a sacred concert in aid of the County Fund, the theatre orchestra also giving their services. Mr. Allan Allen conducted. In aid of the Belgian Relief Fund Miss Barbara Battishill arranged an interesting concert at Exeter on October 28, to which M. Francis de Bourguignon, professor at the Brussels Conservatoire and Court pianist to the Queen of the Belgians, gave special character by his playing. Other contributors were Misses B. Battishill, E. Emerson, Dr. S. Gibbs, Mrs. Hall Parby (violin), and Dr. H. J. Edwards (pianoforte). Mr. Pendarves Trists' annual concert at Totnes in aid of the local Cottage Hospital on October 29 was specially successful. M. Debever played, and the miscellaneous programme was mainly patriotic.

CORNWALL.

The united choirs of the Methodist churches of the circuit gave a sacred concert at Camborne on October 18, conducted by Mr. J. E. Turner, in aid of the County Patriotic Fund, and on the 19th Helston U.M.C. Choir sang choruses and part-songs under the direction of Mr. W. W. Howlett. Gunnislake Male Choir, and the combined bands of Calstock and Harrowbarrow, worked for the County Fund with success at Gunnislake on October 21. Penzance Male Choir, conducted by Mr. Ernest White, were assisted in a concert for the same object at St. Ives on October 23 by Madame Leonie Syners (soprano), of Antwerp. Mr. A. E. Goodman conducted the Helston Male Choir in a good programme at Chynhale on October 23, when the Prince of Wales's Fund benefited. The County Fund again received a donation from St. Austell on November 13, when Miss Maria Yelland (contralto) and Mons. R. Debeur ('cellist), a Belgian refugee, were the chief performers.

DUBLIN.

Since the visit of the London Symphony Orchestra to Woodbrook Concert Hall in August last, when Mr. Hamilton Harty and Dr. Esposito shared the duties of conductor for the week, there has been nothing worthy of note until now.

The Chamber Music Recitals at the Royal Dublin Society commenced on November 2, with a pianoforte recital by M. de Greef, who was very warmly received.

On November 9, the London String Quartet played Quartets by Beethoven (Op. 59, No. 1, in F), Haydn (Op. 20, in D), and Dvorák (Op. 51, in E flat).

On November 16, Dr. Esposito gave a pianoforte recital, including in his programme Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 109, Schumann's 'Die Davidsbündler,' and two new pieces of his own, 'Remembrance' and 'A Village Fête.'

The Sunday Orchestral Concerts began on November 1 with a concert at which the members of the band, conductor, and soloists gave their services free, and the proceeds, which amounted to £28 1s. 7d., were sent to the Prince of Wales's Fund. The programme included Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite, and some pieces by Jarnefelt, Auber, and Saint-Saëns. The soloists were Madame Borel (soprano) and Mr. J. C. Doyle (baritone).

On November 8 the programme included Mozart's 'Haffner' Symphony in D, and Beethoven's 'Leonore No. 3.' Miss Edith Mortier was the solo vocalist, and Mr. Clyde Twelvetrees the solo violoncellist.

On November 15 the programme included Mendelssohn's Violin concerto (admirably played by Signor Simonetti and the band), the 'Good Friday Music' from 'Parsifal,' and Bizet's Suite 'Children at Play.' Mr. J. C. Doyle was the solo vocalist.

The Feis Ceoil Association announces that the annual competition musical Festival will be held in May, 1915.

During the past few months there have been innumerable concerts given for various War funds. The principal one from an artistic standpoint was the vocal recital given by Miss Jean Nolan, assisted by Miss Madalene Mooney (violin), Mr. Clyde Twelvetrees, and the Rev. Arthur Oulton (accompanist).

EDINBURGH.

The organ recitals referred to last month have been continued with much success. The recitalists were Messrs. Goss Custard on October 24, H. Walton on October 31, Bernard Johnson on November 7, and F. Cunningham on November 14. It is gratifying to report that Paterson's Orchestral Concerts have received sufficient support to ensure that the series will continue for the usual period. The first concert took place on November 9, with Mr. E. Mlynarski as conductor. Miss Katherine Goodson was solo pianist, and scored a distinct success in Saint-Saëns's second Concerto and Liszt's third. On November 16 Beethoven's 'Eroica' Symphony was the main item, and Elgar's 'Sospiri,' Op. 70, received a first hearing at Edinburgh. Mr. Fellowes, who has succeeded Henri Verbruggen as leading violinist, was soloist. A novelty was introduced at this concert in the shape of duets sung by Miss Ellen Beck and Miss Saima Neovi (from Finland). A number of other concerts of a miscellaneous type have been given, all organized on more or less popular lines on behalf of various War Funds.

A concert-lecture illustrating 'Hygienic deep-breathing exercises' was given by Mr. C. J. Bishenden on November 2 at 25, Guilford Street, Russell Square.

GLASGOW.

The Choral and Orchestral Union's season opened on November 10, when the management's decision to continue the concerts this season seemed to be justified by the attendance of a satisfactorily large audience. The soloist of the evening was Miss Katherine Goodson, who played Saint-Saëns's Pianoforte concerto No. 2 in G minor and Liszt's Pianoforte concerto No. 1 in E flat. The remainder of the programme was on familiar lines. Mr. Horace Fellowes, who succeeds Mr. Verbruggen as leader of the Scottish Orchestra, may almost be claimed as a Glasgow man from his previous long connection with the city. On November 11 the first of the Scottish Orchestra's concerts under municipal auspices was given in the City Hall before a crowded audience.

The Glasgow Ladies' String Orchestra, under Miss Hilda Bayley, have resumed practices with a membership now increased to forty players. The Glasgow Orpheus Choir (Mr. H. S. Robertson) announce that the liberal patronage of the public in the past enables them to place their services freely at the disposal of War-Fund Committees throughout the country. This patriotic offer is another instance of the management's characteristic generosity.

A feature of the second Classical Concert on November 17 was the charming duet-singing by Miss Ellen Beck and Madame Saima Neovi. The programme also included Haydn's Symphony in G (No. 13 B. & H.) and a first performance here of Elgar's Adagio 'Sospiri,' the latter serving also to introduce Mr. Fellowes as a solo violinist. The Saturday Popular Orchestral Concerts made a brilliant beginning on November 14, when the accommodation of St. Andrew's Hall was taxed to its utmost. Miss Elsie Cochrane was solo vocalist.

LIVERPOOL.

The second and third concerts of the Philharmonic Society, held on October 20 and November 3 respectively, were conducted by M. Savonov, whose orchestral command was fully exhibited in the fine performances he directed of Beethoven's Symphony No. 2, Brahms's Variations on the 'St. Antony' Choral, and Schumann's 'Manfred' Overture on October 20, and of Mendelssohn's welcome 'Italian' Symphony and Tchaikovsky's 'Francesca da Rimini' on November 3. On the former occasion Mr. Herbert Brown sang, and at the later concert Miss Isolde Menges made a deep impression by the mastery of her playing in Brahms's Violin concerto. The choir was usefully employed in the National Anthems of England and Russia, and also in Pierson's inspiring 'Ye mariners of England.'

At the second concert of Mr. Akroyd's Symphony Orchestra on November 10, a capital programme included Elgar's suitably-chosen 'Sursum Corda,' Reissiger's 'Felsenmühle' Overture, Tchaikovsky's 'Capriccio Italien,' and Weber's 'Jubel' Overture. Max Bruch's G minor Violin concerto was brilliantly played by Melsa, and Mr. Alfred Benton did all possible with the Philharmonic organ in the solo part of Handel's fourth Organ concerto. There was a large audience.

Liverpool is leading the way in meeting a special need at the present time. In response to an appeal made by the Earl of Derby in the Town Hall on November 13, it was resolved to form a military band for use in the city, to enliven route marches and to encourage recruiting. Members of the band will be enrolled as soldiers for home service, and will be attached to the 5th King's Liverpool Regiment. Mr. F. Stokes, musical director at the Hippodrome, is to be bandmaster.

On October 26 the programme of the Rodewald Concert Club was sustained by the Henkel Pianoforte Quartet. Two items of special interest were Chausson's Quartet in A, Op. 30, and the Quartet in E minor, Op. 43, by W. Y. Hurlstone, a melodious and well-wrought work. On November 9, Miss Helen Anderton sang, and Mr. Horace Cropper played viola solos which fully displayed the possibilities (as well as limitations) of the instrument, in the Sonata for Viola in A minor by Emil Kreuz, and Concertstück by Hans Sitt.

This year marks the fiftieth anniversary of the establishment of the Corporation Free Lectures. The exceptionally interesting programme for the season includes a lecture on 'Old English music and musical instruments,' on February 4, by Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch; a lecture on 'Dvorák the Bohemian' on February 25, by the Rev. H. H. McCullagh; and a lecture on 'Milton and Music ("The Masque of Comus")' on March 9, by Sir Frederick Bridge. Musical lectures in the outer areas included 'English music and musicians of the Stuart period,' given in the Waterloo Town Hall on November 5 by Mr. W. A. Roberts, aided by a small orchestra and choir.

Mr. Adrian C. Boulton conducted the first of three popular orchestral concerts in the Sun Hall on November 13, when the programme ranged from Bach's 'Brandenburg' Concerto No. 2, in F, to 'Tipperary,' sung by Mrs. Ernest Taylor with the audience as chorus. Other items favourably heard were Percy Grainger's Irish Reel, 'Molly on the shore,' and Mendelssohn's Violin concerto, excellently played by Mr. John Lawson. In making it possible to hear such a fine performance for 2d., Mr. Boulton's enterprise deserves hearty support.

The annual Festival of the Church Choir Association, which is usually held about this time of the year, has been postponed until next spring.

Although the usual series of concerts by the Welsh Choral Union has been abandoned this season, a 'Messiah' performance is to be given on December 19, which Mr. John Watkyn, of Dowlais, will conduct.

At the fourth Philharmonic concert on November 17, there were three outstanding features in the programme: the brilliant playing of M. Arthur de Greef in Grieg's Pianoforte concerto, the admirable performance of César Franck's noble D minor Symphony, which Mr. Thomas Beecham conducted, and the impassioned singing of Miss Phyllis Lett in Saint-Saëns's Ballade, 'La Fiancée du Timbalier,' and Bantock's Sappho song, 'I loved thee once, Atthis.' The eminent Belgian pianist made his first appearance at these concerts on this occasion. His playing in the Concerto exhibited sustained and sparkling animation, and the strength and clearness of his musical vision, in combination with great technical command, were further shown in his playing of Chopin's B flat minor Scherzo.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

To the Hallé series have come in succession Beecham (October 22), Landon Ronald and Casals (October 29), Verbruggen (November 12), and Savonov (November 19).

Beecham's concert was conspicuous for his martial handling of the Allies' National Anthems. He put some fighting vim into them, where Ronald and Verbruggen were stately and majestic. Then came an astonishingly fine rendering of Bantock's 'Fifine' drama. Whether Bantock is as adequate in the rôle of Browning interpreter in 'Fifine' as in, say, 'Ferishtah,' need not trouble the average man or woman. Even if he deals mainly with the 'externals' of a by no means clear work, Bantock does achieve music big in conception and design, vastly interesting as orchestral colour, and easily comprehensible even to casual concert-goers.

The performance of César Franck's Symphony which followed was easily superior to the Richter and Balling readings which were already known here. Beecham raised it to a higher power of intensity; there was the white-hot exaltation in it all—perhaps recent events have brought us into closer affinity with the music of the great Liégeois. It was a noble conclusion to a very memorable concert.

Landon Ronald's programme was another ideal blend of noble and entertaining music of a type rarely known until a few years ago. Casals made everybody reconsider their ideas as to the real musical worth of Haydn's Concerto and a Boccherini Suite; some of the fine French quartets play Haydn as delicately as Casals, but never bring the hearer within measurable distance of such an understanding of the essential genius of Haydn as can this incomparable 'cellist.

The Rachmaninov No. 2 Symphony was heard for the first time, and habitués aver that no symphony has been received here so approvingly on its initial performance. Landon Ronald evinced a thoroughly sympathetic interpretation. Clarity and dignity were ever features of his conducting, but Dukas's 'L'apprenti sorcier' became somewhat too formal under his hands.

The performance of 'The Creation' on November 5, under the chorus-master, Mr. R. H. Wilson, while of high attraction, raised consideration as to whether what may be called the Handelian manner of singing Haydn is quite permissible. Miss Caroline Hatchard, Messrs. Webster Millar and Robert Radford formed an ideal trio of soloists.

Verbruggen's programme took on quite an epic character, Beethoven's 'Egmont' and 'Eroica,' and Liszt's 'Les Préludes.' In adapting the modern orchestra to the task of Beethoven interpretation Weingartner counterbalances the preponderant string tone by doubling his wood- and brass-wind sections, and the result, to modern ears at any rate, is exceedingly satisfying. Verbruggen, too, does not accept the modern orchestra just as it stands as a substitute for that of Beethoven's day. Where he finds its larger number of strings effective he uses them, but in many passages he reduces them in order to secure what he believes to be the essential balance of the instruments. There is this much to be said, that whilst Haydn and Mozart do not easily bear augmentation, the bigger the band in Beethoven the nobler the result, and on balance of advantages the Weingartner method seems preferable. The conductor commenced his concert with a stirring appeal for Belgian orphans, and £74 was collected as the audience dispersed.

On November 7 the Free Trade Hall was well filled for Mr. Brand Lane's concert, at which Madame Clara Butt and Mr. Kennerley Rumford sang, and Sir Henry Wood conducted.

The recently formed Manchester Amateur Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Walter Mudie, has begun its work; but for the abandonment of the Blackpool Festival, its first public appearance would have been made there.

Earlier in the year I was able to report the adaptation to advanced musical requirements of the recently erected New Theatre by the provision of a sunk orchestra. A further step in the same direction is now announced with the erection of an organ costing £3,000, the builders being Messrs. Jardine.

Military duty in France prevented Alfred Cortot from appearing at the Bowdon chamber concert on October 28, his place being taken by the Louvain pianist, M. de Greef. The English Folk-Song Quartet, led by Mr. Foxton Ferguson, gave harmonized folk-tunes of various nationalities, along with some newly-discovered ones from Northumbria, in addition to accompanied quartets by Walford Davies and others.

At the Manchester 'Proms.' Hamilton Harty has quickly established himself as a conductor notable for rhythmical energy of an unusually vital character, and works like Elgar's 'Cockaigne,' Mozart's 'Figaro,' the Scherzo and final movement of Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic Symphony,' or his own 'Comedy' Overture, set his qualities as a conductor in a high light.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

The choral work of the Sacred Harmonic Society was the best feature of a performance of 'Elijah' given for the War Relief Fund on November 5. The solos were undertaken by Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Margaret Balfour, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Frederic Austin, assisted by Madame Jennie Bentley, Miss Armstead, and Mr. Chapman. Mr. Allen Gill conducted, and Mr. F. Wyatt presided at the organ.

The Railway Orphanage concert took place on November 12, when a hearty welcome was given to Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Margaret Balfour, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Robert Radford. Part-songs were contributed by Mr. William Woolley's Choral Society, violin solos by M. Louis Pecskaï, organ solos by Mr. Bernard Johnson, and the accompaniments were admirably played by Mr. Hamilton Harty.

The Halifax Place Choir at their choir Festival on November 15 gave a performance of Sullivan's 'Prodigal Son,' the solos being sung by Miss Emmie Warner, Madame Ethel Parkin, Mr. Franklin Pearson, and Mr. Tom Stoton. Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson ably presided at the organ, and Mr. E. M. Barber conducted.

The London Sunday School Choir (founded in 1871) will hold their Great Spring Musical Festival at the Royal Albert Hall, South Kensington, on Saturday, February 20, 1915, and their forty-third Great Crystal Palace Festival in June.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

Patriotic and Relief Fund Concerts preponderate in the season's music.

Professional musicians, themselves suffering from reduced incomes, are readily giving their services for charity or are organizing and performing at concerts held in the great Local Military Hospital. Some music detached from these objects is however being heard. The Amateur Musical Society is continuing on normal lines, as is the Choral Union, and it has now been decided to give three orchestral Promenade Concerts after Christmas.

The Sheffield Symphony Orchestra gave an orchestral and choral concert, which the co-operation of the Sheffield Grand Opera Society, assisted with especial interest. The orchestra played Sullivan's ballet 'Victoria and Merrie England' and Cowen's 'Dances' Suite. Their best performances were of 'Lullaby' and 'Plymouth Hoe' Overtures. Choir and orchestra gave with fine spirit the national anthems of the Allies, and a new song, 'Belgium,' by the conductor of the concert, Mr. J. Duffell. The choir contributed a refined performance of Cooke's 'How sleep the brave.'

Spohr's 'Judas' received a strikingly impressive performance at Brunswick Chapel, under the direction of Mr. W. A. Packer. The choir of 100 voices sang with admirable versatility, and the soloists—Miss Ethel Bird, Miss M. R. Cooper, Mr. C. Mason, and Mr. C. Lycett—were especially successful and artistic in the quartets.

A series of performances of 'The Yeomen of the Guard' by the Croft Hall Operatic Society, and a pianoforte recital by a clever young pianist, Miss Winifred Rowbotham, are to be included in the record of the month.

An enjoyable concert of wind chamber music was given on November 9 by the Fulwood Social Guild. The Manchester Wind Quintet (Messrs. Lingard, Whittaker, Mortimer, Paersch, and Camden) played works by Onslow, Holbrooke ('Miniature Characteristic Suite'), Piérne, Lefébvre, Pessard, Sobek, and others. The unfamiliarity of the music and the attractiveness of the colour combinations of the artistic and well-disciplined party gave great pleasure, and the concert was entirely successful. Miss Daisie Evans, a talented and versatile young singer with a voice of great charm, sang songs by Grieg, Schubert, and Tchaikovsky.

YORKSHIRE.

That Leeds, though so backward in recruiting, has managed to 'keep its end up' in music is attested by the fact that of the events I have to chronicle which have occurred in the West Riding (excluding, as usual, the Sheffield district) during the past month, more than one-half have taken place at Leeds. I am not reckoning any of the 'patriotic' concerts save such as happened to be of some artistic importance, first among which was one given on Sunday, November 1, by the Leeds Philharmonic Society, for it was of first-rate quality. The programme included Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' Charles Wood's 'Dirge for two Veterans,' Schubert's 'The Lord is my Shepherd,' Cornelius's part-song, 'Love, I give myself to thee,' and, as a stirring finale, the chorus from 'Elijah,' 'Be not afraid.' The Leeds Symphony Orchestra also gave their services, and played several pieces, including the 'Finlandia' of Sibelius, while Elgar's 'Land of Hope and Glory,' in which the solo was taken by the Lady Mayoress, Mrs. Ratcliffe, a carefully trained amateur, imparted the necessary popular element. Mr. Fricker, who conducted, deserves hearty praise not only for the high level achieved in the performances, but for his courage in submitting so excellent a programme,—a courage which found its justification in an overcrowded Town Hall, and what, for Leeds, was a large collection. The second of the Leeds Saturday Orchestral Concerts, on November 7, attracted a very large audience. Mr. Fricker conducted a programme containing nothing very fresh, but well suited for a 'popular' audience, including as it did the C minor Symphony, the Hebrides Overture, two Wagner pieces, the 'Rienzi' Overture and 'Siegfried Idyll,'—which might have been chosen to contrast the 'Jekyll and Hyde' sides of his art,—and Bizet's 'Arlésienne' Suite. Miss Agnes Nicholls was the vocalist, and her presence contributed materially to the success of the concert.

Since Mr. M. E. Sadler became Vice-Chancellor of Leeds University he has done much for local music, and has organized recitals and lectures which, given in the great hall of the University, have been thoroughly appreciated by the students and others. Two such recitals have taken place during the past month: on October 28 Mr. Archy Rosenthal gave a pianoforte recital, and on November 10 the Leeds String Quartet played Glazounov's 'Novelletten' and a Tchaikovsky movement. On the following evening the first of the Leeds Bohemian Chamber Concerts took place, with a programme consisting of three fine and representative Pianoforte trios, Beethoven in B flat (Op. 97), Schumann in D minor (Op. 63), and Franck in F sharp minor (Op. 1), which were played brilliantly and also sympathetically by Messrs. A. Cohen, Hemingway, and Herbert Johnson (pianoforte). Yet another chamber concert was given at the Leeds Arts Club on November 16, when Messrs. Cohen, Fulford, Lowe and Geary played some more Russian Quartets, including Kopylov's Op. 15, which was new to Leeds, and the curious set of variations by ten different Russian composers. A recital was given at Harrogate on November 14, and again at Leeds on November 16, by Mlle. Herckelbout, a clever young artist of Liège, who has had to seek English hospitality. On November 19, too late for criticism in this place, the Leeds Choral Union gave Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' Trilogy, with Miss Caroline Hatchard and Messrs. Ivor Walters and Ivor Foster as principals, and under the conductorship of Dr. Coward.

The Bradford Subscription Concert on October 30 consisted of chamber music. Messrs. Achille Rivarde and Pablo Casals, and Miss Fanny Davies played, with remarkable delicacy and sympathy, Beethoven's great Trio in B flat (Op. 97) and Saint-Saëns's Trio in F (Op. 18), and each member of the party contributed solos. On October 24 the Bradford Permanent Orchestra began its season, Mr. Hamilton Harty conducting the so-called 'Jupiter' Symphony, his own delightful 'Comedy' Overture, the 'Parsifal' Prelude, and other things. Miss Ada Forrest and Mr. Woodcock were the soloists.

Mr. Herbert Antcliffe lectured on 'The problem of British music' at a meeting of the Bradford and District Association of Organists and Choirmasters on October 31.

On October 21, the ambitious Wakefield and District Choral Society, under Mr. Percy Bligh, attempted Elgar's 'King Olaf,' with a fair measure of success, the choir being very alert and intelligent. Miss Eva Rich, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Charles Tree were the principals. A noteworthy concert was that of the Halifax Choral Society, which, on November 5, gave an excellent performance of Verdi's 'Requiem.' The choral-singing was of very good quality, and the singing of Miss Agnes Nicholls and Madame Kirkby Lunn was most artistic and dramatic, while they had able colleagues in M. Lenghi-Cellini and Mr. Ranalow. Mr. Fricker conducted. Dr. Eaglefield Hull, with the help of his colleagues in the Huddersfield College of Music, gave a patriotic concert that was a great popular success. The programme, for obvious reasons, presented nothing of general interest, but the singing of Mr. Gervase Elwes and Madame Bertha Moore, and the playing of Miss Annie Corrie, a thoroughly artistic pianist, and the well-known violinist Mr. John Dunn, were features deserving mention. On November 13 the Hull Harmonic Society, of which Mr. Walter Porter is conductor, gave 'Elijah,' the principals engaged being Miss Blomfield, Miss Martyn, and Messrs. Macklin and Ivor Foster.

HANLEY.—A concert given by the North Staffordshire Orchestra on October 26 resulted in a profit of £60 for the benefit of Belgian Refugee funds. Under Mr. John Cope's direction the Orchestra played the third Movement from Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony, the Military March from Saint-Saëns's 'Algerian Suite,' Balfour Gardiner's 'Shepherd Fennel's Dance,' and Grieg's Pianoforte concerto, in which M. Arthur de Greef, the Belgian pianist, was the soloist. The vocalists were Miss Gladys Peck and Mr. Herbert Parker. About 150 Belgians resident in the neighbourhood attended the concert.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

BLACKPOOL.—Elgar's 'The banner of St. George' was recently performed at the Tower by the Orpheus Glee Society and the Glee and Madrigal Society under the direction of Mr. J. Woof Gags. The successor of Mr. Clifford Higgin as conductor of the former Society is Mr. J. S. Warburton, who is already known in the district as an efficient and successful choral-trainer.

CALGARY (CANADA).—The Calgary Symphony Orchestra, the sole organization of its kind in Western Canada, has been compelled (like its prototype at Toronto) owing to the War to disband for this season. Its conductor, Mr. Max Weil, has directed a choir of massed voices for the International Irrigation Congress held in this city from October 5 to 10, the selections being entirely patriotic. The solos were sung by Mr. Horace Reynolds (late of Sheffield). Enormous crowds attended the Convention, which was opened by the unfurling of flags (by pressing a button at Ottawa) by H.R.H. The Duke of Connaught, Governor-General of Canada.

JOHANNESBURG.—On September 9, a successful concert was given by the Musical Society at the Caledonian Hall, in the presence of a large audience. Under the direction of Mr. F. W. Peters, the Orchestral Society played Elgar's first 'Pomp and Circumstance' March, Wagner's 'Rienzi' Overture, Sibelius's 'Finlandia,' German's 'Henry VIII.' Dances and Triumphal March, and Gounod's 'Mirella' Overture. Songs were given by Miss Cissie de Leeuw and Mr. E. H. Lewis, and a violoncello solo by Mr. R. Kofsky.

OLDHAM.—Stanford's 'The Revenge' was performed by the Oldham Musical Society under the direction of Dr. H. Brookes, as part of a varied programme. Other choral numbers given were Adams's 'Comrades in arms,' Dr. Brookes's anthem 'O God of Love,' and Elgar's 'It comes from the misty ages.' The vocalists of the evening were Miss Dorothy Bottomley and Mr. Horace Binks. A presentation was made to the conductor as a mark of appreciation and to signalise his obtaining of the Doctor's degree.

Answers to Correspondents.

HARMONY.—Two parts approach the octave by similar motion in bar five; six-four wrongly quitted in bar six; weak chord at beginning of bar eleven; bad anticipation of tonic chord in bar fourteen; otherwise your harmony is good. The parts flow well.

MOSELEY.—Our issues for February and March, 1910, contained an article by Mr. Ernest Newman on M. d'Indy's book 'César Franck.'

L. J.—We would not say, if we could, which is the best London orchestra. We usually feel like the Irishman who 'always agreed with the last speaker.'

MERIONETH.—About ♩ = 54; at Più mosso quicken to ♩ = 68.

A TALE OF OLD JAPAN.

BY ALFRED NOYES.

This poem is well known, owing to its having been made subject of Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's famous opera. All vers of music, as well as admirers of Mr. Noyes's poetry, will be glad to have this commemorative volume, which contains an original Preface by Mr. Noyes upon his late friend R. Coleridge-Taylor. The text, which is transcribed in black letter by MISS JOAN EWEN, is reproduced in facsimile, and the volume, which is designed in a convenient and artistic form, is beautifully illustrated in colour by MISS ATE RICHES.

ERE WE LEAVE THY HOUSE O FATHER.

VESPER HYMN FOR USE IN TIME OF WAR.

Words and Music by

ERNEST HARRISON.

- 1 ERE we leave Thy House, O Father,
For our Nation we would plead;
Guard our Soldiers, God of Armies!

In their need.

- 2 Spare our Sailors in their perils,
Monarch of the mighty deep;
Safely guide them, Holy Pilot,
Safely keep!

- 3 Grant to victor and to vanquished,
When their earthly conflicts cease,
Crown of Blessings, Loving Father!

Heaven's own Peace. Amen.

THE
ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

YORK GATE, MARYLEBONE ROAD, N.W.

INSTITUTED, 1822.

INCORPORATED BY ROYAL CHARTER, 1830.

Patron: HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

President: H.R.H. THE DUKE OF CONNAUGHT AND STRATHEARN, K.G.

PRINCIPAL—SIR ALEXANDER CAMPBELL MACKENZIE, Mus.D., LL.D., D.C.L., F.R.A.M.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC offers to students of both sexes (whether amateur or professional) a thorough training in all branches of music under the most able and distinguished Professors. In addition to receiving individual lessons in the various branches of the Curriculum, students have the advantage of attending the Orchestral, Choral, and Chamber Music Classes, and the weekly Lectures on music and musicians. Evidence of their progress is given at the Fortnightly and Public Concerts and by periodical Operatic and Dramatic Performances.

There are three Terms in the Academic year—viz., the Michaelmas Term, from Michaelmas to Christmas; the Lent Term, from early in January to Easter; and the Midsummer Term, from early in May until the end of July.

The Fee for the ordinary curriculum is 12 Guineas per Term.

A large number of Scholarships and Prizes are founded and are competed for periodically.

Students who show special merit and ability receive the distinction of being elected by the Directors Associates of the Institution, and are thereby entitled to the use after their names of the initials A.R.A.M. Students who distinguish themselves in the musical profession after quitting the Institution may be elected by the Directors Fellows of the Royal Academy of Music, and are thereupon entitled to the use after their names of the initials F.R.A.M.

Subscribers have the privilege of attending the Lectures and Public Concerts and of introducing friends in proportion to the amount of their subscriptions.

An examination of persons trained independently of the Academy is held twice a year—viz., during the Summer and Christmas vacations—successful candidates at which are elected Licentiates of the Academy, and are thereupon entitled to the use after their names of the initials L.R.A.M. The syllabus is issued annually at Easter. Last day for entry for the September Examination, June 30; for the Christmas Examination, October 30.

An examination of persons engaged in the Training of Children's Voices is held at Easter and during the Christmas Vacation, and a certificate is granted to successful candidates.

A Special Course of Lecture Lessons for Professional Music Teachers has been instituted, to be followed by an Examination for the distinction of Associateship.

Prospectus, entry form, and all further information may be obtained on application.

F. W. RENAUT, Secretary.

C·BECHSTEIN

BY SPECIAL APPOINTMENT TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING

HIS LATE MAJESTY KING EDWARD VII
HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA

BUSONI.

"Your Pianos are—as regards beauty of tone and evenness, precision and delicacy of touch—the acme of what can be produced in this art."

CARREÑO.

"The Bechstein Piano is the ideal of perfection, and above all other Instruments responds to all the demands of an artist."

D'ALBERT.

"My best teachers and dearest friends are the Bechstein Grands."

GODOWSKY.

"The Bechstein Instrument is, and will remain, the ideal of the artist."

LESCHETITZKY.

"The Bechstein Piano is of the same importance to the pianist as a Stradivarius is to the violinist."

PACHMANN.

"The beauty of tone of a Bechstein Piano I can only compare with that of a Stradivarius String Quartet."

HAROLD BAUER.

"My admiration for your splendid Pianos is unbounded. Both as regards beauty and fullness of tone and perfection of mechanism the Bechstein Piano is unapproachable."

KATHARINE GOODSON.

"The Bechstein Piano is to me the most perfect in the whole world."
